PREFACE.

THE materials of English history are more copious than those of any other country. The spirit of liberty and the consequent inclination to discussion, which has animated the nation from the remotest periods of civilization, have tended to this circumstance. From Gildas to Baker extends a long line of excellent chroniclers ; and from Bacon to Hallam we possess a rich mass of what may be termed philosophical historians. Of the latter class, the names of Rapin, Hume, Smollett, and Henry, are the most widely diffused ; although amongst the reading classes, the more modern, Hallam, Turner, Lingard, Mackintosh, Brodie, Godwin, and others, are establishing a decisive authority. To extraneous materials, such as particular histories, extended biographies, and controversial dissertations, in which we equally abound, it is not within the compass of our present purpose to allude.

With such a profusion of histories, it may appear strange that an additional one should be required ; but the very accumulation proves the necessity. Each successive historian has written with a view of superseding his predecessor, and has produced arguments wherewith to justify his literary usurpation. Rapin found the English annals a disjointed mass of party statements ; Hume thought them a prolix collection concocted without spirit and without purport ; Henry complained that the progress of civilization was not developed ; and later historians have urged against all their precursors, political bias and want of due research. These latter have again divided amongst themselves. One is accused of scepticism, and another of bigotry. One, it is said, leans towards the aristocracy, another towards the democracy. One is too full of dissertation, another too minute in his narration.

These mutual accusations have all some truth in them. History, unfortunately, is a kind of border land in literature, which, bounded on one hand by politics, and on the other by religion and morality, has but too often become the field where opposing theories have fiercely contended. Our chroniclers are not so deeply chargeable with this fault, as our philosophical writers. When statesmen became historians ; when More narrated the reign of the last Yorkist ; and Bacon drew the portrait of the first Tudor ; then commenced a system of party writing, that has ever since tinged our annals with a false and delusive colour. The honour of history then disappeared ; and a rhetoric, as specious, and more brilliant, than that which disgraced the declining grandeur of Rome, arose.

But though our historians may but too much have assimilated themselves to the literati of a decaying empire ; thank Heaven ! the people have progressed in an opposite direction. Whilst our annalists have been sinking to special pleading, the mass have risen to solid thinking. The power of party has been daily lessening ; the prejudices of distinct classes are gradually melting, and an earnest desire for the truth is universally manifesting itself.

To meet this feeling, the present history has been compiled ; and with a just admiration of the unrivalled ability which adorns much of our annals, the Editor has humbly approached his task ; guided by the admirable criticism which has now for thirty years done so much to purify and elevate the public taste. To combine, as far as is practicable, the excellencies of all parties, has been his aim ; and thus to give in a connected mode, those improvements and additions which the last half century has afforded to this branch of our literature.

Hume is the basis of the work, and his eloquent narration is only broken in upon, where he is discovered to have erred from a want of those means, which the diligence of subsequent historians has supplied ; or where his political bias has been proved to have led him into erroneous statements. The Saxon portion of the history is taken from Rapin, a name which always inspires respect, if not admiration, from the fidelity and diligence with which he composed. His language is poor and tedious ; though in the present condensation it has been retrenched, where it was possible to do so, without altering his style ; it being the particular object of the present series of works to give the standard authors of the country with all their originality, when compatible with the conveyance of sound and undoubted facts. But the great feature of the present undertaking, is the incorporation of that portion of the history by Henry, which illustrates the progress of the nation in Literature, Arts, and Manners ; a part of history which has been but too much neglected, although these are subjects which concern every one ; and are often far more important than the most brilliant victory or the most successful treaty. It has been the error of historians to deem a notice of them beneath the dignity of history ; a phrase which generally means an inflated account of the transactins of a few individuals out of a nation. But we are growing wiser ; the means by which men have been humanized, and by which civilized comforts have been multiplied, are now deemed more worthy of consideration than the change of a dynasty or the contest of a faction.

Turner, Lingard, Mackintosh, and Hallam, have all been carefully looked to during the progress of the work ; and the opinions of these, in many respects admirable writers, have been quoted when they have thrown new light on our history : and equal care has been taken to refer for the like purpose to all the other modern celebrated writers who have treated of a later period, and particularly Godwin, Brodie, and D'Israeli.

To that class, even, who can afford to indulge in the luxury of books, our work may offer the advantage of giving in a succinct shape the excellencies of many authors. But to those to whom books are a necessary, and the means of procuring them a consideration, we confidently offer it as a valuable collection, which will at once save them much time and money. A history of his native country, must be, to every intelligent inhabitant of it a desideratum ; and in the present he will find, not a work re-written by one whose name cannot attract attention, but a combination of our most celebrated writers ; illustrated by much interesting information from those later authors who are alone prevented, by the high price of their works, from benefitting that class, whose pecuniary circumstances are not commensurate with the mental elevation which modern education has bestowed upon them.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

INTRODUCTION.

ALL ancient writers agree in representing the first inhabitants of Britain as a tribe of the Gauls or Celtæ; but as no authentic memorials exist before those given by the Romans on conquering the island, nothing but conjectures can be formed of the circumstances of the earlier inhabitants.

According to Cesar and other Roman writers, the Britons were generally tall and well made, and, like most of the Irish at this day, yellow-haired. Their constitutions were so good, that they frequently lived a hundred and twenty years. This length of days was probably owing to their sobriety and temperance, as much or more than to the wholesomeness of the air. The use of clothes was scarce known in the island. None but the inhabitants of the southern coasts covered their nakedness with the skins of wild beasts, carelessly thrown over them. By way of ornament, they made incisions in their bodies in the shape of flowers, trees, and animals, which, with the juice of woad, they painted of a sky-colour, that never wore out. They lived in woods, in huts covered over with skins, boughs, or turf. Their usual food was milk, and flesh got by hunting; their woods and plains being well stocked with game. They did not eat fish, though the rivers and seas that surrounded them were plentifully stored with them. Their towns or rather villages were only a confused parcel of huts placed at a little distance from each other, without any order or distinction of streets. They generally stood in the middle of a wood, the avenues of which were defended by slight ramparts of earth, or with the trees that were felled to clear the ground. They were as quick of apprehension as their neighbours the Gauls, and, if Tacitus may be credited, of greater penetration. Diodorus Siculus does not scruple to prefer their honesty and integrity before that of the Romans. Ten or a dozen brothers or friends lived all together, and had their wives in common. This custom continued a long time among them after they were grown very civilized by their commerce with the Romans. A British lady being upbraided one day by Julia, Severus's empress, with a custom so contrary to the practice of other nations, is said to have returned this bold answer, "The Roman ladies have little reason to reproach us upon this account, since we do publicly with the best of our men no more than what they do privately with the worst of theirs, freedmen and slaves."

Cesar gives a great character of the valour of the Britons, and their going to battle with undaunted bravery. They fought for the most part in chariots, from whence, furiously driving among their enemies, they flung their darts; but, when they had to deal with the horse, they left their chariots to fight on foot with advantage.

As well situated for trade as the Britons were, we do not find they had any large vessels, or ventured to sea beyond the coast of Gaul. Their chief commerce was with the Phœnician merchants, who, after the discovery of the island, exported every year great quantities of tin, with which they carried on a profitable trade with distant nations. But, notwithstanding all the care of the Phœnicians to conceal from whence they derived that metal, the Greeks discovered it ultimately, and came and traded also to the same place.

The Britons worshipped almost the same gods as the Gauls. Dis and Samoths were deities equally adored by both nations. But the Britons had a very particular veneration for Andate, the goddess of victory, to whom they sacrificed their prisoners of war. The Druids, as well among the Britons as Gauls, had the care and direction of all religious matters. The name Druid comes from the word Deru, signifying in the British or Celtic language an oak, like Drus in the Greek. The mistletoe that grows upon the oak was looked upon by them as a most sacred thing, and the greatest blessing from heaven. The Druids were held in such veneration by the people, that their authority was almost absolute. No public and scarcely any private affairs were transacted without their approbation. The chief of the Druids was a sort of pontiff or high priest, who had authority over all the rest. This dignity was elective: and sometimes, when the candidates were of equal merit, such quarrels and broils raged among them, that they fell to blows before the election was over.

The bards, among both Britons and Gauls, were priests of an inferior order to the Druids. Their business was, to celebrate the praises of their heroes in verses and songs, which they composed and sang to their harps. They continued in being a long time. There were some even after the Romans had entirely abandoned the island.

A third sort of priests, as well in Britain as in Gaul, were the Eubates, who applied themselves chiefly to the study of philosophy, and the contemplation of the wonderful works of nature, as Marcellinus informs us.

The following are a few of the most remarkable of the Druidical maxims and rules:—

"None must be instructed but in the sacred groves.

Mistletoe must be gathered with reverence, and, if possible, in the sixth moon. It must be cut with a golden bill.

Every thing derives its origin from Heaven.

The arcana of the sciences must not be committed to writing, but to the memory.

Great care is to be taken of the education of children.

The powder of mistletoe makes women fruitful.

The disobedient are to be shut out from the sacrifices.

Souls are immortal.

The soul after death goes into other bodies.

If the world is destroyed, it will be by fire or water.

Upon extraordinary emergencies a man must be sacrificed.

According as the body falls, or moves after it is fallen; according as the blood flows, or the wound opens, future events are foretold.

Prisoners of war are to be slain upon the altars, or burnt alive enclosed in wicker, in honour of the gods.

All commerce with strangers must be prohibited.

He that comes last to the assembly of the states, ought to be punished with death.

Children are to be brought up apart from their parents, until they are fourteen years of age.

Money lent in this world will be repaid in the next.

There is another world, and they who kill themselves to accompany their friends thither, will live with them there.

Letters given to dying persons, or thrown on the funeral piles of the dead, will faithfully be delivered in the other world.

The moon is a sovereign remedy for all things, as its name in Celtic implies.

Let the disobedient be excommunicated; let him be deprived of the benefit of the law; let him be avoided by all, and rendered incapable of any employ.

All masters of families are kings in their own houses, they have a power of life and death over their wives, children, and slaves."

These articles may serve to give us a specimen of the principles and religion of the Druids, which flourished a long while in Great Britain as well as in Gaul. It spread as far as Italy, as appears by Augusta's injunction to the Romans not to celebrate its mysteries. There were women, as well as men, Druids. It was a female Druid of Tungria, who, according to Vopiscus, foretold to Dioclesian (when a private soldier in Gallia) that he would be emperor of Rome.

The form of government amongst the Britons may be learnt by that of the Gauls; both nations were of Celtic extraction. The country was divided into several petty states, with a chief over each. Some of these being more powerful than the rest, kept their neighbours in a sort of dependence; and one of them, upon great and imminent dangers, was by common consent chosen commander, whose power was limited, as well as the time of his administration. During his office, he was considered as a sovereign magistrate, having power to put the laws in execution, and act as captain-general of all their forces. Livy (according to the custom of the Romans) calls this magistrate king. But a modern author, who believed he understood better the nature of that dignity, affirms the title of king not to be at all proper for the person invested with it, and therefore calls him only Paramount, or one superior to the rest. The country between the Tyne and the Channel was divided into seventeen petty states, with each its chief dignified by authors with the name of king. When Julius Cesar invaded Britain, the command of their army was conferred by the Britons on Cassibelanus, king or chief of the Trinobantes; and in the time of Claudius, Caractacus, king of the Silures, was chosen general. These nations had frequent quarrels and contests. But we have no certain knowledge of their affairs; and therefore the beginning of their history can be dated no further back than Cesar's invasion.

CHAPTER I.

From the first Invasion of Britain by the Romans under Julius Cesar, to the calling in of the Saxons. Containing the space of about five hundred years.

THE Romans were become masters of almost all Europe, of the best part of Africa, and of the richest countries of Asia, before they undertook the conquest of Britain. Julius Cesar was the first that formed the project of that conquest during his government of Gaul. He considered it would be no small advantage if he could take a view of the island, which was almost wholly unknown to all but the merchants who traded on the coasts. And these merchants themselves were so little acquainted with what Cesar wanted to know, that he could learn from them neither the extent of the island, nor whether it was well peopled, much less could they give him any information concerning the ports and havens, and whether there were any fit to receive ships of burden. This uncertainty made him resolve to send Volusenus to view the coasts as far as was possible without danger, whilst his troops were marching to the place of embarkation.

The Britons, receiving intelligence by the merchants of Cesar's design, endeavoured to divert him from his purpose, by sending ambassadors with offers of obedience to the Romans, and the delivery of hostages. Cesar gave the ambassadors a very civil reception, but, exhorting them to persist in their resolution, dismissed them without telling them positively what he intended to do. With them he sent Comius (whom he had a few days before made king of the Atrebatas) with instructions to persuade the Britons to make an alliance with the Romans, and acquaint them with his design to come over into their island. They were by no means pleased with the news, for they expected what they had done would have induced the Roman general to alter his resolution. And whether Comius spoke to them too haughtily, or they determined to let the Romans perceive they did not fear them, they committed the ambassador to prison, loading him with irons.

Volusenus, who had meantime coasted along the southern parts of the island without landing, returned and gave an account of the discoveries he had made. Whereupon Cesar embarked two legions on board eighty transports, leaving orders for the horse to follow with all speed in eighteen more that could not yet join the fleet, and were expected every moment; but his orders were not timely enough executed. At his arrival on the coasts of Britain, he saw the hills and cliffs that ran out into the sea, covered with troops, that could easily with their darts prevent his landing: upon which he determined to look out for some other place, where he might land his army with less danger. He lay by till three in the afternoon, expecting some ships that were not yet come up. Upon their joining the fleet, he made sail, and came to anchor about two leagues farther, near a plain and open shore. The Britons, perceiving his intent, sent their chariots and horse that way, whilst the rest of their army advanced to support them. The main difficulty in landing proceeded from the largeness of the vessels, which hindered them from coming near enough to the shore; so that the Roman soldiers saw themselves under a necessity of leaping into the sea armed as they were, in order to attack their enemies, who stood ready to receive them on dry ground. Cesar, perceiving his soldiers did not exert their usual bravery on this occasion, ordered some galleys to get as near the shore as possible, and set upon the enemy in the flank. This precaution had the desired effect: for the slings, engines, and arrows, were so well employed from these galleys, that the courage of the Britons began to abate. But the Romans still demurred upon throwing themselves into the water, and, perhaps, would hardly have done it at all, had not the standard-bearer of the tenth legion shown them the way, by leaping in first with his colours in his hand, crying out aloud, "Follow me, fellow-soldiers, unless you will betray the Roman eagle into the hands of the enemy. For my part, I am resolved to discharge my duty to Cesar and the commonwealth." Emulation and shame causing the soldiers to forget the danger, they courageously followed him, and began the fight. But their resolution was not able to compel the Britons to give ground; and the Romans, constrained thus to fight in the water without keeping their ranks, would in the end have been repulsed, had not Cesar caused some armed boats to ply about with recruits, which made the enemy fall back a little. The Romans improving this advantage, advanced with all possible expedition, and getting firm footing, pressed the Britons so vigorously, that at length they put them to rout. They durst not however pursue them, because the horse were not yet come; which Cesar says was the only thing that hindered the victory from being complete.

The Britons, astonished at the Roman valour, and fearing that a more obstinate resistance would but expose them to greater mischiefs, sent Comius back to Cesar, throwing the blame of his ill-treatment on the fury of the populace. At the same time ambassadors were dispatched to sue for peace, and offer hostages. Cesar very readily pardoned them on condition they would send him a certain number of hostages; a part of whom were immediately delivered, with a promise to send the rest.

Peace being thus concluded, four days after landing, the British troops were dismissed, and some of their chief men came to Cesar to manage the concerns of their nation. Meanwhile, the ships that were transporting the Roman horse, putting to sea, met with a violent storm, which forced them back again into the ports of Gaul. The same storm fell likewise upon Cesar's fleet lying in the road.

The Britons who were with Cesar soon perceived his want of provisions, ships, and cavalry, and resolved to use all possible means to cut off provisions and beguile him till winter came on. Cesar, perceiving their intentions, took care to lay in as great a stock of provisions as he could, and put them under a strong guard within the camp. Then, sending to Gaul for part of what he had occasion for to refit his fleet, he made use of the timber and iron of the broken vessels to repair the rest. The soldiers laboured with so uncommon a diligence, that in a few days the fleet was in a condition to sail, twelve ships only having been lost.

The seventh legion having been sent out to forage, news was brought to Cesar, that a cloud or dust was seen to rise from that quarter. He suspected immediately what was the matter; and taking with him two cohorts that guarded the camp, ordered the rest of the forces to follow with all expedition. When he came to the place he found the legion surrounded by the enemy, and overpowered by numbers. As the harvest was brought in every where else, the Britons did not question but the Romans would come and forage there, and lay in readiness to fall upon them. It was very easy to put soldiers in disorder that had quitted their arms, and were dispersed up and down to gather corn. They killed some at the first onset; and to prevent the rest from escaping, began to surround them with their chariots. Cesar came very seasonably to the relief of the legions, and saved them from being all taken or slain. Having brought them off, he stood some time in order of battle in sight of the enemy, but at length retreated to his camp, not deeming it proper to engage, unless compelled to it.

The Britons, flushed with this success, drew together a greater body of troops, with a resolution to attack the Roman camp. Though Cesar had but thirty horse in all, he drew up his men, that the enemy might not think he was afraid of them. They attacked him, as he foresaw; but instead of forcing the camp, they were vigorously repulsed and pursued for several miles, which so disheartened them that they sent the same day ambassadors to Cesar to sue for peace. The posture of Cesar's affairs would not suffer him to improve his victory, because he had no horse to oppose those of the enemy. This consideration induced him to conclude a treaty with them, whereby they were bound to deliver a greater number of hostages, and send them to Gaul, where he intended to go as soon as possible. Though the passage was not long, the fear of exposing his fleet to another storm, if he stayed till the equinox, made him hasten his departure. The Britons neglecting to send their hostages, he put his troops into winter-quarters, and formed the design of a more important expedition in the following spring. Meanwhile, the senate being informed of Cesar's exploits in Britain, a procession of twenty days was decreed to him, though the advantages he had gained were of little consequence to the commonwealth.

Cesar, according to his custom, went and passed part of the winter in Italy, leaving orders with his officers to repair the old, and build some more new ships. When he had received advice that his orders were executed, he came to Portus Itius, where he found six hundred ships and twenty-eight galleys, on board of which he put five legions and two thousand horse. He conducted this numerous fleet to a place on the British coast, marked by him the summer before, and landed his forces without opposition. The Britons, as he was told afterwards, at the sight of so mighty an armament, thought fit to retire into the country, behind some hills. Cesar, according to the Roman custom, fortified his camp, and leaving a guard, set out in the night in quest of the enemy. Having marched about twelve miles, he saw them posted on the other side of a river, to oppose his passage. Though resolute at first, they could not withstand the furious charge of the Roman horse, and were forced at length to quit their post. They retired a little farther into a wood, the avenues whereof were blocked up with huge trees, laid across one another, and which seemed to have been fortified in some former war. Though difficult to force these intrenchments, the seventh legion performed that service, and obliged the Britons to betake themselves to flight. But night coming on, and the country unknown, Cesar forbade all pursuit.

Next day, he divided his army into three bodies, which marched at some distance from each other in pursuit of the enemy. During the march, he received the melancholy news that his fleet was almost entirely destroyed by a violent storm, most of the ships being dashed to pieces or driven ashore. As this accident might be attended with ill consequences, he hastened back to the sea side, where he found forty of his ships destroyed, and the rest so damaged that they were hardly repairable. He set all the carpenters of the fleet and army to work, sending for others at the same time from Gaul. To prevent the same misfortune again, as soon as the ships were refitted, he employed his soldiers, night and day, to draw them by strength of arms into the midst of the camp. This work, notwithstanding the difficulty of it, was finished in ten days. Meanwhile, he wrote to Labienus, his lieutenant in Gaul, to build more ships, and send them over when ready. Then, leaving a sufficient force to guard the camp, he resumed the design interrupted by the misfortune befalling his fleet.

He had not marched far before he was informed that the enemy's forces were much increased, under the conduct of Cassibelanus, king of the Trinobantes, whose kingdom lay beyond the Thames, about eighty miles from the sea. This prince had hitherto waged continual wars with his neighbours; but upon the Romans' approach they had concluded a peace with him, and chosen him commander-in-chief. Whilst the Roman army was on the march, they found themselves attacked on a sudden by the British horse and chariots. But this attack, though vigorous, was repulsed with great loss to the Britons; nevertheless, they were not disheartened. Some days after, whilst the Romans were employed about their entrenchments, a body of Britons, that lay concealed in the neighbouring woods, fell furiously upon those that guarded the camp, and put them into great disorder. Cesar seeing this, immediately sent two cohorts to their assistance, who, surprised at the British manner of fighting, were routed at the first charge. Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, was slain in the action. As this battle was fought in sight of the camp, Cesar saw plainly the great disadvantage the Romans, encumbered with their heavy armour, lay under against swift and light-armed enemies, that engaged in small parties only, with a body of reserve in their rear, from whence they were continually recruited. The Roman horse were no less embarrassed than the foot. As the Britons frequently counterfeited a retreat, the horsemen detached to pursue them were immediately cut in pieces; so that it was equally dangerous to pursue the enemy or to retire. The confused manner of Cesar's relating this affair is a clear evidence that the Romans were worsted, though he does not say it in so many words.

On the morrow, the Britons posted themselves on some hills within sight of the Roman camp. As they appeared to be but few in number, it was thought they had no design to engage a second time. Meanwhile, Cesar sending out all the horse to forage, with three legions to guard them, the Britons fell with great fury upon the foragers, who were defended by their guard. The resistance made by the legions giving Cesar time to advance with the rest of the army, a great battle ensued, wherein the Britons were entirely defeated.

After this victory, Cesar marched towards the Thames, with intent to penetrate into Cassibelanus's dominions. When he came to the river side, at a very difficult ford, he found the enemy drawn up on the opposite bank. Besides their great numbers, they had fortified that part of the river with sharp stakes driven so deep that some of them did not appear above the water, as deserters said afterwards. Notwithstanding these obstacles, Cesar resolved to attack them, and ordered the horse to ride in, and the foot to follow, the soldiers being scarce able to hold their hands above water to carry their arms. The attack was made with such resolution, that the Britons were at length forced to quit their post, and leave the Romans a free passage. Cassibelanus finding he could not hinder Cesar's passing the Thames, dismissed his army, reserving only four thousand chariots, with which he harassed the Romans, and endeavoured to deprive them of provisions, by carrying off all the corn and cattle that lay in their rout. The Romans were great sufferers in this march; for they did not dare to make the least excursion in search of provisions, for fear of sallies from the woods and coverts.

Meanwhile, the Trinobantes, upon Cesar's approaching their country, sent deputies to him to sue for peace, praying him also to take into his protection Mandubratius, their king, who fled into Gaul upon Cassibelanus's murdering his father, Immanuentius, and depriving him of his dominions. Cesar promised to send back Mandubratius, if they would supply him with provisions and deliver forty hostages, to which they immediately agreed. Several other states following the example of the Trinobantes, Cesar found himself in condition to attack the capital city of Cassibelanus, where the country people were retired with their flocks and herds. What the Britons called a city was only a wood fenced with a ditch, to defend them against the incursions of their enemies. Though this entrenchment seemed very strong, Cesar ordered it to be stormed so briskly at two different places, that the Britons, not being able to stand the assault, fled out at one of the avenues, but not without having great numbers slain and captured, and leaving behind them abundance of cattle.

Whilst Cesar was advancing into the enemy's country, the Kentish men, inhabiting the south roast, over against Gaul, drew their forces together, with a design to cut off the Romans that were left to guard their ships. As soon as they were ready, they marched under the conduct of four kings, namely, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, and furiously attacked the Roman camp; but after a long and obstinate fight were repulsed, and King Cingetorix was taken prisoner.

After such frequent defeats, Cassibelanus, considering that most of his kingdom was in subjection to the Romans, and that several neighbouring states had made, or were ready to make, their submission, treated with them likewise, by the mediation of Comius. He easily obtained a peace, Cesar's resolution to return to Gaul not permitting him to pursue his conquests in Britain. Besides, he considered that the weather, now beginning to grow bad, would help Cassibelanus to defend himself the rest of the campaign, as well as the whole ensuing winter. By the conditions of the treaty, the Britons were annually to pay the Romans a certain tribute; and Cassibelanus was to deliver a number of hostages, and leave Mandubratius in quiet possession of his dominions. Though Cesar had scarce ships enough to transport his army, he chose rather to stow his men on board what vessels he had, than run the hazard of being surprised by the autumnal equinox. He embarked them, therefore, in the best manner he could, and receiving the hostages, put to sea, and safely arrived in Gaul.*

This is the account given by that great general of his two expeditions into Britain, and which, though penned with great apparent modesty, has been generally esteemed a very partial statement, greatly too much in his own favour, and equally unjust to his opponents. Many are of opinion Cesar was often defeated by the Britons, and that his success was always very dubious.

After Cesar's death the tribute was not paid, nor, perhaps, demanded for twenty years. But when Augustus was firmly settled in the possession of the empire, he undertook to compel the Britons to observe their agreement with his predecessor. Tenuantius, successor of Cassibelanus, sent rich presents, which were laid up in the Capitol. Cunobelinus, his successor, followed his example, and had money coined, some pieces of which are still to be seen in the cabinets of the curious, with the five first letters of his name, C, u, n, o, b, or, C, a, m, the three first of Camelodunum, his capital city, on one side; and on the reverse, a man sitting and coining money, with these letters, T, A, S, C, I, A, by which antiquaries understand that this money was designed for the payment of the tribute.

Tiberius, successor of Augustus, neglected Britain, as a country of little consequence, it being unknown to him; as did also Caligula, his successor; and the Britons preserved their liberty above ninety years, during the reigns of the four first emperors; their subjection to the Romans not commencing till the time of Claudius, who was more particularly incited to resubjugate Britain by the treacherous representations of Bericus, a Briton, who had unsuccessfully endeavoured to raise a sedition against Togodumnus and Caractacus, who succeeded their father, Cunobelinus. Plautius, a distinguished general, was sent into Britain by the Roman emperor; who, after fighting various battles, in which each party by turns were successful, reduced the Britons to a state of great weakness. The Emperor Claudius came himself, and completed the conquest, in a decisive victory at Camelodunum, a settlement in Essex.

Ostorius Scapula succeeded Plautius. He found the Britons making continual inroads into the Roman conquests, and resolved to confine them between the Avon and Severn, by means of forts built between the two rivers. He made Camelodunum a military colony, and much about the same time London was also made a trading colony; and that part of Britain lying between the Thames and the sea was reduced into the form of a province, and called Britannia Prima.

The Iceni,* not yet weakened by the foregoing wars, having, from the beginning, been in alliance with the Romans, were the first that opposed Ostorius's design. Some neighbouring nations followed their example, and joining their forces under one general, they encamped on advantageous ground, throwing up in haste a breastwork of flints, to prevent the attempts of the horse. Though Ostorius was then without any but the auxiliary forces, he attacked them; ordering the horse to dismount and support those that were to charge first. The resistance of the Britons was more obstinate than expected; nevertheless, their intrenchments were forced at last with great slaughter on their side. After this victory, Ostorius reduced the Cangi† and the Brigantes.‡ But the Silures,§ the bravest and most powerful of all the Britons, could not be tamed either by clemency or severity. Their forces were so considerable, that the legions were obliged to march against them. They were headed by their king, Caractacus; famous for his great exploits, and universally esteemed by his countrymen, being accounted the best general Britain had ever produced. This prince, whom the nations in alliance with the Silures had made commander-in-chief, had retired into the country of the Ordovices,|| where, assembling all his forces, he chose an advantageous post of very difficult access, and drew up his army on the side of a steep hill, with a little river¶ at the bottom, which, though fordable in many places, was of great service to him. His camp being surrounded with a sort of rampart of flints and stones, he seemed to be out of all danger. The Romans, however, passed the river, though with many killed and wounded; and it was not possible for the Britons to stand against the warlike and veteran troops, who quickly put them to flight. Besides the loss sustained by the Britons in the action, their defeat was the more considerable by the taking of the wife, daughters, and brothers of Caractacus, who, flying for protection to Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantines, was by her delivered up to the Romans, for fear of drawing a victorious army into her country, should she think of protecting the vanquished prince. Caractacus had now commanded the confederate army of the Britons nine years; and his fame had reached as far as Rome, where all were surprised at his so long resisting the Roman power. The emperor ordered him and the other captives to be sent to Rome. On a day appointed, the people being all present, and the emperor seated on his throne, there came first Caractacus's vassals and retinue, with the caparisons and other spoils of war; then his wife, daughters, and brothers; and lastly, Caractacus himself, walking with a settled countenance, without holding down his head, or appearing too much dejected at his misfortune. He addressed the emperor in a speech of somewhat of the following substance:—

"If my moderation had been as great as my birth or fortune, Rome had seen me this day her ally, and not captive, and perhaps she would not have disdained to rank in the number of her friends a prince royally descended, and who commanded many nations. My present condition is as dishonourable to me as it is glorious to you. I had arms, horses, riches, and grandeur. Is it strange I should part with them unwillingly? Does it follow, because you have a mind to rule over all, that therefore every one must tamely submit? Had I sooner been betrayed to you, neither your glory nor my misfortunes had been rendered so famous, and my punishment would have been buried in eternal oblivion. But now, if you preserve my life, I shall be a standing monument of your clemency to future ages." The emperor, moved with these words, pardoned the captives.

The Britons resumed their courage, and successfully attacked the Romans that were left to build forts in the country of the Silures; and, had not timely relief come from the neighbouring garrisons, would have cut them to pieces. The commander and eight captains, with a number of soldiers, were slain. Another time they improved their advantage in such a manner, that Ostorius was obliged to advance with the legions, after having tried in vain to retrieve the battle with supplies of the light-armed troops. The coming of the legions revived the courage of the Romans, and forced the Britons to retreat, though with little loss. After this there were several conflicts with various success, according to the circumstances of time and place.

The Silures, of all the British nations, were the most obstinate, being exasperated at the emperor's saying, Britain would have no peace, till, like the Sicambri, they were transported into some foreign country. They surprised two cohorts, which, from the avarice of the officers, and an eager desire of pillage, had advanced too far into the enemy's quarters. By distributing the spoil and prisoners, they endeavoured to draw in the rest of the nations to revolt. Ostorius died about this time with vexation at not being able to put an end to the war.

Aulus Didius was immediately sent over, who found matters in a worse condition than ever. His arrival was some check to the Silures, who, exalted by their late success, were making inroads into the frontiers of the Roman province.

Meanwhile, Venutius, king of the Brigantes, successor of Caractacus in the command of the army, persuaded by Cartismandua his queen (the same that betrayed Caractacus), entered into an alliance with the Romans; satisfied with preserving his own dominions, without troubling himself about the affairs of the other nations. A quarrel arising between him and his queen, and ending in a domestic war, he was compelled to declare against the Romans, they having prematurely espoused the cause of his queen.

Veranius, who had succeeded Didius in the reign of Nero, died before he had done any thing remarkable. Suetonius Paulinus was appointed to fill his place. Great achievements were expected of this general, whose merit was compared with Corbulo's, who had lately conquered Armenia. The moment he came to his government, he formed the project of conquering the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesea. He passed the foot over in flat-bottomed boats, the sea being very shallow in that place, the horse following, some swimming, others fording. The islanders were drawn up on the other side, with the women running up and down, dressed like furies, their hair hanging loose, firebrands in their hands, and surrounded by the Druids, who, with hands lifted up to heaven, poured out dreadful curses and imprecations. This unexpected spectacle so astonished the Romans, that they stood still, exposed to the enemy's darts. But at length, the shame of being daunted by a company of frantic women and priests, and the exhortation of their general, bringing them to their senses and courage, they fell upon the enemy sword in hand, and became masters of the island. The first thing Paulinus did was to order all the consecrated groves to be cut down, where the islanders sacrificed their captives, and consulted their gods by inspecting the entrails of men.

But, whilst Paulinus was employed in this expedition, unexpected occurrences obliged him to leave Mona in an abrupt manner, to settle affairs of much greater moment.

Prasutagus, king of the Iceni, left by will the emperor and his daughters co-heirs to his great treasures, in expectation of procuring by that means Nero's protection for his family and people. But this precaution had a quite contrary effect. The emperor's officers seized upon all his effects in their master's name. Boadicea, his widow, a woman of great courage and a high spirit, expressing her resentment of the injury done to her daughters, the brutality of the officers was so outrageous, that they ordered her to be publicly whipped, and caused her daughters to be ravished by the soldiers.

The Britons looked upon this outrage with such indignation, that the whole island was possessed with a spirit of revolt. The Iceni led the way, and were soon followed by their neighbours the Trinobantes. Venutius and his party joined with them, and, in short, all the nations in subjection to the Romans rose in arms with one consent, the city of London only excepted. The Roman historians themselves own, that the injustice and violence of the emperor's officers gave the Britons but too just cause to revolt. They were thrust out of their possessions without any form of law, by the veterans that were sent to settle in the island. Caius Decianus, Nero's procurator, without any regard to the ordinance of Claudius, which left the vanquished in possession of their goods, confiscated their estates to the emperor's use. The petitions presented to him on that occasion were all rejected and without alleging any other reason but his will, which he made a law, caring for nothing but his own and his master's profit. Seneca himself, with all the noble sentiments of moderation and disinterestedness which shine in his writings, but which were never seen in his practice, is said to have contributed very much to the insurrection, by rigorously exacting on a sudden the money he had lent some of the Britons upon usury. This treatment raised in the minds of the people so great an aversion to a foreign yoke, that they were unanimously determined to shake it off. Venutius cherished the rebellion to the utmost of his power, and the very adherents of the queen laying aside their domestic quarrels, and renouncing the friendship of the Romans, joined with the rest of their countrymen for the recovery of their liberty.

Boadicea, animated with an ardent desire of revenge, headed the revolvers, who fell in a sudden and furious manner upon the Romans dispersed in their colonies, which were more carefully embellished than fortified, massacring all without distinction of age or sex. Unheard-of cruelties were perpetrated on this occasion, and strange punishments invented to glut the fury of the enraged people. Eighty thousand Romans are computed to have perished in the massacre.

Paulinus receiving advice of this revolution, suddenly quitted the Isle of Mona to march against the revolted Britons, who had an army of a hundred thousand men, under the conduct of Boadicea, whose noble stature and heroic courage excited their deepest veneration. This princess ardently desired to engage with Paulinus, whose army was only ten thousand strong, in expectation of completing her revenge, by the destruction of so considerable a remnant of the enemy. Meanwhile, Paulinus, expecting no succours from any place, was in great straits. The ninth legion, commanded by Petilius Cerealis, had just been entirely defeated. Pœnius Posthumus, with a considerable detachment of the second, refused, contrary to the law of arms, to obey his general's orders, to come and join him. Thus Paulinus was under the necessity either of marching against his enemies with his little army, or of securing them in some town. He chose the latter, and shut himself up in London, but quickly altered his resolution. Foreseeing his endeavours to save that colony would endanger the whole province, he marched out, notwithstanding the cries and entreaties of the inhabitants not to abandon them to the fury of the rebels: therefore, instead of retiring from the Britons, he resolved to meet them. He pitched upon a narrow piece of ground for the field of battle, with a forest behind that secured him from ambuscades in the rear, and a large plain in front, where the Britons were encamped. He drew up the legions close together in the centre, the light-armed around them, and the cavalry as the two wings. The Britons swarmed about the plain in battalions and squadrons, exulting in their numbers, and secure of victory. Their wives and children were brought into the field in waggons, which lined their intrenchments, to be witnesses of their actions and partners in the spoil.

Boadicea, with her daughters by her side in the chariot, rode up and down, addressing herself to the several nations. She is said at the end of her harangue to have let loose a hare she concealed in her bosom, as a good omen of victory.

The Romans commenced the battle by darting their javelins without quitting the advantage of their post. When their quivers were emptied, they advanced sword in hand. Whilst the fight was carried on with darts at a distance, the Britons were in hopes the Romans, daunted by the number of their enemies, would take to flight. But when they saw the legions advancing sword in hand, with short and thick steps, and no signs of fear in their looks, they fell into disorder, which continually increased, there being no leaders or officers capable of repairing it. The Romans seeing them thus shaken, fell upon them with great fury, and, the Roman horse in the wings breaking through the British cavalry, a terrible rout ensued; the great number of carriages, full of unserviceable multitudes, becoming an obstacle to the flight of the Britons. The Roman soldiers spared neither age nor sex, but sacrificed to their revenge the women and children, and even the very horses. This victory equalled their most famous ones; if it be true, as Tacitus affirms, that eighty thousand Britons were slain, with the loss only of four hundred Romans, and as many wounded. Boadicea escaped falling into the hands of the conquerors, but was touched with so deep a sense of her shame and loss, that she ended her days with poison. On the other side, Pœnius Posthumus, who refused to obey his general, either to avoid the punishment due to his offence, or for grief at losing his share of the glory of the victory, stabbed himself.

The Britons, in the utmost consternation, without general or army, fled before their enemies, without offering the least resistance. Their misery was farther increased by a famine, brought upon themselves by neglecting to sow their lands. And it cannot be doubted Paulinus's army would have been sufficient to complete the conquest of Britain, if dissensions arising among the Romans had not prevented them from improving their advantages.

During the short reigns of Galba and Otho, the Britons had neither governor nor general. Vitellius being come to the empire, sent Vectius Bolanus into Britain, to take upon him the command of the army. He continued in the province till Vespasian, who succeeded Vitellius on the imperial throne, being informed of the state of Britain, sent thither Petilius Cerealis; who, during his government, attacked and defeated in several battles the Brigantes, the most numerous and considerable of all the British nations. Julius Frontinus succeeded him, and acquired no less glory than his predecessor, by subduing the warlike Silures, whose country seemed, by its situation, to screen them from all attacks.

Towards the end of Vespasian's reign, Julius Agricola arrived in Britain to succeed Frontinus. Some time before he was appointed governor of Britain, the Ordovices had surprised and cut to pieces a body of Roman horse, quartered in their frontiers. Agricola immediately attacked them, and notwithstanding the difficulty of the undertaking, made them pay dear for the advantage they had lately gained.

War was not the only affair that employed the new governor. Whilst his arms were triumphant, he carefully inquired about every thing relating to the government of the province. He spent the whole winter after his first campaign, in diligent regulating several abuses crept in by the avarice or negligence of former governors. He prevented all kind of exactions; caused justice to be administered punctually and impartially; and endeavoured to remove every occasion of discontent. These proceedings gained the affection of the Britons to such a degree, that he had no cause to fear a revolt whilst he should be employed in making new conquests. Vespasian dying about this time, his son Titus succeeded him, and, knowing Agricola's great merit, continued him in his government.

In the spring the general took the field again, and marched towards the north, where he made some conquests. He observed the Romans commonly lost in the winter what they gained in the summer, because they durst not venture to quarter in the conquered countries, which were too much exposed. To prevent this inconvenience, he resolved to build forts in proper places, where garrisons might be kept in the winter, always ready to repulse the enemy. As he was a great master in the art of fortification, these forts were built and situated in such manner, that the Romans were never under a necessity to quit them, nor the enemies ever able to take them.

Agricola, in a series of most skilful campaigns, entirely subdued the island; penetrating far beyond his predecessors into Caledonia, whither such of the Britons as remained unsubdued had retired. Here at the feet of the Grampian hills he gained his conclusive and most celebrated victory over Galgacus, one of the last of those heroic native chieftains who struggled against the arrogant domination of the Romans.

Agricola it was who gave the finishing blow to the liberty of Britain. By his valour and prudent conduct all that part of the island lying south of the two Friths, was reduced to a Roman province; and the northern part only remained free to the inhabitants, a wild uncultivated country, not worth the conquering or keeping.

Though the loss of their liberty seemed to be an irreparable damage to the Britons, it was in some measure repaired by the great alteration for the better in their customs and manners. In a short time they laid aside their rude and savage life, and assumed the manners of their conquerors. Arts and sciences, little regarded by the Britons before this revolution, flourished among them as much as in any other part of the Roman dominions. In a word, from mere savages the Britons became exceedingly civilized. After this reformation, they made but faint struggles for the recovery of their liberty, being pleased, for the most part, with their servitude. It must, however, be confessed, that a great many chose to lose their possessions, and retire into the north among the Picts and Scots, rather than live in subjection to the Roman yoke. These were the men that, joining with those who afforded them refuge, made continual war with the Romans, in maintenance of the liberty their unhappy country had lost. They spared not even their countrymen, whom they looked upon with abhorrence for being pleased with their slavery. These were the men that with the Picts and Scots obliged emperors themselves to come over in person, and oppose the efforts of their invincible courage.

As for the subjects of the empire, they endured all the hardships that are the usual lot of the vanquished. Exorbitant taxes were laid upon them on numberless pretences. Their estates were taken from them and given to the veterans that were continually coming to settle in the island. The flower of their youth were made soldiers, and dispersed in the other provinces of the empire; according to the usual policy of the Romans, who always transported large numbers levied in a conquered country into other remote regions; for instance, the Britons into Pannonia, the Batavians into Illyria, the Germans into Britain, to keep them at a distance from their own country; and by thus draining the conquered nations of their main strength, they disabled them from revolting, and at the same time made use of them to acquire new conquests.

After Agricola's departure from Britain, we have but a slender account of what passed in the island till the reign of Adrian. We only know that Sallustius Lucullus was sent hither by Domitian, to whose suspicions or jealousy he quickly fell a sacrifice. It is to be presumed, the subjects of the empire were quiet, and the inhabitants of the north suffered to enjoy their liberty in peace. The Roman historians mention also in the reigns of Nerva and Trajan some commotions in the island that were quickly appeased; but the particulars are unknown. It may likewise be observed in this interval, the Romans, after their conquests, suffered kings to be in Britain; for they gloried in having such for their subjects; Juvenal speaks of King Arviragus, who reigned in some part of the island under Domitian.

In the first year of Adrian, the northern people, a mixture, as supposed, of Picts, Scots, and Britons, but confounded by the Roman historians under the name of Caledonians, made an irruption into the Roman province. Their first exploit was to demolish some of Agricola's fortresses between the two Friths. Adrian, being informed of these commotions, appointed Julius Severus governor of Britain, but, before he had time to perform any thing, he was suddenly recalled and employed elsewhere. The Caledonians continuing to infest the Roman territories, the emperor resolved to go over in person, and subdue these fierce and troublesome people. As soon as they heard of his arrival, they relinquished the country they were possessed of, and retired to the north. Adrian advanced as far as York, where he met some of Agricola's old soldiers, that had been with him in the northern parts. The description these gave him of the country he intended to conquer, diverted him from pursuing his expedition. Besides that the bogs and mountains he was to pass would have engaged him in a war more laborious than honourable, he easily perceived, that, should his undertaking be crowned with success, it would procure no great advantage to the empire. Wherefore he came to a resolution to leave to the Caledonians all the country between the two Friths and the Tyne; in hopes by thus enlarging their bounds to keep them quiet: but, at the same time to secure the Roman province from their incursions, he caused a rampart of earth to be thrown up, covered with turf, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway-Frith. This rampart was eighty miles in length, and ran quite across the country from east to west; by which he secured the southern parts, leaving the Caledonians all the lands between the new rampart and the isthmus that parts the two Friths. Having thus settled matters in the island, he returned to Rome, and was honoured with the title of Restorer of Britain, as appears by some medals.

After these last irruptions of the northern people, there had long been a mortal enmity betwixt them and the southern Britons. These last finding themselves entirely separated by inclination and interest from the rest of the inhabitants of the island, were the more forward to embrace the customs and manners of the Romans. And afterwards, by means of the arts and sciences, became by degrees capable of being instructed in the Christian religion, which until then was scarce known in the island.

How strong soever Adrian's rampart might be, it was not sufficient to prevent the inroads of the northern people. Indeed, they behaved peaceably as long as there were Roman troops enough on their borders to defend the rampart. But the moment these were removed, as it sometimes happened, they began their usual ravages. And, in the reign of Antoninus Pius, not satisfied with their booty, they destroyed the rampart in several places. Antoninus being informed of it, and fearing their boldness, if not curbed, would carry them to greater undertakings, ordered Lollius Urbicus to go and quell them. The new governor, (having first subdued the Brigantes, who endeavoured to shake off the Roman yoke,) in order to put a stop to the northern irruptions, raised another rampart on the neck of land between the two Friths, where Agricola had formerly built his fortresses. Thus the inhabitants of the north were confined within narrower bounds than before. By means of this rampart and a camp at a little distance where troops were kept ready to march on occasion, he compelled the Caledonians to remain peaceably in their country. Though Antoninus was never in Britain himself, this expedition, as done by his orders, and under his auspices, gained him the title of Britannicus.

Marcus Aurelius, his successor, gave the government of Britain to Calphurnius Agricola. This governor checked the insolence of the Caledonians, and strengthened the emperor's dominion over such of the Britons as seemed to bear their yoke with the most reluctance. It was in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, that Lucius, a British king, embraced the Christian religion, which had been long before planted in the island, but for want of due cultivation had taken no deep root.

During the reign of Commodus, successor of Marcus Aurelius, there were great commotions in Britain. The northern men taking up arms, cut in pieces the Roman army, commanded by an inexperienced general, and made great ravages in the province. All Britain was in danger of being lost, if the emperor had not speedily sent Ulpus Marcellus, a general of great reputation. The new governor defeated the rebels in several encounters, and by his conduct put an end, in a very short space, to this dangerous war.

Severus divided Britain into two governments. The first, containing the southern parts, was given to Heraclitus; and Virius Lupus had the second, consisting of the northern provinces bordering upon the Caledonians, by whom he was so infested, that he was compelled at last to purchase a peace with money.

After this treaty Britain remained in quiet till the fifteenth year of Severus, when the Caledo-nians renewed their incursions into the Roman province. The Roman soldiers having enjoyed several years peace, were grown so effeminate and negligent, that they seemed never to have had the least tincture of military discipline. It was this that emboldened the Caledonians, and made them think they should not neglect so fair an opportunity to attack their neighbours, who till then had appeared so formidable to them.—They made such progress, that the emperor, though sixty years of age, and afflicted with the gout, resolved to go in person and chastise their insolence. His intent was, to completely prevent the continual commotions in Britain, by the entire conquest of the north. To that purpose he drew together a numerous army, and set out for Britain, accompanied by his sons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians, when they heard of his arrival, sent ambassadors to demand peace upon honourable terms. But he refused to listen to them, unless they would submit to his mercy; which they not consenting to, he marched towards their country with his eldest son Caracalla, leaving Geta at London, to take care of the southern parts.

It was with infinite toil that he penetrated to the utmost bounds of the north, cutting down woods, draining bogs, or filling them with bays. By this hard duty and the continual ambuscades of the enemy, he lost 50,000 men. He, however, accomplished his design, and subdued these fierce and hitherto unconquered people. But soon perceiving how fruitless it was, since he could not possibly keep the country in subjection without a great army always on the spot, he relinquished these conquests; and confining himself to Adrian's former project, he divided the island into two parts by a wall, in the place where Adrian threw up his rampart. This wall, of which there are still some remains, was called by the ancient Britons Mursever, or Severus's wall, and must not be, as it is by some, confounded with the rampart raised by Lollius Urbicus between the two Friths. The emperor having nothing more to do in the north, returned to York, leaving the finishing of the wall and command of the army to his son Caracalla. This expedition caused him to assume the title of Britannicus Maximus. Caracalla, no longer restrained by the emperor his father's presence, suffered the soldiers to commit all manner of licentiousness: so that the Caledonians, unused to the yoke, took up arms with one accord. Severus hearing of this revolt, but not knowing the cause, ordered the rebels to be all massacred. Severus died shortly after at York, and the two princes his sons concluded a peace with the Caledonians,* and returned to Rome.

Little is known of the affairs of Britain from the death of Severus to the reign of Dioclesian. There is reason to suppose that some of the thirty tyrants who were in possession of the empire were acknowledged, if not personally present, in Britain. Probus was the first emperor who permitted the Britons to plant vines as well as the Gauls or Spaniards. But in all appearance, no great benefit was reaped by this permission. Probus also, after subduing the Vandals and Burgundians, sent over great numbers of them into Britain. These new colonies are generally thought to have been settled on Gogmagog-hill, near Cambridge, where there remains to this day a fortification, imagined to be the work of these foreigners. It is, however, on better evidence, ascribed to the Danes, who were long masters of Cambridge.

* The inhabitants of Caledonia were the Picts and Scots, as to whom a great controversy exists among historians. Hume, having investigated the subject with his usual philosophical acuteness, says, "The Picts seem to have been a tribe of the native British race, who having been chased into the northern parts by the conquests of Agricola, had there intermingled with the ancient inhabitants. The Scots were derived from the same Celtic origin, had first been established in Ireland, had migrated to the north-west coasts of this island, and had been long accustomed, as well from their old as their new seats, to infest the Roman province by piracy and rapine."

In the beginning of Dioclesian's reign, Carausius had the command of a fleet, with orders to scour the seas of the piratical Franks and Saxons, who perpetually infested the Belgic, Armorican, and British coasts. Carausius found means to enrich himself immensely, by plundering the pirates, or taking shares with them in their spoils. After which, he began by degrees to receive the emperor's commands with less respect and submission. Maximian was then emperor of the west, Dioclesian of the east. Carausius's conduct creating in Maximian suspicions that were but too well grounded, he resolved to have him assassinated. Upon notice of which, Carausius immediately assumed the imperial purple, and as his riches had acquired him a great interest in the army, his authority was readily acknowledged in the island. Maximian advanced as far as Gaul with design to chastise him; but finding him too well established, he thought it better to associate him into the empire, and leave him Britain for his share. There are silver coins still found in England of these two emperors, having on the reverse two hands joined together with these words, "Concordia Augg."

Dioclesian and Maximian, on the same day, resigned the empire, one in the east, the other in the west. Galerius and Constantius succeeding them, the last, as emperor of the west, had Britain in his division: he died at York in the beginning of an expedition against the northern people, distinguished by the names of Deucaledonians and Vecturions. Constantius, before he expired, had the satisfaction to see his son Constantine, and appoint him his successor. Some think Constantine was born in Britain, of Helena, daughter of Coel, king of Colchester. But this is only conjecture.

The Britons, as long as Constantine ruled, lived in profound tranquillity. The liberty granted throughout all the Roman empire, of professing the Christian religion, was enjoyed by Britain as well as the rest of the provinces. The whole empire was now divided into four large prefectures, namely, Italy, Gaul, the East, and Illyria, in which were contained fourteen great dioceses or provinces. Britain, one of the fourteen, was subject to the prefect of Gaul, and governed by a vicarius, or deputy under him. It was divided into three provinces, namely, Britannia Prima,* containing all the country south of the Thames—the capital London: Britannia Secunda, containing all the country west of the Severn to the Irish sea, now called Wales—the capital Isca of Caerleon; and all the rest lying northward of the Thames, and eastward of the Severn, made up the third province, distinguished by the name of Maxima Cæsariensis—the capital York. This last was afterwards subdivided into two parts; the southern part retained the old name of Maxima Cæsariensis, and the other, more northward, was called Flavia Cæsariensis. But whether this subdivision was made by Constantine is uncertain. In these three provinces were twenty-eight large cities, which in time became so many bishops' seats. The lieutenant of the præfect of Gaul had four magistrates under him—two consular, and two with the title of presidents. These magistrates, with several inferior officers, managed all civil and criminal matters.

In the military department there were three general officers; the business of the first was to keep peace in the inland parts of the island, and probably of the western coasts. The second was to defend the north from the irruptions of the Picts and Scots. The third to guard the eastern and southern coasts from the frequent inroads of the Saxon pirates. Each of these generals had a certain number of troops under his command, and the three together could form a body of twenty thousand foot, and about two thousand horse.

About the end of Constantine's reign, the government of the west was conferred on Julian, then created Cesar. Shortly after his accession, the Picts and Scots made incursions into the province of Britain, and Lupicinus was despatched thither with all expedition; but the northern people appeased Julian by their submission.

During the reign of Valentinian I. the island was in a wretched condition; the Picts, Scots, Attacots, Franks, and Saxons, by accident or a common league, invaded the Roman province at once, and made great ravages. Nectaridius, count or guardian of the coasts, was defeated and slain by these new enemies; and soon after, Buchobaudes had the same fate. Severus and Jovinus were successively sent into Britain to put a stop to their ravages, but to no purpose. But Theodosius the elder routed them in several encounters, and drove them out of the Roman province, recovering all their booty, with a small part of which he rewarded his troops, restoring the rest to the owners. The barbarians being repulsed, Theodosius returned in triumph to London, and perceiving the city to have lost much of its ancient splendour, omitted nothing to restore it. As the enemy had retired beyond the two Friths, he thought it necessary for the safety of Britain to keep all the country they had abandoned. To that end, he built fortresses on the neck of land between the two seas, thus making a fifth province, which he named Valentia, in honour of Valentinian. And having thus settled matters in Britain, he returned to Rome, leaving the island under the command of the governors of each of the five provinces.

Valentinian I. had for his successors his son Valentinian II., and Gratian. Shortly after, Maximus was sent into Britain, upon the Picts recommencing hostilities. At his arrival, he formed a design to reduce the whole island under the dominion of the Romans. But the union of the two northern nations being a grand obstacle to the execution of his project, he resolved to divide them, if possible, and then attack them one after the other; designing to use the Picts to destroy the Scots, he engaged the Picts to join their forces with his, upon a promise of giving them all the lands that should be taken from the Scots, who being attacked by these two united powers, were forced to abandon their country and fly into Ireland and the adjacent isles.

After the death of Theodosius, the empire was divided between his two sons. Arcadius was emperor of the east, and Honorius of the west. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilico, by the emperor his father's order, was regent during his minority. His first care was to send a governor into Britain with a legion, to curb the insolence of the Picts, who after Theodosius's death began to make inroads into the Roman province. He made choice of Victorinus, a person of a fierce and arrogant temper, who not satisfied with confining the Picts to their country, treated them as subjects of the empire. He pretended to stretch his authority so far as to forbid them to crown their own king. This proceeding convinced the Picts of the impolicy of their assisting to drive out the Scots; and in this state of fear and uncertainty, they resolved to recal them. They therefore despatched an honourable embassy to Fergus, a prince of the blood-royal of Scotland, who had retired into Denmark, and invited him and his countrymen to return: and as a further inducement, they promised him the command of their army in the war with the Romans. Having accepted their offers, the Scots re-entered the island under the conduct of Fergus, whom they unanimously chose for their king.

As soon as Fergus II. was seated on the throne, he assembled the forces of both nations, and after taking the fortresses built by Theodosius the elder, between the two Friths, advanced to Severus's wall. The small number of troops left by the Romans in the island not being able to defend a barrier of such extent, the Picts and Scots entered the Roman province with little or no difficulty, and laid the country waste.

After Britain had submitted to the Romans, a great number of foreign families had removed thither, sprung for the most part from the veteran soldiers settled there. These families had so mixed with the natives, that they now made but one people; we shall therefore call this mixed people henceforward by the name of Britons, because the Romans and other foreigners, as well as the natives, had the same interest to defend their common country. The Britons finding themselves continually harassed by their neighbours, and despairing of assistance from Rome, resolved to elect an emperor, whose interest it should be to protect them. Their choice fell upon Marcus, an officer of great repute; but the new sovereign was quickly dethroned, and another called Gratian, chosen in his room, who met the same fate four months after his election.

Constantine, a common soldier, was next raised to the imperial dignity purely for the sake of his name, which was thought to be fortunate. Being a man of courage, and of a genius far above his former condition, he beat back the northern people, and concluded a peace with them. This success inspired him with a design to become master of the whole empire; and he therefore drew together the remains of those who could bear arms, as well Romans as islanders, and forming an army, passed into Gaul.

The Britons thus left to themselves by the departure of the Roman soldiers and the flower of their youth, were quickly reduced to great extremities. The Picts and Scots continued their ravages without opposition. This wretched state lasted some years, and the Romans being too much occupied with their own affairs, were unable to assist them. The Goths had renewed the war under the conduct of Alaric, and having taken and sacked the city of Rome, were in possession of Gaul. On the other side, the Suevi, Vandals, Cotti, and Alani, had overrun Spain. Honorius, thus beset on all sides, to free himself from the importunities of the Britons, voluntarily resigned the sovereignty of the island, and discharged the inhabitants of their allegiance to the empire. This solemn renunciation was made in the year 410, a little after Alaric's taking of Rome.

The affairs of the Romans happening afterwards to be somewhat restored under Valentinian III., by the victories of the famous Ætius over the Visigoths and Burgundians, this general, out of pity to the wretched condition of the Britons, sent them a legion commanded by Gallio of Ravenna, or as some say, by Maximian. This aid arriving unexpectedly, beat back with ease the northern nations; but the emperor having occasion for the legion, it was recalled just as the enemies were preparing to renew their devastations.

Before his departure the Roman commander warned the Britons to expect no further assistance from the emperor, who was wholly employed elsewhere against the northern nations of Europe, whose ravages extended to all parts of the empire; and advised them to inure themselves to arms, and to repair the wall of Severus, which might serve them for a barrier; offering them the assistance of his soldiers and his own direction in the work. The Britons complied with the latter part of this advice; and when they had finished the reparation of the wall, the Romans took their last farewell of Britain. The end of the Roman dominion over Britain is to be fixed at the time of this legion leaving the island, in the year 426 or 427.

THE BRITONS.

THE Picts and Scots, who lived in strict union after the coronation of Fergus, began their hostilities against the Britons with more confidence than ever, on departure of the Roman forces. The wall of Severus, lately repaired, was soon after abandoned by the Britons. About this time Fergus died, as he was returning to Ireland, leaving his young son Eugenius II. a minor, under the regency of Graham, his grandfather by his mother's side.

The weakness of the Britons was so great, that, despairing to resist their enemies, they abandoned part of their country, and retired more southward. The Picts and Scots taking advantage of this, formed new projects to drive the Britons entirely out of the island. To this end they resolved to invite colonies from Ireland and the adjacent isles, to people the lands forsaken by the Britons, as well as those they hoped to conquer from them hereafter. But Graham prevented, by his authority, the execution of this project, being fearful of the return of the Romans; and preferring a solid peace, with some real, though not great advantages, to a war which might be attended with dangerous consequences. The peace offered was gladly accepted by the Britons. By the treaty, the wall of Severus was to be the common boundary of the two nations; and for this advantage the Britons were to pay a considerable sum of money. The Scots loudly murmured at this peace, but Graham took care to have it observed during his administration.

As soon as Eugenius II. ascended the throne of Scotland, he resolved to break this treaty; and for that purpose sent ambassadors to the Britons, and haughtily demanded all the lands possessed by the Scots before the late treaty. The chief of the Britons, surprised at this unexpected demand, convened a general assembly to consider an answer. The majority of the assembly, provoked at the insolence of their neighbours, and knowing they only wanted an excuse to renew the war, were determined to reject it; arguing that the Scots would not be satisfied with their present demands—that their aim was only to have an entrance into the country, and that it would be an easier task to prevent them from entering, than to drive them out when once settled. Others knowing the extreme weakness of the nation, were of a different opinion, and were for finding some expedient to satisfy the Scots, and avoid, if possible, a war which they feared must prove fatal to the Britons. They argued that it was better for the Britons to give up freely what they could not keep, than for the sake of that to run the risk of losing all.

They were, however, overruled by the violent party; and Conan, one of the wisest and most powerful of the nation, for dwelling too long upon the advantages of peace, was deemed a traitor, and torn in pieces by them. After that none dared to oppose it; the ambassadors were sent back with an insulting answer. This hasty resolution was followed by a war more destructive to the Britons than any former one, they having lost 14 or 15,000 men in one battle. Reduced to extremity, they were obliged to give up all the country north of the Humber, of which the Picts and Scots, as waging war in common, took possession.*

The extreme weakness of the Britons will not be thought strange, if all circumstances are considered. The Romans had never suffered them to exercise their arms; it being their custom always to employ foreign troops in their conquests. For this reason the soldiers levied in Britain were sent into other provinces, from whence they never returned. These levies were so numerous, that there were twelve considerable bodies of Britons in the Roman armies dispersed in the several provinces of the empire, and always recruited from Britain. In the next place, Maximus and Constantine led such great armies from thence, as almost drained the island of men fit to bear arms. And, if to this be added the late losses sustained by the Britons after the departure of the Romans, it is no wonder they became so easy a prey to their enemies.

From this time to the coming in of the Saxons, the history of Britain is very confused. All that can be gathered with any certainty is, that the Britons elected several kings, whose actions are unknown; and who were killed or dethroned, according to the humour and interest of the leading men. Several kings reigned at the same time in different provinces, and by their discord and wars contributed to the weakening one another. And, to complete their misfortunes, Britain was afflicted with a cruel famine, which prevailed in most parts of the world. This terrible scourge rendered the country desolate, and the people starved by thousands. In this extreme distress, multitudes of poor wretches, to save their lives, fled into Armorica, where great part of Maximus's army was already settled. Others threw themselves on the Picts and Scots, who taking advantage of their misfortunes, broke the treaty, and passing the Humber, ravaged the country in a merciless manner.

In this miserable state the Britons sought once more for the Roman assistance; and sent a very moving letter to Ætius, then in Gaul. "We know not," say they, "which way to turn us. The barbarians drive us to the sea, and the sea forces us back to the barbarians; between which we have only the choice of two deaths, either to be swallowed up by the waves, or butchered by the sword." Ætius was then preparing to repulse Attila, who had entered Gaul with an army of eighty thousand men, and therefore replied, that the affairs of the empire would not suffer him to assist them. The miserable Britons, distressed still more by this answer, held a general assembly, and agreed to choose a monarch,* in the expectation that when united under one head, their divisions would cease, and their enemies be more strongly resisted. But the discord that reigned among the principal members of the state, prevented the good effects of this expedient. Several chiefs, having fortified themselves in various places, acted like sovereigns. All these petty tyrants, jealous of one another far from owning the monarch elect, sought only to destroy him, in order to be chosen in his room.

We know not the names of any of these monarchs, until Vortigern, count or king of the Dunmonij,† elected in the year 445.

The new monarch was by no means qualified to restore the affairs of the Britons. As he attained to the supreme dignity by artifice and cabal, he wholly bent his thoughts to maintain himself on the throne by the same base methods, regardless of the general welfare of his subjects. He was of a cruel and avaricious temper, addicted to many vices; and is said to have debauched his own daughter, by flattering her with hopes of being a queen. It was necessary to think of repulsing the enemies, and Vortigern felt himself incapable of such an undertaking, though he had been chosen for that very purpose. Reflecting on the fate of his predecessors, he was apprehensive he should, like them, be dethroned by his turbulent subjects when found to be incapable of answering the expectations which had raised him to the throne. Living thus in equal dread of the enemies of the state and of his own subjects, he devised an expedient to free himself from the danger of the one and plots of the other. And calling a general assembly, he described in a strong and lively manner the extreme misery of the nation: accused the Romans of being the sole cause of the misfortunes of the Britons, by draining the island of all her youth fit to bear arms, and then leaving her to the insults of her neighbours. He enlarged upon the great losses sustained since by the Britons, and the manifest danger of being either driven out of their country, or utterly destroyed, by reason of their weakness. Protested that he was ever ready to hazard his life for the service of the nation: but considering the few troops in his power, and the little union between the principal members of the state, he had no hopes that his weak endeavours would be able to rescue his subjects from their present calamities. And finally declared he saw but one way to save his country from destruction; and that was, to call in to their assistance a nation, who by their victorious arms were settled in Germany, upon the lands of the Romans; namely, the Saxons: adding, they had indeed done some injury to the Britons by their piracies, but that they were now ready to repair it by freeing them from the continual irruptions of the Picts and Scots. That being separated from Britain by a small arm of the sea only, they could be as speedy with their aid as the pressing occasion required: that they were already formidable to the northern nations; and that by their arrival the Britons would quickly be in condition to resist and chastise their enemies. He concluded with representing the proposal hardly to admit of debate; the Britons could not continue to exist without foreign aid, and none but the Saxons were in a condition to give them assistance.

The fears with which all were seized, the hopes of still enjoying their native country and recovering their lost estates, and the desire for revenge, conspired to induce the assembly to give a unanimous reception to the proposal. But when the terms to be offered to the Saxons were debated, there was a considerable dissension. Vortigern, whose secret purpose was to strengthen himself as well against his own subjects as foreign enemies, moved, the allotting them some province, that their own interest might induce them to wage war more heartily and vigorously. But as no lands could be assigned to them but what belonged to some of the assembly, it was no easy matter to agree on this point. At length, after great disputes, it was resolved that the Saxons should have the Isle of Thanet in Kent, as being a proper place to land their forces, and convenient for them whenever they wanted to return into their own country. It was further agreed, that the Saxon soldiers should be allowed pay, which should be settled by agreement on both sides. After this resolution, ambassadors were appointed to negotiate the affair in Germany. Vortigern, pleased with having carried his point without incurring suspicion, imagined himself out of the reach of all danger. But this very expedient proved the ruin of himself and the Britons.

It will be now necessary to give some account of the Saxons. They were so little known before their coming into Britain, and what is said of their original is so uncertain, that it is not surprising this subject is but very slightly touched upon by the generality of the English historians. Some barely say, the Saxons were called in to the assistance of Britain, without any farther addition concerning them. Others say only, the Saxons were a German people, without mentioning the parts they inhabited. Some again add, they were pirates from the Cimbrian Chersonesus, that came and settled on the coasts of the German ocean. But as these coasts are of a vast extent, we are not much the wiser for that. The most probable account to be gathered from the several authors is as follows.

About the time the Romans began to extend their conquests in Germany, the inhabitants of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, now called Jutland, leaving their country, advanced towards the south. They possessed themselves at first of the northern parts of Germany, and doubtless spent some years in settling themselves in those quarters. But as the Romans had not yet penetrated so far, and we have no ancient histories of the northern countries, nor even of the western, but what the Romans have left us, there is little known of the first irruptions made by the northern people into Germany. The Cimbri continually pushing their conquests to the southward, and the Romans advancing to the northward, at last approached one another. Then it was that the Romans had opportunity to learn in some measure the state of these hitherto unknown nations.

Their historians, however, speak very confusedly of them, giving sometimes different names to the same people, and sometimes the same name to different nations. The Cimbri that came from the Cimbrian Chersonesus were divided into three bands, one taking the name of Suevi, another of Franks, and a third of Saxons. Some suppose the Franks to be a branch of the Suevi. These three nations continually advancing southwards, came at length to the frontiers of the Roman empire; the Suevi towards Italy; the Franks to the south-west, towards the coast of Belgic-Gaul; and the Saxons to the west, towards the German ocean. The Suevi were so terrible to the ancient Germans, that they considered them able to contend even with their gods, as Cesar says in his Commentaries. The Franks conquered the whole province of Gaul, and founded the extensive kingdom of France.

The Saxons possessed themselves of those tracts of land lying between the Rhine and the Elbe. Their territories, bounded on the west by the German ocean, extended eastward to the borders of Thuringen: consequently they were masters of Saxony, Westphalia, and all that part of the Low-Countries lying north of the Rhine. The nations subdued by these conquerors were in time called Saxons, in like manner as the inhabitants of Gaul were named François or French, after their subjection to the Franks. But whether the Saxons were not so rapid in their conquests as the Suevi, or the course they took made it longer before they approached the Romans, it is certain they were not so soon known. The first Roman historians who mention them, at least by the name of Saxons, are Eutropius and Orosius, who inform us that Carausius (as has already been noticed) was sent to clear the seas of the piratical Franks and Saxons. From that time they became formidable to the Romans, and obliged them to keep standing forces to guard both the German and British coasts, with a general officer styled the prefect, or count of the Saxon coasts. Upon the decline of the Roman empire, after the death of Theodosius, the Saxons taking advantage of its weakness, made themselves masters of the whole country along the coast of the German ocean, and even extended their conquests as far as the isles of Zealand. Hence the Frisons, Batavians, and the neighbouring nations, were hardly known by any other name but that of the Saxons.

The Saxons had for some time been in possession of the Cimbrian Chersonesus, and when driven thence by the Goths, settled in Germany, in the parts now called Lower-Saxony. Between that country and the Chersonesus, were a people known by the name of Angles, inhabiting about Sleswick in Holstein. Probably the little country of Anglen in those parts was so named from them, or they from the country. The Angles joining with the Saxons when they came out of the Chersonesus to make conquests in Germany, became in a manner but one nation with them: though, doubtless, from the major part, they were generally called Saxons; yet they had sometimes the compound name of Anglo-Saxons given them. Great numbers of Goths mixed likewise with them to share in their conquests. These are called Wites by Bede, and are commonly known by the name of Jutes, or (which is the same) Goths. It can hardly be doubted that these three nations were united before their coming into Britain, when we consider the good understanding between them while they were employed in establishing themselves in the island.

The true etymology of the name Saxon is as difficult to be discovered as their origin. They that derive them from the Sacæ of Asia, are indeed at no great loss in this point. But the most common opinion is, that the word Saxon comes from Seax, which, in their language, signifies a kind of weapon or sword. They had two sorts, a long one worn by their side or at their back; and another shorter, serving for a bayonet or dagger. They were both in the shape of a cutlass.

In their customs and manners they very much resembled the ancient Germans, as described by Tacitus. They were naturally brave and warlike, both by land and sea. To their enemies they were severe and cruel, especially to their prisoners of war, whom they sacrificed to their gods.

Their dominions were divided into twelve governments or provinces, each of which had a chief or head accountable to the general assembly of the nation. In time of war they chose a general who commanded their armies, and was invested with almost sovereign power: but at the end of the war, his authority, like that of the Roman dictator, ceased. The centre of their empire was at Brunswick.

Their religion was the same with that of the other northern nations, and some part of Germany. The British Saxons embraced Christianity about the end of the sixth, or beginning of the seventh century. But those that remained in Germany were not converted until the ninth, by the care or rather violence of Charlemagne, by whom they were subdued. Their principal gods, before their conversion, were, the Sun, Moon, Tuisco, Woden, Thor, Friga or Fræa, and Seater. To these were consecrated the seven days of the week, as appears by the present names of these days among the Germans, Flemings, and English. Tuisco is said, by the monkish writers, to be the grandson of Japhet, and to have peopled first the north of Europe. Teutch, as the Germans call themselves, is probably derived from Tuisco. The god Thor, from whence comes the word thunder or dunder, was the same among the Saxons as Jupiter among the Romans, that is to say, the Thunderer. Woden was the god of war, and under his conduct the first Saxons came forth from their country, and made large conquests.

Their chief families considered him as their founder, and gloried in being descended from him. Probably, however, there were two of this name, that are often confounded; one more ancient, worshipped as a god, another not so old, from whom sprung the families of the Saxon leaders. There are still in England some remains of the name of Woden in those of several places, as Wansdike, Wansborough, &c. which are contractions of Wodens-dike and Wodens-borough. Fræa, the wife of Woden, was the Venus of the Saxons. She was worshipped in the shape of an hermaphrodite, as being of both sexes. Ermen-swol, the same as Mercury, was another of their gods, with others common to them with all the northern nations. This is the only account which can now be gained of the Saxons, whom the Britons, by Vortigern's advice, called in to their assistance.

The state of the British Church, from the conversion of the Britons to the coming of the Saxons.

After Christianity was established in the world, the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of kingdoms were so interwoven, that it will be necessary occasionally to add a brief account of the progress of the Christian religion in Britain.

Before the birth of our Saviour, the Britons were gross idolaters. If their own historians are to be credited, they had as many and as extravagant idols as the Egyptians themselves. Andate, the goddess of victory, was one of their principal deities. They had also gods, to whom they attributed the same powers the Greeks and Romans did to their Apollo and Diana. But the Druids never committing any of their mysteries to writing, but little is known concerning their worship and ceremonies.

Though it is difficult to know the precise time when Christianity was first introduced, yet it is generally supposed that the gospel was preached in Britain soon after our Saviour's death. The most current opinion for some time was, that Joseph of Arimathea first preached to the Britons: but this assertion is now supposed to be a fabrication of the monks.

Theodoret assures us, the Britons were converted by the apostles. Eusebius, speaking of the dangers the apostles were exposed to in propagating the gospel in the most remote countries, mentions among the rest the British Isles. The most probable time to be assigned for the conversion of the Britons, if it was in the apostles' days, is that between the victory of Claudius and the defeat of Boadicea. For at the time of the general revolt, there were in the island above 80,000 Romans, among whom very probably were some Christians; the gospel having gained footing in many places, particularly at Rome. Upon this supposition, there is no absurdity in asserting with several modern authors, that St. Paul first preached the gospel in Britain. It is certain this apostle, in the eight years between his first imprisonment at Rome and his return to Jerusalem, propagated the Christian religion in several places, especially in the western countries. He informs us of his design of going to Spain; and it is not unlikely but his desire of converting the Britons might carry him into their island. This opinion may be supported by the testimony of Venutius Fortunatus, in his poem upon the Life of St.

Martin, where he speaks of the travels of St. Paul. But these are only conjectures, and of little use but to make it credible that the gospel was planted in Britain soon after the death of Christ.

According to several authors, Lucius, a British king, having some knowledge of the christian religion, and desiring to be more fully instructed, sent two ambassadors, Elwan and Medwin, to Eleutherius, the twelfth bishop of Rome, to request that some missionaries might be sent to Britain. Eleutherius very gladly embraced the opportunity of replanting Christianity in Britain, where probably it had been rooted out by the violence of persecutions. He immediately caused the two ambassadors to be instructed, and after baptizing and consecrating them bishops, sent them back to their own country. By their means the gospel flourished again in Britain.

From the conversion of Lucius to the Dioclesian persecution, the ecclesiastical history of Britain is entirely unknown. It is probable that during that interval of eight years, the Christian religion made great progress in the island, as a multitude of British martyrs suffered during the dreadful persecution under Dioclesian and Maximinian, his colleague. Among these martyrs, St. Alban, converted at Verulam* by a priest whom he had harboured in his house, is reckoned the first. Constantius Chlorus, though inclined to favour the Christians, could not, whilst governor of Britain, dispense with the edicts of the emperors, having then the title of Cesar only, which gave him no power to oppose their laws. But as soon as he came to the empire, he put a stop to this violent persecution, and gave the Christians some respite. Under Constantine his son, the Christian religion flourished throughout the Roman empire, and more particularly in Britain.

After this the Christians multiplied exceedingly, and the island abounded with churches. Some affirm there were British bishops at the council of Nice in 325. But though this cannot be sufficiently proved, it is not at all unlikely, since eleven years before there were for certain three British bishops at the council of Arles;† as there were also some after at the council of Ariminum in 359, but so poor that their charges were borne by their brethren. Their signing at this last council the confession of faith, wherein the term consubstantial was omitted, gave occasion to some to imagine that Arianism was spread in Britain. But it appears this was the effect of intrigue, and that the faith of the British church was the same both before and after this council, which had not the effect the Arians desired.

The British church was much more justly accused of Pelagianism. Certain it is, several bishops were seduced, not by Pelagius himself, who, though a native of Britain, never returned to propagate his errors, but by Agricola, one of his disciples. The orthodox bishops perceiving the infection spread, sent to desire their brethren in Gaul to assist them in confuting this heresy. The Gaulish prelates, touched with the danger of the British church, met in council, and deputed Germanus bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus bishop of Troy, to go and assist their brethren in Britain. At Verulam, in a conference with the Pelagians, they defended the truth with such strength and evidence, that they turned many from their errors. But after their departure, the heretics gaining ground again, Germanus was desired once more to come over. Though he was now very old, he undertook a second voyage into Britain, in company with Severus bishop of Troy. Germanus despairing to convince the heretics by arguments, because of their obstinacy, caused the edict of Valentinian III., that condemned all heretics to banishment, to be put in execution against them. Before he left Britain, he erected schools, which produced afterwards many bishops famous for their learning and piety.

From this time to the arrival of the Saxons we know but little of the affairs of the British church. No doubt the frequent wars with the Picts and Scots, by destroying their churches, and by introducing a corruption of manners among the clergy as well as laity, were very prejudicial to the Christians. If we may believe Gildas and Bede, it was not so much the wars as the excessive plenty immediately after the famine that corrupted the manners of the Britons. The clergy outvying even the laity in gluttony, drunkenness, avarice, and luxury, no longer preached to their flocks the precepts of the gospel, which they themselves so little regarded.

CHAPTER II.

From the arrival of the Saxons to the retreat of the Britons into Wales. Containing about the space of one hundred and thirty years.

THE Britons, though frequent sufferers by the incursions of the Saxons, fixed their thoughts solely on that valorous nation, believing that they only could free them from their calamities. Had they had any choice, they might have considered before they called the Saxons to their aid. But they had no other course, and Vortigern strove to divert them from any considerations which might have induced them to alter their resolution. The ambassadors were sent away in haste, and the negotiation strongly recommended to their care, on the success of which entirely depended, as they imagined, the safety of their country. The dominion of the Saxons extended to the German ocean, and their conquests had been carried even into Zealand. Upon the arrival of the British ambassadors, Witigisil, leader of the Saxons, for the chief of the British embassy, is reported, by Witechind, a Saxon historian, to have delivered a speech somewhat to the following purport:—

“Illustrious and generous Saxons, the Britons, harassed and oppressed by the continual inroads of the Picts and Scots, their neighbours and enemies, sent us to you to implore your assistance. The fame of your victories has reached our ears. We are sensible your arms are irresistible, and therefore are come to sue for your protection. Britain for many years made a considerable part of the Roman empire; but our protectors having abandoned us, we know no nation more powerful than yourselves, or better able to assist us. Grant but our request, and in return we offer all that a rich and fertile country, such as ours is, can afford. Put what price you please on our protection: we shall submit to what terms you yourselves shall judge reasonable, provided by your aid we are enabled to drive the enemy out of our country."

The Saxon general returned this short answer: "Be assured the Saxons will stand by you in your pressing necessities." After some negotiation an aid was obtained of nine thousand men, on certain terms, the principal of which was, that the Saxons should be put in possession of the Isle of Thanet, and their troops paid and maintained by the Britons.

The Saxons were an enterprising nation, and by several previous descents on the eastern coasts, had proved their desire to gain a footing in the island; and, therefore, their readiness to comply with the desires of the Britons is not surprising. Hengist and Horsa, both sons of Witigisil, were appointed to command the troops designed for the aid of the Britons.

Hengist was about thirty years old. He first bore arms under his father Witigisil; after which, he served in the Roman armies, where the emperors generally kept some Saxon troops in their pay. He is universally described as a man of considerable qualifications as a warrior and conqueror. Of his brother, Horsa, no particular mention is made.

The Saxons, notwithstanding their treaty, did not send over at once so considerable a body of forces as nine thousand men, assigning as a reason, that the great distance from the place of embarkation, caused only a part to be put on board three vessels. Historians have not expressly marked the place of this first embarkation. It was most probably in Zealand, as that country was then in the possession of the Saxons, and was the nearest the Isle of Thanet, where these forces were to land.

Hengist and Horsa arrived with about 1600 followers at Ebbesfleet, in the Isle of Thanet, in the year 449. Vortigern received his new friends with extraordinary caresses, putting them immediately in possession of the Isle of Thanet, according to agreement. When they had refreshed themselves a little, he led them against the Picts and Scots, who had advanced as far as Stamford in Lincolnshire. In the first battle the islanders, according to custom, began with throwing their darts, which made but little impression on warlike troops who despised that mode of fighting. The Saxons having stood this first charge without the least motion, advanced in good order, and coming to close fight, quickly routed enemies already terrified by their very looks. The future attempts of the Picts and Scots had no better success, and in all their encounters with the Saxons, they were continually worsted. Being discouraged by these frequent defeats, they abandoned their conquests by degrees, and retired into their own country, dreading nothing so much as engaging with the Saxons.

Vortigern, to effect his main point, the winning the Saxons to his particular interest, presented the two brothers with some lands in Lincolnshire, where they gave the enemies the first repulse. But if Vortigern was pursuing his own interests, Hengist, equally politic and much more talented in his conduct, was observing the weakness of the Britons: and he resolved to take the first opportunity of procuring a settlement in Britain. The lands given him by Vortigern furnished him with the means. He desired leave to build a little fort on them; and Vortigern, anxious to please him, readily complied with his request.

The Britons seeing a castle built in the heart of their country, began to murmur against their king, and suspect him of secretly favouring the Saxons. These murmurs gave Hengist a further opportunity, who had now discovered Vortigern's private intentions. He represented to Vortigern that the rebellion of his subjects was more to be feared than the invasion of the Picts and Scots; and advised him to secure himself from the approaching storm, by sending for the rest of the Saxons, who only waited for commands. Vortigern having gladly consented; in the year 450 a second body, consisting of 5000 Saxons, arrived in sixteen large vessels, accompanied by Escus, the son, and Rowena, the daughter (or according to some historians the niece) of Hengist.

Vortigern, grown powerful, rendered himself absolute. He treated his subjects with great rigour, and confirmed their suspicions of him.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, and other monkish historians, give a number of very minute particulars of the circumstances by which Hengist influenced Vortigern, and made him and the country subservient to the Saxon love of domination. Although these narrations are little to be depended on, yet as they may give some account of the manners of, at least, the period in which they were written, and have generally some foundation, they should not be altogether discarded by the historian who desires to present some definite idea of past and distant times.

According to the above early writers, Hengist invited Vortigern to Thong-Caster, the fort he had built, and welcomed him with a sumptuous banquet: where, in order to ensnare the British king into a closer engagement, he commanded his daughter Rowena, the greatest beauty of her time, to place herself before the king. The contrivance succeeded as Hengist expected. Vortigern fixed his eyes continually on Rowena, who by her father's commands appeared not to be insensible of the honour. Hengist perceiving with joy the sudden effect of Rowena's charms, and unwilling to give the growing passion time to cool, made a sign to his daughter, who immediately went to the sideboard and filled a gold cup with wine, and presented it on her knees to the king, saying in her language, "Liever kyning, wass heil;" that is, "Lord king, your health." Vortigern, agreeably surprised, turned to his interpreter and asked what she said, and how he must answer her after the Saxon manner. Being informed, he looked very amorously on Rowena, and answered in Saxon, "Drinck heil;" that is, "Do you yourself drink the health." Whereupon, Rowena putting the cup to her lips, presented it to the king, who taking it, arose immediately and gave her a salute; and Rowena receiving it in a reverential manner, departed.

From that time Vortigern's thoughts were wholly employed how to secure the possession of Rowena. Though he had a wife, he demanded her in marriage. But Hengist, willing by difficulties to inflame the king's desires, answered, he could not, contrary to the custom of the Saxons, give his daughter to a prince already married, adding, Rowena was not entirely in his disposal; and the princes of his nation, and particularly his father, would not, perhaps, ever consent she should be married to a Christian prince, how honourable soever the alliance might be. But Vortigern, whose passion for Rowena was now highly excited, found expedients to overcome all these difficulties. He began with divorcing his wife, by whom he had several children; and promised Rowena the free exercise of her religion, and Hengist and Horsa the sovereignty of Kent, with leave to people it with Saxons. On these terms the politic Saxon delivered Rowena to the amorous monarch, and took possession of Kent, magnifying this proof of his respect and gratitude, as if the king were highly obliged to him. Such are the statements of the British writers, who have most probably exaggerated the treachery and selfishness of Vortigern to palliate the weakness and baseness of the Britons.

Whilst the Britons were venting their fruitless complaints against their monarch and the Saxons, Hengist was vigorously pursuing his projects. Though he had many troops under his command, they were not sufficient to enable him to execute his vast schemes. He represented to Vortigern, "That his subjects waited only for a favourable opportunity to depose him; and that they held intelligence with Ambrosius Aurelianus, who was at the court of Aldroen, king of Armorica, and probably had conspired to set that prince upon the throne." There was some ground for Hengist's thus artfully hinting the danger Vortigern was in from Ambrosius. That prince was of Roman extraction, and, according to the general opinion, son of one of the monarchs elected by the Britons after the departure of the Romans. As he was very young when his father died, his youth screened him from the jealousy of those that ascended the throne immediately or shortly after. But it was otherwise when Vortigern came to the crown. A strong party being formed in favour of Ambrosius, the new monarch was so filled with suspicions, that he sought means to destroy the young prince. And Ambrosius was obliged to quit Britain, and retire to Aldroen his relation, where he waited for a favourable opportunity to come and head his party.

Vortigern, despairing ever to regain the affection of his subjects, and considering Ambrosius, though absent, as a very dangerous rival, saw his whole refuge lay in the Saxon prince, whom he deemed his best friend; and accordingly to him it was he applied for advice and assistance. Hengist told him, "All the Saxons in Britain were at his devotion, but their number was too inconsiderable to protect him." Adding, "The Britons, in all likelihood, will not fail to show their discontent whilst the Saxons are in the north, and therefore he saw but one way to secure the king from their plots, which was to send for more Saxons to be commanded by trusty leaders, who would implicitly follow his orders."

Hengist having obtained the king's consent, sent for a fleet of forty ships, conducted by Octa, his brother, who brought with him his son Ebusa, and a great number of Saxon troops. These new comers began with ravaging the Orcades, then making a descent on the coasts of the Picts, they obliged the inhabitants to retire northwards. As soon as the Picts had thus deserted part of their country, the Saxons seated themselves there so strongly, that it was not possible to dispossess them. At first they settled on the north side of the Tyne towards the east; afterwards they advanced towards the south, and drove the Britons beyond the Humber; but this was done by degrees. This third body of Saxons arrived in 452, three years after the first. With these fresh supplies, Hengist found himself strong enough to be in no great fear of any attempt from the Britons. He began to show less respect for Vortigern, and under colour of wanting frequent recruits to keep up the number of his forces, sent for continual supplies from Germany, without asking his permission. At length he threw away the mask, and making bitter complaints that the Saxons were not duly paid according to agreement, demanded the arrears, threatening, without prompt and full payment, to do himself justice.

The Britons, surprised at these menaces, and greatly alarmed to see Hengist in a condition to do as he arrogantly threatened, began to rouse themselves, and consider means to free themselves from these foreigners. Vortimer, eldest son of Vortigern, had beheld hitherto with extreme regret, that the Saxons, by his father's fault, daily strengthened themselves, and he had always dreaded the consequences. As soon, therefore, as he saw the Britons in commotion, he improved the opportunity, and represented to the leading men that it was time to apply an effectual remedy to the evils they lay under. He told them, his father's cowardice, or perhaps treachery, had been the occasion of the Saxons becoming so powerful; that it was necessary therefore to prevent Vortigern from heaping any more favours on these foreigners, to the prejudice of the British nation, which was in danger of being overrun, if measures were not taken to put a stop to their growing power. The Britons, convinced by these reasons, awoke at last out of their lethargy, and by Vortimer's instigations, the most powerful of them having entered into a private confederacy, of which Vortigern had not the least notice, suddenly compelled him to make his son partner with him in the government, and to leave the administration of affairs to his care. The plot was so well laid, that in an instant Vortigern found himself without either fortress, troops, or credit, and constrained to do whatever was desired, he not having time to call the Saxons to his aid. Thus Vortimer was invested with the whole royal authority, leaving his father only the empty title of king without any power.

The new monarch found no great difficulty to persuade the Britons, that nothing but force could drive the Saxons out of their country. War therefore being resolved, the Britons made preparations to rid themselves of their guests, whom they looked upon as their mortal enemies. Hengist, on his part, finding he was likely to have a fierce war upon his hands, made haste and concluded a peace with the Picts, who were proud of having for allies men so formidable for their arms. This precaution enabled him to make a powerful diversion in the north by the help of the Picts, assisted by the Saxons lately settled in those parts. And in Kent, Hengist considered himself strong enough to make head against Vortimer, who was preparing to attack him there.

The Britons and Saxons were not long before they came to an engagement. In the first campaign, the two armies met at Eglesford in Kent, the Saxons being commanded by Hengist and Horsa, and the Britons by Vortimer. The first battle, according to the historians, was very bloody. Hengist lost Horsa, his brother, and with his own hand slew Catigern, youngest brother of Vortimer. If we may believe the British historians, Vortimer not only obtained a complete victory over the Saxons, but driving Hengist as far as the Isle of Thanet, compelled him to em-mark and fly into Germany. But by what followed after this battle, it is evident, if the Saxons were not victorious, at least they were not vanquished, since all their historians unanimously affirm, that this very year 455, immediately after the battle, Hengist first took upon him the title of king of Kent.

Two years after, another battle was fought near Crecanford in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated, with the loss of more than 4000 men and his best officers. Not being able to keep the field, he was compelled to shut himself up in London, till he could draw another army together. In the meanwhile Hengist, to strike the greater terror into the Britons, ravaged the country in a merciless manner. Those who were most exposed to the fury of the Saxons, quitted their houses, and fled to the woods for refuge. Some abandoned their country, and retired into Armorica, where they were civilly received by King Aldroen. During these devastations, the very churches were not spared, but all that were in the neighbourhood of the Saxons were reduced to ashes. These barbarous Pagans, joining to their natural fierceness a religious zeal, thought they honoured their gods, by inhumanly treating the Christians, especially the ecclesiastics, who were most cruelly persecuted.

The Britons being reduced to this extremity, their chiefs assembled themselves to consider of means to prevent their total ruin. Guithelin, archbishop of London, and head of Ambrosius's party, advised them to apply to the King of Armorica for assistance. And since Vortigern and Vortimer were no longer to be depended upon, he advised them to invite over Ambrosius Aurelianus. As they had always hated Vortigern, and, since his last defeat were dissatisfied with Vortimer, the common though unjust fate of vanquished generals, they readily embraced the archbishop's advice, and desired him to go himself and negotiate the affair; which he gladly undertook, and induced Aldroen, who had so generously received all the fugitive Britons, to grant an aid of 10,000 men. He placed Ambrosius at their head, who conducted them safe to Totness. This general was received with great demonstrations of joy, being looked upon as the only support of the sinking Britons. But this joy was not universal: Vortimer's party, still powerful, considered Ambrosius as one come to usurp the crown, under colour of defending it. And Vortimer himself threatened to punish severely those that should join him. Thus the miserable Britons, always a prey to intestine divisions, instead of uniting against the common enemy, prepared to destroy one another.

The first battle was fought near Catgwaloph in Carmarthenshire. As it is difficult from the confused account of historians, to know on which side victory inclined in this and several other engagements, it can only be said that the civil war lasted till the year 465, to the great weakening of the Britons, whilst the Saxons had time to strengthen themselves both in Kent and beyond the Humber. To so wretched a state were the Britons at last reduced, that numbers of them, harassed on the one side by the civil war, and on the other by the Saxons, abandoned their native country, where they could no longer subsist.

A Dutch writer informs us, that some of those unfortunate wretches going on board a galley, and rowing toward the mouth of the Rhine, landed at Catwick near Leyden, where they settled by the sea-side in an old Roman camp, to which they gave the name of Brittenburge.

Thus Britain for seven or eight years suffered all the calamities of a civil war. At length the wisest of both parties, considering their dissension would be the cause of their common ruin, made up the breach by parting the kingdom between the contending princes. The two British kings had the eastern, and Ambrosius the western part, divided from one another by the Roman highway, called afterwards Watling-street.* From hence may be dated the beginning of the reign of Ambrosius.

The Saxons upon the union of the two parties, joined their forces also. In the first engagement, Hengist lost Wipped, one of his principal officers, from whom the field of battle was called Wipped's-fleet.† Here the British and Saxon historians, according to custom, give us contradictory accounts. The last say, their countrymen obtained that day a signal victory. Whereas, the others affirm, that Vortimer, who commanded the army, routed the Saxons, and compelled Hengist a second time to fly into Germany. But it appears by what followed, that the advantage was on the side of the Saxons. We will even venture to say, contrary to the opinion of some noted historians, that in all probability Hengist never returned to Germany. Not so much as one author marks either the time or place of his second landing, though they were no less necessary to be observed than those of his first.

In this war it was, that the famous Arthur, at fourteen years of age, made his first appearance in the British armies, under Ambrosius. He succeeded Gorlous, his father, in the kingdom of Danmonium,‡ in 467. He was no sooner on the throne, but he had a war to maintain against Howel, king of Areclute,§ in the neighbourhood of Scotland. This prince is said, out of envy to the glory Arthur had acquired, to have entered into an alliance against him with the Saxons. But instead of lessening his reputation, he served to increase it considerably. Arthur beating him back to the Isle of Mona, gave him battle, and slew him with his own hand. He gained this victory in 470, being then about eighteen years old. We shall see him hereafter signalizing himself by actions more glorious, as well as more beneficial to his country.

The war continuing between the two nations, a battle lost by the Britons in 473, put their affairs in extreme disorder, and gave the Saxon prince an opportunity of enlarging his territories. At length Vortimer, the principal promoter of the war, died in 475, poisoned, as some say, by Rowena, his mother-in-law, through the suggestion of (Hence the many Strettons, i. e. towns on those streets.) There were four in England, Watling-street, Ikenild street, Ermin-street, and Foss-way. Two of these ways extended across the breadth of the kingdom, the other two through the length of it. The tracts of these four ways are, and have been, for many ages, very obscure; and it is not yet sufficiently cleared, where any one of them distinctly went.

Hengist. The British historians endeavour to make a hero of Vortimer, by attributing to him many signal victories over the Saxons. But the growth of these last in power and dominion, notwithstanding their pretended defeats, is a clear evidence, that the advantages of Vortimer were neither considerable, nor even real. His death brought some quiet to Britain, if a deceitful calm, that proved the ruin of the Britons, may be so called.

After a twenty years' war, both sides began to show an inclination for peace, which Vortimer had always strenuously opposed, fearing when the war was over with the Saxons, he should be obliged to begin another with Ambrosius, who had the hearts of the people, and could hardly bear to see Vortigern and his son on the throne, though deprived of half their dominions. The peace was concluded, on condition each party should keep what he possessed. Hengist, who had entertained hopes of conquering all Britain, was not a little concerned to find himself so much disappointed. He determined, however, to effect by policy what he could not effect by force.

The British writers, on whose statements, as before mentioned, little reliance is to be placed, accuse Hengist of massacring at a feast 300 of the principal Britons. Vortigern, they say, was only held captive, as Hengist had need of him. He could not obtain his liberty without delivering up to the Saxons a great tract of land bordering upon Kent, with which Hengist enlarged his narrow territories. This was afterwards divided into three provinces, called by the Saxons, Sussex, Essex, and Middlesex, which names they retain to this day. Moreover, not content with this acquisition, Hengist ravaged the neighbouring country in a merciless manner, and became master of London, Lincoln, and Winchester.

The indignation of the Britons at this barbarous action was so great, that they could not look upon a Saxon without horror. And Vortigern, as he had given his subjects, more than once, cause to think him a friend to the Saxons, was reckoned an accomplice in the massacre, since he alone was spared. They therefore all deserted him, and acknowledged Ambrosius for their sovereign.

Ambrosius, as soon as he was sole monarch of the Britons, assumed the imperial purple, after the manner of the Roman emperors, creating at the same time prince Arthur, who had signalized himself in the war by many brave actions, a patrician. Could Britain have been saved, it would doubtless have been so by these two princes, who had many of the qualities of heroes in an eminent degree. But it was destined to undergo an extraordinary revolution, and become a prey to the Saxons. All that Ambrosius and Arthur could do, was to postpone its ruin.

Meanwhile, Hengist was not a little perplexed to see his country dispeopled; and he resolved to send for Ælla, a Saxon general, from Germany, promising him part of the territories granted by Vortigern. Ælla received the offer with joy, and shortly after arrived in Britain, with his sons, Baldulphus, Colgrin, and Cissa an infant. He landed his troops at Whitering, in Sussex, but not without opposition. The inhabitants of the country rising to prevent his entrance, he became not master of the shore till after a long battle. At length he drove the Britons as far as the forest of Andredswald, at that time sixty-five miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The retreat of the Britons gave the Saxons an opportunity to settle by degrees along the coast and towards the Thames. During the nine years they were employed in extending their conquests in those parts, they had continual wars with the Britons, the particulars of which are unknown. We are only told that the Saxons, settled along the southern coast, were called Sud or South Saxons, and their country Sussex. Hengist took care to strengthen himself, in the best manner he could, in the rest of the country given him, and planted colonies of his own countrymen. Those that were seated to the east were called East Saxons, and their country, Essex. The country between Essex and Sussex was termed Middlesex. As for Kent, it retained its ancient name, the only one perhaps the Saxons did not alter.

Hengist having thus settled matters, gave those soldiers, that desired it, leave to return into Germany. At their arrival on the continent, they built the castle of Leyden, which is ascribed to Hengist himself by a Dutch poet, as well as by several others, who were of opinion that he went back into Germany.

The Britons were not then in a condition to think of recovering the provinces usurped by the Saxons. Without any previous truce or treaty of peace, both sides lay quiet for nine years. Hengist, no less than the Britons, had need of some respite, to put the affairs of his kingdom in order. During this interval, Ælla gained ground, the Britons not daring to oppose him, for fear of giving Hengist a pretence to renew the war, which it was their design to avoid.

The Britons having had time to recover their strength, began to solicit Ambrosius to take up arms. Ambrosius told them, he had but one of two ways to take, "either to let the Saxons remain in quiet till Vortigern's death, or to rid themselves of that domestic enemy, and unite their forces against the foreigners." Such was the hatred of the generality of the Britons against Vortigern, that they resolved immediately upon the latter of the two methods, and with one consent, prepared to put their resolution in practice with all possible secrecy and expedition. Vortigern so little expected to be attacked, that he was likely to have fallen into the hands of Ambrosius. He had but just time to throw himself into a castle in Wales, where he was not very secure. Ambrosius willing to complete his work, instantly went and besieged him, being resolved not to let him escape. During the siege, the castle, whether by accident, or the engines of the besiegers, taking fire, was burnt to ashes, and the unfortunate Vortigern perished in the flames. Such was the end of that prince, advanced to a great age, after a troublesome reign of forty years. He had, besides a daughter, three sons by his first wife, Vortimer, Catigern, slain in a battle with the Saxons, and Pascentius, of whom we shall speak hereafter.

Ambrosius being thus rid of a very formidable rival, renewed the war against the Saxons, which had been interrupted by the weakness of both parties, and the divisions of the Britons. The particulars of this war, after its renewal, are very imperfectly known. Historians relate but one remarkable event, namely, the signal victory obtained by Ambrosius, in the year 487, over Ælla and his two eldest sons. This is properly the first victory the Britons could indisputably boast of, whatever their historians say to the contrary.

This defeat obliged the Saxon general to retire to his strong holds, in expectation of fresh supplies from Germany.

Hengist lived not to see the end of this war. He died in 488, aged about sixty-nine, of which he had passed thirty-nine in Britain, and thirty-three on the throne of Kent. He cannot be denied to have been one of the bravest and most prudent generals of his time. Besides Kent, given him by Vortigern, and considerably enlarged by the acquisition of Essex and Middlesex, he was in possession of some lands in Lincolnshire, where he built Thong Castor. The Saxons beyond the Humber acknowledged him for their sovereign. He left two sons, Escus, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Kent, and Andoacer, who staid in Germany.

After the defeat of Ælla, about a year before the death of Hengist, Escus had sent him into the north, to assist Octa and Ebusa against the Britons. But as soon as he had notice of his father's death, he hastened to Kent to take possession of the kingdom. In the mean time Ambrosius, improving his victory, retook London, Winchester, and Lincoln, seized by the Saxons, after the massacre of the British nobles. Escus, wanting the qualities of his father, never endeavoured to recover these places, but preferred his ease before the fatigues of war. In all probability he obtained a truce, since in the three following years there is no mention of any hostilities on either side.

During this calm, Arthur, who had all along assisted Ambrosius, finding his presence was not absolutely necessary in his own country, made a voyage to Jerusalem. Ambrosius, in the meanwhile, by the assistance of Samson, bishop of Dol, whom he had sent for from Armorica, and made archbishop of York, regulated the affairs of the church, that were in extreme disorder by reason of the foregoing wars.

The truce or discontinuance of the war lasted but three years. The Northumbrian Saxons beginning to stir in 491, Arthur, who had returned from his voyage, marched against and defeated them. At the same time Ælla, having received a strong reinforcement from Germany, went and besieged Andred-Cester, situated in the forest of Andred's Wald. The resistance of the besieged, and an army of the enemy posted on an advantageous ground, made him lose a great deal of time. But at length, after a vigorous defence, the town was carried by storm, and entirely destroyed. Immediately after this, Ælla assumed the title of king of Sussex or of the South Saxons, which he durst not do while Hengist was alive. This second Saxon kingdom contained the present counties of Sussex and Surrey. Ælla was also elected monarch or general of the Saxons in the room of Hengist. For it must be observed, although Hengist was only king of Kent, yet was he considered also as head of all the Saxons, according to the custom of that nation in Germany, where, in time of war, they had always their general-in-chief, accountable only to the states. This same custom the Saxons continued in Britain, and always elected a general, whom some writers style monarch, because, as we shall see hereafter, he was head over several kings. In all appearance, Hengist's son thought himself incapable to discharge this high office, since he suffered Ælla to be invested with it.

About two years after, Arthur defeated the Northumbrian Saxons again, on the banks of the river Dugles, where he had routed them three years before.

The year 495 was very remarkable for the arrival of Cerdic, a Saxon general, not only upon the account of his conquests, but chiefly because from him the kings of England are descended, in the male line, down to Edward the Confessor, and in the female, down to the prince who now sits on the throne. If we trace him higher, we find, by the Saxon annals, that he sprang from Woden, the root of all the principal families of the Saxons. This warlike prince having acquired great reputation in Germany, and finding no further employment there, resolved to seek his fortune in Britain, where he knew many families of his nation had already established themselves. To that purpose he equipped five vessels, and taking his son Cenric, advanced to man's estate, with him, now sailed for Britain.

Ælla, as has been said, brought with him three sons, Baldulph, Colgrin, and Cissa, who was very young; and the two eldest treading in their father's steps, bravely assisted him. They are called by some Cismenius and Plentigus. Octa, commander of the Saxons in the north, having been frequently defeated by Arthur, and perceiving himself too weak to guard all his conquests, had divided them into two parts, of which the southern was called Deira, and the northern Bernicia. He had committed the care of the first to Baldulphus and Colgrin, reserving Bernicia to himself, to defend it against the continual attacks of the northern nations. Colgrin, after the last defeat of the Northumbrians by Arthur, had shut himself up in York, where Arthur immediately went and besieged him. Nevertheless Baldulphus, having been informed of Cerdic's design of coming to Britain, was gone into Norfolk to expect his arrival, and favour his landing. But Cerdic's arrival being delayed by some accident, Baldulphus marched back towards York, with intent to relieve it. He was met upon the way by Cador, nephew to Arthur, who defeated him, and dispersed his army in such a manner, that he was forced to make his escape alone, disguised like a peasant. In that dress he safely reached the walls of York, and making himself known, was drawn up with a rope. The news he brought of Cerdic's being about to arrive from Germany with powerful supplies, instilling new life into the besieged, they continued to make a vigorous defence. Arthur pushed the siege briskly, in expectation of taking the town before the arrival of the Saxon prince. All this while Cador was in Norfolk, ready to oppose the landing of the Saxons. But before Arthur had made any considerable progress in the siege, he received the bad news of Cerdic's landing at Yarmouth, and beating the forces sent against him. Upon this he raised the siege, and retired to a place of security, till he could learn the exact number of the Saxons, which report had exceedingly multiplied. Baldulph and Colgrin marching out of York, committed great devastations in Lancashire, whilst the Britons were dismayed and terrified at the arrival of Cerdic. So great was their terror, that Arthur thought fit to keep at a distance from the Saxons for some time, for fear of not being able to inspire his troops with resolution enough to look these formidable enemies in the face. But this was not all that followed upon the arrival of Cerdic.

Pascentius, son of Vortigern, having long concealed his secret disgust at not having any of his father's dominions assigned him, laid hold of this juncture to obtain what he thought his due. With the assistance of those that, like him, were displeased with the advancement of Ambrosius, he drew some forces together, and being joined by Baldulph and Colgrin, was reinforced by many of his friends in Wales. Ambrosius being grown sick and old, Arthur marched against him, gave him battle, and entirely routed him near the little river Dugles.

The next year, Arthur in the same place gained another victory, and so warmly pursued the British Prince, that he forced him to submit and sue for pardon. Pascentius gained more by his submission than by his arms. For besides his pardon, it procured him the possession of Brecknock and Radnor in Wales, which being erected into a kingdom, his posterity enjoyed it for many years. It is probable his father Vortigern's private demesnes lay in those parts, and that Ambrosius did but give him the lands belonging to his family before Vortigern was king. If he invested him with sovereignty, it was only to make him some compensation for his claim to the crown of Britain.

About this time the Saxons in the north conquered the little kingdom of Galway, so called from Galvan, nephew of Arthur. This country, now part of Scotland, had remained in the hands of the Britons, and withstood the continual attacks, as well of the Saxons as Picts. Galvan having lost his dominions, retired to his uncle Arthur, to whom he was very serviceable in his wars.

Shortly after, Porta landed at Portland, so called from him, with fresh supplies of Saxons. This, being at a time when the Saxons began to be superior, obliged Arthur to quit the field and retire to London. Though he had generally the better of the Saxons in all their encounters, yet his troops were considerably diminished; whereas the enemy's forces were continually increasing by fresh recruits from Germany: great numbers, under the conduct of famous leaders, coming over to Britain, in order to procure a settlement, or for the sake of plunder only. Arthur, who had not the same supplies, would have been reduced to extremity, without the assistance of Hoel, king of Armorica, his nephew. This young prince, eager for glory, and glad of an occasion to signalize himself in the service of his uncle, put himself at the head of 15,000 men, and landed at Southampton. With this aid, Arthur immediately attacked the Northumbrians, grown formidable by the valour of Baldulph and Colgrin, their leaders, and meeting them in Deira, obtained a complete victory over them. The two Saxon brothers not being in condition to withstand him after their defeat, had no other course to take, but with the remains of their army to join Cerdic, then besieging Lincoln. But Arthur, fearing the loss of that place, followed them with speed, and surprised Cerdic in so sudden a manner, that not being able to continue the siege, or raise it, without danger, he was constrained to hazard a battle, which proved fatal to the Saxons. Cerdic being defeated, was forced to betake himself to the forest of Celidon, where, having suffered great hardships, he at length found means, though with great difficulty, to retire towards the western coasts. Some historians assure us, that seeing he must inevitably perish if he staid in a place where he could neither have provisions, nor hope for assistance, he bound himself by a treaty with Arthur to return into Germany with the remains of his troops. They add, that being embarked with intent to perform his promise, he altered his mind at sea, and came and landed at Toston, in the west. However this may be, Cerdic certainly remained in the island, and lay quiet for some time, having lost in the battle above 6000 men.

After Cerdic's defeat, all the Saxons were equally interested in opposing the progress of Arthur, who, like an able general, wisely improved his victories to the utmost. The dread he struck them with, made them resolve to unite all their forces, and endeavour to retrieve their affairs. They were sensible that by dispersing their forces in several parts, they endangered in one place what they had got in another, which was not the way to procure a lasting settlement; wherefore, Escus, king of Kent, Ælla, king of Sussex, Cerdic, Porta, and the Northern Saxons assembled their troops, and conferred the command in chief on Cerdic. The infirmities and old age of Ælla, who had been monarch ever since 492, were probably the cause of his not heading the army at this time. Cerdic having divided his troops into two bodies, gave the command of the least to Baldulph and Colgrin, and headed the other himself, with his son Cenric. While the Saxons were employed in making preparations, the Britons were exerting their utmost to raise an army capable of withstanding such powerful enemies. On this pressing occasion, those that could bear arms enlisted themselves in crowds under their generals. Ambrosius, called here by historians Nazaleod, though very old, put himself at the head of his army, and detaching Arthur to follow Baldulph and Colgrin, who were marching towards the west, resolved to go in quest of Cerdic. Arthur, everywhere victorious, coming to an engagement with the Saxon brothers in Cornwall, obtained a signal victory over them.

Ambrosius advanced towards Cerdic, who had no thought of retiring. The two armies being engaged, Ambrosius broke through the right wing of the Saxons, commanded by Cerdic, and put them to the rout. But whilst eagerly pursuing his victory against a body that made but a faint resistance, Cenric had the same advantage over the right wing of the Britons, which he more wisely improved. Instead of losing time in pursuing the runaways, he fell upon Ambrosius in the flank, and put him in irreparable disorder. By this prudent conduct he gave Cerdic time to rally his troops, and complete the victory by an entire defeat of the Britons.

Ambrosius, in spite of age and infirmities, threw himself among his enemies in order to animate his troops by his example. But all his efforts served only to crown his life with an honourable death. The fall of Ambrosius caused a universal rout among the Britons, who precipitately abandoned the field of battle to their enemies. The success of that day was, by the public acknowledgment of his father, attributed to Cenric. This battle was fought in 508, near a place called by the Saxons, Cerdic's Ford.*

Arthur was elected monarch in the room of Ambrosius. After his coronation at Caerleon, which he had retaken from the Saxons, he marched against the Northumbrians, and defeated them on the banks of the little River Ribroyt, that runs through Lancashire. This is reckoned his tenth victory over the Saxons.

Cerdic having received fresh supplies from the Saxon princes in Britain, as well as from Germany, laid siege to Bath. Baldulph and Colgrin having joined him also, with what troops they could draw together, his army was remarkably strong. Arthur gave him battle. It lasted from noon till night, without any visible advantage to either side. Both armies kept the field, waiting for the day, to renew the fight. The Saxons, during the night, posted themselves on a little hill, called Bannesdown, which was of great importance, though it had been neglected by both sides the day before. As soon as it was light, Arthur, perceiving the advantage the Saxons had gained by seizing that post, was resolved to dislodge them, which he effected after a long and obstinate fight, and at last entirely routed them. The Britons gained, on this occasion, a most complete victory. Baldulph and Colgrin were both slain, and Cerdic, with the remains of his army, retired to an inaccessible post.

An unexpected event prevented Arthur from improving his victory. The Picts, who were in alliance with the Saxons, knowing Arthur to be at a distance, and his nephew Hoel sick at Arcute, resolved to besiege that town, in expectation of taking it before it could be relieved. But Arthur, instead of pursuing his advantage upon Cerdic, flew to the assistance of the king of Armorica, and compelled the Picts to raise the siege, and in revenge ravaged their country from one end to the other, and would have entirely destroyed it, had not the bishops, by their intercession, diverted him from his purpose.

Escus, king of Kent, died in 512, memorable only for leaving his name to all his successors, kings of Kent, who from him were called Escingians. He was succeeded by his son Octa.

Two years after died Ælla, king of Sussex, and monarch of the Saxons, having enlarged his narrow territories at the expense of the Britons, during a reign of twenty-three years. His son Cissa succeeded him in the kingdom of Sussex; but the monarchy of the Saxons was conferred on Cerdic.

Cerdic, in 514, received a supply of adherents from Germany, under the conduct of Stuff and Withgar, his nephews. With this aid, after a variety of contests, he compelled Arthur, in the year 519, to conclude a disadvantageous peace, and to surrender to the Saxons that tract of land which now comprises Hampshire and Somersetshire; of which he formed the kingdom of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, so called because it lay west of Kent and Sussex. Cerdic was crowned at Winchester, twenty-three years after his arrival in Britain, having by his valour and perseverance procured himself a settlement in the island, as well as his countrymen Hengist and Ælla.

Arthur, during the peace, rebuilt some of the churches which had been destroyed in the preceding wars, and repaired, as much as possible, the damages religion had sustained.

From the time Hengist had peopled Essex and Middlesex with Saxons and Jutes, they had been governed by a deputy under the king of Kent. But in 527 Erchenwin assumed the title of king of Essex, or of the East-Saxons. This kingdom lying eastward of the other three, contained the two counties of Essex and Middlesex, of which London was the capital. Who Erchenwin was, how long he had been in Britain, and what right he had to this new kingdom, historians have not informed us. It is supposed that he was governor under Octa, king of Kent, and taking advantage of his weakness, engaged the people to acknowledge him for their king.

About this time multitudes of Angles under the conduct of twelve chiefs, all of equal authority, but whose names, except Uffa, are unknown, landed at some port on the eastern coast of Britain, where, without much difficulty, they possessed themselves of some post; those parts being ill guarded by the Britons. In time, as they were continually enlarging their conquests towards the west, they compelled the Britons to abandon the country along the eastern shore. The Angles, thus situated, had an opportunity of sending from time to time for fresh colonies from Germany, with which they founded a fifth kingdom, by the name of the kingdom of East-Anglia, or of the East-Angles. But as their first chiefs assumed not the title of king, the beginning of this kingdom is generally brought down to the year 571.

During the eight years peace between Arthur and Cerdic, Hoel, the king of Armorica, being disturbed by the rebellion of Frollon, Arthur went over to Armorica, and slew Frollon with his own hand in the first battle they fought.

Cerdic, taking advantage of Arthur's absence, and of the Angles, broke the peace, and made some further conquests. He was constantly attended by his son Cenric, who bravely seconded him in all his undertakings, and by his valour and conduct caused him to gain a signal victory in Buckinghamshire, at a place called Cerdic's Lega, now Cherdley.

Arthur, at his return, perceiving himself unable to renew the war with his enemies, whose number was continually increasing, made a new treaty with Cerdic, and returning to Armorica to assist Hoel in repelling the Wisigoths, left Modred his nephew, whom he designed for his successor regent in his absence, at the same time intrusting him with the care of the queen, his third wife.

Cerdic, taking advantage of his absence, subdued the Isle of Wight, destroying nearly all the inhabitants; and Modred having seduced the queen, and publicly married her, determined to seize the crown. To support his usurpation, he ceded to Cerdic part of Danmonium, or Cornwall, the present counties of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire; which, with Hampshire and Somersetshire, rendered Cerdic's kingdom much larger than the three other Saxon kingdoms. Having thus in some measure secured himself, Modred was crowned at London; those who privately abhorred his treacherous conduct not daring to oppose it, for fear of being oppressed.

Cerdic, having much enlarged his dominions, and most of his subjects being Britons, on whose loyalty he could not rely, induced a great many Saxons and Jutes to settle in his new dominions. Above 800 vessels are said to have arrived freighted with families, who were joyfully received and planted in habitations, whence Cerdic drove such Britons as he suspected, especially upon the frontiers. Britain was thus filled by degrees with new inhabitants, and the natives began to lose the superiority in number they had hitherto had over the foreigners.

Cerdic having lately gained so many new subjects, was crowned a second time at Winchester, the metropolis of his dominions, by the same title of king of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, that he had before assumed. This kingdom was very advantageously situated, being bounded on the north, by the Thames; on the west, by the Severn; on the south, by the sea; and on the east, by the kingdom of Sussex. The Britons, who were still in possession of the greatest part of Danmonium, were rendered less formidable than ever to Cerdic, by being divided from the rest of their nation by this new kingdom and the Severn.

In the year 534 Cerdic died, sixteen years after his first coronation, and thirty-nine after his arrival in Britain. Cenric, his son, the faithful companion of his labours, succeeded him, both in the kingdom of Wessex, and also in the monarchy or generalship of the Saxons and Angles. Cerdic's successors were surnamed Gewishians, from Gewish, one of their ancestors, famous no doubt in his generation.

In the same year died Octa king of Kent, after a reign of twenty-two years, wherein nothing remarkable occurred but the dismembering of the kingdom of Essex, which he, for some unknown reason, did not think fit to oppose. He was succeeded by his son Hermenrick.

Arthur, after four years' absence, returned from Armorica. Modred was in possession of his throne, and, moreover, in strict alliance with the Saxons. But Arthur, though broken with age, and almost destitute of adherents, resolved to undertake the recovery of his kingdom, and to punish the treacherous Modred. And though his troops were much inferior to those of his enemy, he found means to engage him in a very disadvantageous post, and obtained a signal victory. In this action he lost Galvan and Angusel, two princes of his blood, who had faithfully served him both in prosperity and adversity.

As the particulars of this war are confusedly delivered, and besides contain nothing material, it will suffice to relate the issue. Modred, though constantly worsted, found means to prolong the war seven years, without Arthur's being able to destroy him, much less wrest out of the hands of the Saxons, what had been surrendered to them. During this war there happened two eclipses of the sun, which credulous historians have expressly remarked, fancying they were pre-ages of the utter ruin of the Britons, which was effected soon after.

Arthur, pursuing his enemy from place to place, drove him to the extremity of Danmonium, where he could not avoid fighting: And the last battle was fought near Camelford. It proved fatal to the two leaders, as well as to all the Britons, who having lost their best troops, were never after able to stand against the Saxons. During this bloody battle, the uncle and nephew are said to have rushed upon one another furiously. Modred was slain on the spot, and Arthur, mortally wounded, was carried to Glastonbury, where he died, aged ninety years, seventy-six of which he had spent in the continual exercise of arms: he had reigned only thirty-four years, but before he mounted the throne, had long commanded the British armies under Ambrosius. Some have made an interval of several years between Ambrosius and Arthur, because they were at a loss where to place their Uther Pendragon, whom they consider to be a king different from Arthur. But the best authors are of opinion, that the name Uther, signifying in British a club, was given to the great Arthur, for the same reason that Charlemagne's grandfather was called martel, or hammer. As to the surname of Pendragon, it owes its origin, as it is supposed, to Arthur's wearing a dragon on the crest of his helmet.

He is said to have instituted the order of the knights of the round table, so famous in romances. Though this institution has given occasion for many fabulous relations, it is not therefore to be deemed altogether chimerical. For where is the improbability that Arthur should institute an order of knighthood in Britain, when we learn from the letters of Cassiodorus, that Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, instituted one in Italy in the same century.

Such was the love and esteem of the Britons for this hero, that many would never believe he was dead. It is this perhaps that gave occasion to some writers, desirous of pleasing the Britons, to invent Arthur's travels and numberless victories in foreign countries. These pretended voyages and imaginary conquests have proved an inexhaustible fountain of absurdities; and his history has been so disfigured, as to cause many to doubt, whether there ever was such a king as Arthur. The events of his life and reign are so confounded by these fabulous writers, that they are very difficult to be cleared, and therefore recourse must be had to much conjecture. He was born at Tindagol, in Cornwall, in 452, or 453, and died in 542. He was buried in the monastery at Glastonbury, by Gueniver his second wife. He had two others of the same name, the first died in the country of the Picts, and the third proved false to him. By this last he had a son called Noem, who died an infant. Arthur, when he was about to expire, sent his crown to Constantine his cousin, son of Cadur, and grandson of Ambrosius, declaring him his successor; which must be understood only of Danmonium, for the monarchy of Britain was extinct by his death. It is pretended that his body was found whole and entire in Glastonbury monastery in the reign of Henry II., with the visible marks of ten wounds, one whereof only seemed mortal. What is said of his stature is absurdly fabulous, namely, that the distance between his eye-brows was a span, and the rest of his body in proportion. We have the particular names of his arms in the ancient romances. His shield was called Pridwin, his lance Ron, and his sword Caliburn. This last was presented in 1191 to Tancred, king of Sicily, by Richard I. of England.

After Arthur's death the Britons were unable to resist the Saxons. Whatever loss the Saxons sustained, was soon retrieved by supplies from Germany: but the Britons, being destitute of foreign aid, were drained by the incessant wars they had maintained since the departure of the Romans. And such numbers retired to Armorica, that by their junction with the British long before settled there, they became more numerous at last than the natives. And it is asserted, that this province of Gaul, took henceforth the name of Bretagne from the great number of Britons that fled thither.

Ida, an Angle, having embarked on board forty vessels a great number of families of his countrymen, landed at Flamborough in Yorkshire, then in possession of the Northumbrian Saxons who received them as friends. The Northum-brians, so called from inhabiting north of the Humber, had maintained themselves in that country ever since the time of Hengist, and had all along been in some dependence on the kings of Kent. They had often favoured the enterprises of their countrymen in the southern parts, by frequent diversions, which had several times drawn into the north the arms of Ambrosius and Arthur: but though frequently defeated, they had however kept possession of the northern countries. Ida, when he first arrived in their country, found them ready and willing to obey him; and was acknowledged sovereign of the Northumbrians, as well as of the Angles his followers, under the title of king of Northumbria. Though a monarch of great abilities, yet as he established himself without any obstacle, there is but one particular recorded of him, namely, his building the city of Bebbanburgh, so called from his queen Bebb. This city, after many years, was destroyed: but there still remains the castle of Bamborough. Ida died in 559, having reigned twelve years.

Northumbria was divided into two kingdoms. Adda, son of Ida, was king of Bernicia, or the northern part, and Ælla, of Deira, or the southern part. Ida left twelve sons, half by wives and half by concubines.

The account of the settlement of the Anglo-Saxons is too imperfect to compile a regular history from. The thread of the narrative must therefore be carried on by the aid of the isolated facts which have been preserved.

In 560, Cenric, king of Wessex, and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, died after a reign of twenty-six years: he had employed himself wholly in the care of his dominions. He took up arms but once to repel the Britons, who came and attacked him. Of the four sons he left, Ceaulin, the eldest, succeeded him both in the kingdom of Wessex, and the dignity of monarch of the Saxons.

Ceaulin was an ambitious prince, who, not content with the prerogatives he was vested with as monarch, considered the other Saxon kings as his vassals, pretending to keep them in a rigorous dependence. He made extraordinary preparations to obtain the submission he desired, which alarmed both the Saxon and British princes. The last especially could not but be in extreme consternation, by reason of their deplorable state. After the death of Arthur, they lived in a sort of anarchy. What remained of their country, was separated into little independent states, which weakened one another by the discord and vices that prevailed among their respective princes.

Ceaulin was determined to subdue his countrymen first, who were by degrees compelled to submit to a much greater dependence on their monarch or general, than their laws and customs required.

At length Hermenric, king of Kent, dying in 564, Ethelbert, his son and successor, would not bear the arrogant domination of the West-Saxon, which was the more grievous to him, as being a descendant of Hengist, he thought he had a better right to the dignity of monarch than any other prince. Prepossessed with this notion, he resolved to revive the pretensions of the kings of Kent, neglected by his predecessors, and declared war with Ceaulin, not considering the disproportion between his forces and those of his enemy. Ceaulin, disdaining to be attacked by a young prince of no reputation, marched towards Kent, with a design to forestall him, and meeting him at Wibbandune (now Wimbledon) routed him. Ethelbert being defeated a second time, was totally disabled, and compelled to sue for peace. His vexation at so unexpected a disappointment was increased by the ridicule cast on him for his presumption. This was the first civil war among the Saxons, which was followed by many more, caused by the restlessness and ambition of their princes. Being out of danger from the Britons, they quarrelled among themselves, with such animosity, that if another Arthur had appeared, the Britons might have recovered all they had lost.

Uffa, the only survivor of the twelve chiefs of the Angles, assumed in 571 the title of king of the East-Angles, and his kingdom was called East-Anglia. As this was forty years after his arrival in Britain, he must have been of a great age when crowned. This was the sixth kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons.

Ceaulin was so elated with his success against Ethelbert, that he looked upon the neighbouring Saxon princes as his subjects and vassals. The king of Northumbria and East-Anglia, being separated from him by a large tract of land possessed by the Britons, had not much to fear from his ambition. But the kings of Kent, Essex, and Sussex, were forced to submit to him, as superior to each of them in extent of dominions. After this, Ceaulin turned his arms against the Britons; and Cutha, his brother, frequently defeated them.

Before this war was ended, Uffa, first king of the East-Angles, died in 578, leaving his crown to his son Titilus.

The miserable Britons, pressed on the south by the Saxons of Wessex, Sussex, and Kent; on the east, by those of Essex or East-Anglia; and on the north, by the Northumbrians; were surrounded by their enemies. In this emergency they reversed their former policy, and applied to the Scots to aid them against their common enemy the Saxons. The Scots complied with the request, and joining forces with the Britons, defeated Ceaulin in a great battle, in which Cuthwin, Ceaulin's son, was slain. But proving in a second engagement totally unsuccessful, the Scots retired to their country, and the Britons were compelled to make further submissions to the Saxons.

In the year 584, a fleet, the most considerable of any that had come from Germany, brought great numbers of Angles, conducted by Crida, a leader of the same nation. They most probably landed in East-Anglia, and advanced towards the middle of the island, upon the territories of the Britons, who were unable to oppose their arms. Some vainly projected to defend themselves, whilst others sought only to save their goods, their wives and children, abandoning their lands to the Angles. Crida, taking advantage of their terror, spread himself far and wide, and becoming master of the field, drove his frightened enemies before him. In vain did they fly to their walled towns; the want of provisions for such multitudes soon compelled them to take the only course left them, and retire into Cambria beyond the Severn. They had no other retreat, being pressed on all other sides by the Saxons and Angles. Their flight put Crida in possession of all the country lying between the Humber, the Severn, and Thames, by which he was bounded on the north, west, and south. To the east of him lay the kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia.

Out of all these conquests, Crida formed a kingdom larger and more considerable than any of the other six, by the name of the kingdom of the Middle-Angles. This kingdom was afterwards more generally called Mercia. Crida the first king was crowned in 584.

Cambria not being sufficient to contain so many families, multitudes of the miserable Britons fled into Armorica, where great numbers of their countrymen were already settled. Others submitted to the Saxons or Angles, content to become hewers of wood and drawers of water for a wretched subsistence. Those that remained in Cambria, a country defended by nature, kept their ground against all the power of the conquerors, who could not, till long after, extend their conquests beyond the mountains. This little corner of the island where the Britons were confined was afterwards divided into several petty kingdoms, which were one time separated, at another united, according to the ambition or power of their kings. Here we shall leave the Britons for the future, as making a state by themselves, and having no relation to the history of England but such as is commonly found between two neighbouring nations. It is true they made from time to time several attempts to recover what they had lost; but their efforts proved ineffectual, as did the endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to subdue them in these retreats.

The Saxons gave the Britons the name of Gwallish, or Wallish, that is, Gauls; considering them, as in all appearance they were, of Gaulish extraction. For this reason Cambria was by them termed Wallish-land; from which came the name of Wales, used by the English at this day, and changed by the French into Galles, upon account of their being derived from the Gauls. The Walsons also, and Wallachians, have still kept these names, and in some places in Germany the Italian tongue is called Welsh, because of Gallia Cisalpina, inhabited by the Gauls. As for the name of Cambria given by the native Britons to Wales, it is supposed that before the arrival of the Saxons, the Britons, who called themselves Cumri, or Cumbri, named their country Cambria; and that after their retreat beyond the Severn, the same name which before was common to all Britain, became peculiar to Wales.

About the same time, the Anglo-Saxons unanimously agreed to call their kingdoms in general by the name of England, that is, the country of the Angles. Whether this was done because the Angles were more numerous than the Saxons and Jutes, and possessed the largest and most considerable of the several kingdoms, or for some other reason, is uncertain. Perhaps Engle-land is only a contraction of Engle-Saxe-land, a name derived from the two principal nations that were settled in Great Britain. But the Picts, Scots, and Irish, did not comply with this change of names, and continued to call the new possessors of Britain, Saxenag, or Saxons, and their country Saxeneage. As the Saxons were first known by that name to the neighbouring nations, and they were accustomed to it, they were not willing to receive the alteration introduced by the conquerors.

We are very sensible that the changing of the name of Britain into that of England is generally ascribed to Egbert king of Wessex, about two hundred and fifty years after the time now treated of. But this opinion is founded on the authority of an historian who is far from being infallible. Others, who seem to be more authentic, positively affirm, the name of England was given to that part of Britain conquered by the Saxons, a little after their arrival in the island; which may very well be understood of the time immediately following the arrival and conquests of Cerdic. But it is not possible to extend this "little after" to the reign of Egbert, which began not till the year 800.

After the death of Ida, and the division of Northumbria before mentioned, Ælla reigned in Deira, and Adda, eldest son of Ida, in Bernicia; who dying in 563, four kings, all sons or brothers of Ida, successively filled the throne of Bernicia till the year 586, when Athelric, Ida's youngest brother, was placed thereon. But as he was very old, Adelfrid his son held the reins of the government by his father's authority.

In the year 587, Ercenwin, first king of Essex, died, after a reign of sixty years, and was succeeded by his son Sledda.

Thus we have ran through, in this second chapter, the most remarkable events that happened in Britain, from the arrival of the Saxons to their establishment in the island, during a war of 130 years. We have seen the efforts of the Britons, who, after a resolute defence, were forced at last to give up their country to the very people they had called to their assistance. In the following chapter we shall see what passed in the kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, when considered as making but one body under the same government. The Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, who conquered the best part of Britain, considering themselves as one people, as they had been in Germany, established a form of government, as near as possible to that which they had lived under in their own country. They formed their Wittena-Gemot, or assembly of Wise-men, to settle the common affairs of the various kingdoms, and conferred the command of their armies upon one chosen out of the kings, to whom, for that reason, no doubt, some have given the title of monarch, on pretence of his having the precedence and some superiority over the rest. But that dignity seems rather to have been like that of Stadtholder of the United Provinces of the Low Countries. There was, however, some difference between the Saxon government in Britain and that in Germany. For instance, in Germany, the governor of each province entirely depended on the general assembly, where the supreme power was lodged; whereas in Britain, each king was sovereign in his own dominions. But notwithstanding this, all the kingdoms together were, in some respects, considered as the same state, and every individual governor submitted to the resolutions of the general assembly of the different kingdoms, to which he gave his consent by himself or representative. And therefore this form of government may be very justly compared to that of the former government of the United Provinces, each whereof was sovereign and independent, though they submitted to the determination of the states-general. A free election, and sometimes force, gave the Saxon kingdoms a chief or monarch, whose authority was greater or less, according to his ability or strength. For though the person invested with this office had no right to an unlimited authority, there was scarce one of these monarchs, as will be seen hereafter, but aspired to an absolute power.

The State of the British Church, from the arrival of the Saxons to the retreat of the Britons into Wales.

BEFORE the arrival of the Saxons, Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, came twice into Britain, as we have already said, to extirpate the Pelagian heresy, that had taken deep root. He founded several schools, among which those of Dubricius, bishop of Llandaff and Illutus, a learned prelate, were the most famous. Dubricius had two schools, where he himself taught; one at Hensland, and another at Mockrost. Illutus taught at Llan-twit, that is, the church of Illutus. There was also at Bangor in Cambria, a famous monastery where youth were educated. Into the public service of the church Germanus also introduced the Gaulish rites and ceremonies. This is almost all we know concerning the British church, during the time the Saxons were employed in their conquests. A few particulars relating to some ecclesiastics famous for their sanctity is all that can be added to this brief account.

Patrick was one of the most remarkable for the conversion of the Irish, which is generally ascribed to him, though Anatolius and Palladius preached in Ireland before him. In all probability Patrick made the greatest progress, and therefore the Irish did, and still do, reverence him as their apostle and protector. There were three noted men of this name: Patrick the elder, who died in 449, and is mentioned in the chronicle of Glastonbury church: Patrick the great, the converter of the Irish, who died in 493, having governed the church of Ireland sixty years: Patrick the younger, his nephew, who survived his uncle some years.

Dubricius, bishop, or rather, archbishop of Caerleon was illustrious for his piety, learning, and the above-mentioned schools; and lastly, for his synod at Brevi in Cardiganshire, against the Pelagians.

David, son of a British prince, and successor of Dubricius, removed the archiepiscopal seat from Caerleon to Menevia, from him called St. David's. He was noted for his austere life, and his synod at Vittoria, where the canons of Brevi were confirmed. Several miracles are attributed to him, particularly his giving to the Bath-waters the virtues they still retain. He is said to have lived 146 years.

Sampson the elder and Sampson the younger. The first, being bishop of Dol in Armorica, was sent for into Britain by Ambrosius, and made archbishop of York. The second, of royal race, was made an archbishop, without having any particular see assigned him, with power to perform the archiepiscopal functions wherever he came. The Saxon wars compelled him to return home, where he was made archbishop of Dol. He is said, when he left Great Britain, to have carried with him several memoirs, that would have given us a more perfect knowledge of the affairs of the British church, had they been carefully preserved.

Cadoc, abbot of Lancarvan, spent his whole income, which was very considerable, in maintaining 300 priests. He lived to the year 570.

Patern, of a noble family in Armorica, having studied twenty years in Ireland, came and settled in Cambria, where he usefully employed his time in promoting peace among the several princes. He generally resided at Cardigan, where is still to be seen Llan-Badarn-vawr, that is, the Church of Great St. Patern, which for some time was a bishop's seat. Patern died in his native country, where he was so distinguished for holiness of life, that no less than three festival days were dedicated to his memory.

Petroc, a native of Cornwall, was famous for his piety, and gave name to Petroc-stow, or Padstow, in the same county.

Kentigern, son to a princess of the Picts, was abbot of Glasgow, whence he went into Cambria, and founding a religious society, returned to his monastery. His austerities are highly extolled, and particularly his strict abstinence from flesh.

Asaph, the disciple of Kentigern, wrote his master's life, by whom he was made abbot of the monastery founded in Cambria: he lived to the year 590, and left his name to the city of St. Asaph.

Columba, nobly descended, founded in Ireland a monastery, called Dearmach, that is, the Field of Oaks, because situated in a forest: some time after he came into Britain, to preach the Gospel to the Highland-Picts, of which they were yet ignorant. He had the satisfaction to see those savages converted to the Christian religion, with their king, Bridius, who gave him the little island of Jona, or Hy, called since Colchil, one of the Hebrides, two miles in length, and one in breadth, where he founded another monastery, that afterwards became very famous. These two monasteries for a long time supplied the Scotch churches both in Ireland and Great Britain, with bishops and priests. It is observable, that according to the institution of Columba, the abbot of Jona retained a jurisdiction not only over several monasteries, which branched forth from that, but also over the monks that went thence to be priests or bishops.

Gildas of Badon, or Bath, was scholar of Illutus, and a monk of Bangor monastery. He was born in the year of the battle of Badon, according to Usher, in 520, but according to other calculations, built upon reasons too long to be inserted, in 511. Gildas wrote a treatise, entitled, "De Excidio Britanniae," "Of the Destruction of Britain," wherein he boldly censures the British princes of his time, that is, those who after the death of Arthur divided the country into several petty states. From him chiefly it is that we know what passed among the Britons about the time he wrote, in 564. There is another history, or rather romance, under the name of Gildas, who is by some called Albanian, and supposed to be different from him now alluded to. But the learned Stillingfleet asserts, they are both the works of one author, and that there was no other Gildas but he of Badon.

Columbanus, an Irishman, disciple of Congal, abbot of Bangor in Ireland, passed great part of his life in Britain. From thence going into Burgundy, he founded the abbey of Luxeuil, of which he was the first abbot. Twenty years after, Thierri, king of Austrasia, and also of Burgundy, banished him his dominions, for too freely censuring his conduct, and forced him to fly to Agilulph, king of the Lombards. At length he founded near Naples the monastery of Cobio, where he died. To these may be added Taliassin, the famous British poet, whose verses are preserved to this day.

These were the most noted ecclesiastics in the British church, from the arrival of the Saxons to the retreat of the Britons into Cambria. It is obvious we have the names only of those that flourished.

rished in Cambria, Ireland, or Scotland. As for the other parts of Britain, we know nothing of what passed with respect to church affairs. We have not so much as the names of the bishops, except Theon and Thadioc, archbishops of London and York, who were forced also in the end to fly into Cambria. It is very likely all the monuments of the British churches were destroyed, wherever the Saxons became masters; and that it was not possible to preserve any but those of the churches of Wales, where the Saxons could never penetrate. It is easy to imagine, that the church was in a very deplorable state whilst the Saxons were exercising their fury. These merciless idolaters trampled upon everything relating to the Christian religion; and "From the east to the West," says Gildas, "nothing was to be seen but churches burnt and destroyed to their very foundations. The inhabitants were extirpated by the sword, and buried under the ruins of their own houses. The altars were daily profaned by the blood of those slain thereon." Bede, who was a Saxon, and therefore cannot be supposed to aggravate the cruelties of his countrymen, expresses himself thus: "By the hands of the Saxons a fire was lighted up in Britain, that served to execute the just vengeance of God upon the wicked Britons, as he had formerly burnt Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The island was so ravaged by the conquerors, or rather by the hand of God making use of them as instruments, that there seemed to be a continual flame from sea to sea, which burnt up the cities, and covered the surface of the whole isle. Public and private buildings fell in one common ruin. The priests were murdered on the altars; the bishop with his flock perished by fire and sword, without any distinction, no one daring to give their scattered bodies an honourable burial."

To these mournful descriptions may be added, that the Britons, who escaped the fury of their enemies, not finding wherewithal to subsist in the woods and mountains, were forced at length to surrender to the conquerors, deeming themselves happy in being able to purchase their lives with the loss of their liberty. Some fled to foreign countries, and those whom the love of their native land kept at home, and the dread of slavery prevented from submitting to the Saxons, dragged on a wretched life, in miserable want and perpetual fear. It is therefore no wonder that the accounts of the British church are so imperfect, since the Saxons used their utmost endeavours to destroy all the monuments that might have been preserved.

CHAPTER III

Concerning the most remarkable Events during the various Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, and their union. Containing the space of two hundred and forty-three years.

THE country formerly inhabited by the Britons was now possessed by strangers. The names of the towns and provinces were changed, and the whole parcelled into several kingdoms, was shared among four different nations; namely, the Britons, or Welsh, the Scots, the Picts, and the Anglo-

Saxons. Under the Britons were comprised all those foreigners, Romans and others, settled in the island ever since the reign of Claudius, who being incorporated with the natives, became one people with them. The descendants of these foreigners were undoubtedly very numerous, it being the constant policy of the Romans to diminish, as far as lay in their power, the natives of a conquered country, and to send thither large colonies, either of veterans, or of people taken from their other conquests. As Britain had been in their possession 400 years, very probably they had not neglected, with regard to that island, a custom they practised everywhere else. Before they left Britain, their colonies were distinct from the natives; but the war, carried by the Picts and Scots into the Roman province, and that of the Britons and Romans settled in the island, with the Anglo-Saxons, so intermingled them, that we do not find thenceforward in any history the least signs of distinction between the Roman colonists and British natives. The Britons therefore henceforth are to be considered as a people composed of the ancient inhabitants of Britain and the Roman colonies. The Vandals settled about Cambridge, were also reckoned as Britons, and involved in the same ruin with them. After the establishment of the Anglo-Saxons, the Britons had nothing left but Cambria, and the western part of Danmonium, now Cornwall. Cambria (the name formerly of all Britain) was changed by the Saxons into Wales. Danmonium was, in all appearance, a Roman name. The Britons called that country Kernaw, from Kern, that is, in their language, horns, because of the many promontories that shoot out into the sea like horns. Hence doubtless the Saxons gave it the name of Cornwall, that is to say, the country of Kernaw, inhabited by Gauls or Britons. They seemed to study to leave neither to the inhabitants nor countries any sign of the Roman names, since they even styled Welsh a people the Romans had called Britons above 400 years.

The north part of Great Britain was in possession of the Picts and Scots, separated from the English by the Esk and Tweed, and the mountains between these two rivers. The Picts were on the east, and the Scots on the west side. The Grampian mountains served them for a common boundary, from the mouth of the Nid to the lake of Lomond. Abernethy, now a small town in the country of Strathern, was the capital of the Picts, whence the bishop's seat was removed to St. Andrew's. Edinburgh belonged also to the Picts, and whatever the English possessed beyond Severus's wall, was taken from the same nation. The territories of the Scots extended towards the north and west, as far as the sea that bounds the island on these two sides.

The Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, who are all to be considered as derived from one stock, and who may be comprehended under the name of English, had conquered all the southern part of the island, from the Channel to the wall of Severus, and a little beyond, towards the East. The part of Britain possessed by these three nations was divided into eight kingdoms, whereof the Saxons and Jutes had four, namely, Kent, Essex, Sussex, and Wessex; the Angles separately had but two, Mercia and East Anglia; but were mixed with those Saxons who first conquered the country beyond the Humber, in the kingdoms of Bernicia and Deira, commonly comprised under the name of Northumbria. The descendants of the Saxons first took possession of the country beyond the Humber, under Octa and Ebusa.

This state of Britain has been improperly denominated the "Saxon Heptarchy, or Seven-fold government." But the researches of modern historians, and particularly the investigations of Sharon Turner, have established the fact that on the final settlement of the Saxons in the island, their various governments, when combined, formed an Octarchy, or Eight-fold government. The Sovereignities of Bernicia and Deira, being combined under the common title of Northumbria, seems to have led to a misnomer not very unreasonable, as the meagre history which remains of these two latter informs us, they were not unfrequently blended by the success of one of their petty conquerors.

Of the Octarchy in general.

The Anglo-Saxons established in England a form of government not unlike that which they had lived under in Germany; they had as the centre of the various governments a general assembly, consisting of the principal members of the kingdoms, or their deputies, called the Wittenagemot, or meeting where the concerns of the various kingdoms only were considered.

Besides the wars, to which the historians and annalists have chiefly confined themselves, there were, no doubt, many more interesting events, that would have embellished their histories; but the writers being all monks, the affairs of religion, and especially the founding of the monasteries, and the privileges of the monks and clergy, were the only things they besides enlarged upon; and with regard to general history, they were satisfied with relating the succession of the kings with some of their principal actions.

When the Saxons arrived in England, they were all pagans and idolaters; and 150 years elapsed before they were instructed in the Christian religion. Their conversion began in 597, with the kingdom of Kent, by Austin, a Benedictine monk, sent by Pope Gregory I., and ended in 653 with the kingdom of Mercia, by the ministry of certain missionaries from Northumbria. During these 56 years spent in propagating the Gospel, revolutions happened in some of the seven kingdoms, whereby Christianity was so extirpated, that it was again to be planted as if it had never been heard of. This was particularly the case in the kingdoms of Essex, Northumbria, and East-Anglia. Thus from the beginning of these conversions to the end, there was in England, and in each kingdom, a mixture of Christians and idolaters.

Austin preached to the Saxons of Kent, Mellitus to the East-Saxons, Paulinus to the Northumbrians, Birinus to the West-Saxons, Wilfrid to the South-Saxons, Felix to the East-Angles, and the northern monks to the Mercians. In the space of about sixty years after the coming of Austin, all England was converted.

NORTHUMBERIA.

The tract of country north of the Humber, was known by the general appellation of Northumbria. It was on the south parted from Mercia by the Humber, on the west it had the Irish Sea on the north the country of the Picts and Scots, and on the east the German Ocean. It contained the present counties of Lancashire, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Northumberland, York, and Durham. The principal cities were, York, Dunelm, (since called Durham,) Carlisle, (named by the Romans, Luguballia,) Hexham, or Hagulstadt, Lancaster, and some others of less note. This country was divided into two parts, Deira and Bernicia, each, for some time, a distinct kingdom of itself. Bernicia was partly situated on the north of Severus's wall, and ended in a point at the mouth of the Tweed. Deira contained the southern part of Northumberland, as far as the Humber. The greatest length of the whole, including both parts, was 160 miles, and its greatest breadth 100.

IDA.

Ida, the first king, began his reign in 547, and died in 559. After his death, Northumbria was divided into two kingdoms, namely, Bernicia and Deira. Adda, son of Ida, was king of Bernicia, and Ælla of Deira, but the occasion of this division is unknown.

Of these kings nothing is known but the time of their death.

Athelric being very old when he came to the crown, his son Adelfrid governed the kingdom in his name, without the title of king; and having espoused Acca, daughter of Ælla, king of Deira, who died in 588, got possession of that kingdom, though Ælla left a son of three years old, named Edwin.

ADELFRID.

Adelfrid, succeeding his father in 590, became very powerful and formidable to his neighbours, particularly to the Welsh, as well as to the Scots and Picts. But of his wars, historians have related only this remarkable particular: Adelfrid preparing to lay siege to Chester, then in the hands of the Welsh, these last were bent to give him battle; and to procure the blessing of God on their arms, twelve hundred and fifty monks from the monastery of Bangor were ordered to pray near the field of battle during the fight. The monks making too much haste to the place appointed, were met by Adelfrid, who being told the reason of their leaving the monastery, put them all to the sword. This massacre was followed by a signal victory over the Welsh; after which Adelfrid entered Wales, and entirely demolished the monastery of Bangor, where were still above 1000 monks. Bede assures us they were divided into seven classes; and that two of the gates of this immense edifice were above a mile asunder. As this was a very ancient and famous monastery, in all probability the monks driven out of Britain by the Saxons had taken refuge there.

Whilst Adelfrid was aggrandizing himself by his conquests, and growing formidable to all his neighbours, Edwin, son of Ælla, king of Deira wandered from place to place, destitute of the requisite assistance to recover his father's dominions; it was even difficult for him to find where to remain in safety; Adelfrid, his enemy, being so powerful that not one of the English princes dared for some time to hazard his dominions in defence of the distressed orphan; but at length Redowald, king of the East-Angles, pitying his condition, afforded him a retreat at his court. He was then about 30 years old, of a noble mien, and possessed of such qualities as gained him the love and esteem of Redowald and his queen. Adelfrid, fearing the king of East-Anglia was forming some project for the restoration of Edwin to the throne of Deira, sent ambassadors to him, to desire him to deliver up Edwin, or to put him to death; and in case of refusal, threatened to proclaim war against him; Redowald was some time before he could resolve what to do.

Edwin, informed by the queen of the king's irresolution, was in great perplexity. For very many years he had wandered through various kingdoms, without meeting with other sanctuary than that which the king of East-Anglia had generously granted him, but which now was likely to prove fatal to him. He considered if Redowald resolved to protect him, the war that would infallibly attend his refusal to surrender him, might prove the means of raising him to his father's throne: and as he was not sure of avoiding by flight the danger that threatened him, or of finding another retreat, he determined to wait the event, and trust to the generosity of Redowald, who as yet seemed unresolved. Redowald was naturally generous: but the fear of engaging in so dangerous a war, made him at last resolve to sacrifice Edwin to the interest of the state. The latter informed of this by the queen, gave himself over for lost; and the more, because the very moment Redowald resolved to make this sacrifice to the king of Northumbria, he took all possible care to prevent his victim's escape.

In the days of Bede, who has given us a large account of this prince's adventures, scarce any remarkable event in history but was seasoned with some prodigy or apparition. Accordingly, that writer would not neglect to embellish his ecclesiastical history with a miraculous event told him, as he says, by some old men of his time. Besides, being himself a Saxon, and born in Northumbria, a miracle wrought in favour of the first Christian king of that kingdom, could not but redound to the honour of his country. We would willingly pass it over in silence, as we have many others that occur in his history, if later historians had not affected to copy it. Leaving the reader, therefore, to interpret it as he pleases, we continue his story in the words of Bede.

Edwin, after his melancholy news from the queen, went and walked in the palace-garden during the night, to consider of his affairs. Whilst he was deeply buried in thought, he saw a man, in a very strange dress, coming towards him, who asked him, "What kept him thus awake, when all the world was asleep?" The prince answered, "He was surprised to see a stranger so inquisitive about the affairs of one that was unknown to him." "Think not," replied the stranger, "that I am ignorant of what employs your thoughts: I know all that has befallen you to this hour, and am come to bring you consolation in your misfortunes. What now will you give to him that shall assure you of, one day, mounting the throne, and becoming the most powerful and glorious king that has hitherto reigned in England?" "If ever that happens," answered Edwin, "I will liberally reward all that shall have done me any service, as well as the person that foretells my good fortune." "He who is able and willing to raise you to this height of grandeur, requires nothing of you but to embrace his doctrine and obey his precepts." "I should be a wretch indeed," replied Edwin, "should I refuse to be ruled by so true a friend." Then the stranger, laying his hand on the prince's head, told him, "Remember what I am now doing, and when the like shall happen to you, think then of performing your promise without delay." Upon these words, the stranger disappeared in an extraordinary manner, to convince Edwin there was something supernatural in this adventure.

Edwin's surprise was increased by the coming of a messenger from the queen, to let him know Redowald had altered his mind. She had represented in so lively a manner to her husband the horror of the action he was about to commit, that he resolved to hazard all, and having taken this generous resolution, sent back the ambassadors, declaring he could not think of delivering up Edwin, much less of putting an innocent prince to death, that had fled for refuge to his palace. Being convinced Adelfrid would endeavour by arms to gain his desire, Redowald determined to commence the attack, and to surprise the Northumbrians. An army was immediately collected and divided into three bodies. The command of the first was given to Reyner, his eldest son, with orders to march before and secure a certain pass. Redowald himself followed at the head of the second, leaving Edwin in the rear with the third. Reyner, desirous to signalize himself by some brave action before the arrival of the other two bodies, advanced with more speed than his orders required, hoping to surprise the king of Northumbria; but though Adelfrid had not yet assembled all his forces, finding Reyner too far advanced to be supported, he took advantage of his rashness, and attacked him before it was in the power of Redowald to join him. Reyner sustained the efforts of Adelfrid with great bravery, but having too much exposed himself, he was slain, and his army put to rout.

Redowald, extremely concerned for the loss of his son, thought of nothing but revenge, and joined with Edwin; and the two armies soon coming to an engagement, Adelfrid performed wonders to preserve his reputation; but finding he was overpowered by numbers, chose rather to die than outlive the shame of his defeat. With this resolution he threw himself among the thickest of his enemies, and fell in the midst of their ranks, covered with wounds. The Northumbrians immediately threw down their arms, and betaking themselves to flight, left their enemies masters of the field.

After this great victory, to which Edwin had not a little contributed, Redowald marched into Northumbria without opposition. Adelfrid had left three sons, Anfrid, Oswald, and Oswy, who finding themselves unable to resist the conqueror, fled into Scotland. The Northumbrians, thus abandoned, without general or army, and being in the usual confusion of such occasions, submitted to Redowald. This generous prince would neither punish them for the insolence of their king, nor make the best for himself of the advantage acquired by his victory. From an uncommon greatness of soul, he not only gave Edwin the kingdom of Deira, to which he had some pretensions, but likewise that of Bernicia, reserving to himself only the glory of so heroic an action; for which, and upon account of his late victory, he obtained the dignity of monarch of the octarchy then vacant.

EDWIN.

Edwin, who a little before was an object of compassion, found himself on a sudden at the head of a powerful kingdom; and upon the death of Redwald, in 624, he openly aspired to the monarchy; and indeed there was then no Saxon or English prince able to dispute that honour with him, except Cinigisil, and Quicelm, joint kings of the West-Saxons. Quicelm especially opposed Edwin to the utmost of his power, and thereby drew upon himself from that prince, then in league with the king of Mercia, a war that put him in danger of losing his dominions, and obliged him humbly to sue for peace. The war being thus ended, Edwin met with no further opposition, and saw himself at length invested with the universally-desired dignity of monarch; and the very Welsh, to prevent a threatened invasion, consented to pay him tribute.

Edwin carried the prerogatives of the monarchy higher than any of his predecessors; claiming an absolute power over the other kings, and treating them with little or no respect. He showed the most regard for Ebald king of Kent, whose sister Ethelburga, a princess of great worth, he designed to espouse; and imagined, being monarch, he would be gladly accepted; but Ethelburga, who was a zealous Christian, was very disinclined to marry an idolatrous prince; and her brother refused to give his consent, unless his sister had liberty publicly to profess her religion. Love or policy, or perhaps both, induced even the haughty Edwin to concede to this condition, and Ethelburga consented in the hope of procuring the conversion of her future husband, and his subjects; in the same manner as her mother, Bertha of France, had that of the Saxons of Kent. She was accompanied to Northumbria by some Christian ecclesiastics, amongst whom was Paulinus, a bishop, afterwards celebrated for his powers of conversion.

Edwin lived several years in profound peace; and improved these favourable junctures, not only in maintaining his dominion over the other kings, but also in establishing good order in the state, and enacting wholesome laws, which he caused to be strictly observed. Historians remark, that in his reign justice was administered with such impartiality and rigour, that a child might have gone over the whole kingdom of Northumbria with a purse of gold in his hand, without danger of being robbed. He was converted to Christianity by Paulinus; but doubtless the gentle influence of Ethelburga had its effect. After his conversion he used every effort to spread the Christian religion where it was yet unknown, and replant it where it had been abolished. By his instigation, perhaps his absolute order, Erpwald, king of East-Anglia, permitted the Gospel to be preached again in his dominions, and at length became a Christian himself. Edwin, who could but ill brook the least opposition to his will, pretended to have an authority over the rest of the kings, of which he was extremely jealous; and by an ensign carried before him in the form of a globe, as a symbol of the union of the octarchial government in his person, he gave them to understand he would be considered not only as their head, but their sovereign.

Penda, king of Mercia, and Cadwallo, king of Wales, both desired to throw off the English monarch's yoke; for which purpose they entered into a league, and made preparations, which Edwin resolving to prevent if possible, he advanced as far as Heathfield, where a battle was fought with desperate fury on both sides. Edwin, though inferior in number of troops, supplied that defect by his prudence and ability, which would have most probably gained him the victory, had not the loss of Offrid, his eldest son, who was slain at his feet with an arrow, so disordered him, that he rushed alone among the thickest of his enemies; by whom he was immediately run through in many places, and with his life lost the victory. Upon the disappearance of their king, the dismayed Northumbrians fell into disorder, and fled.

Thus fell Edwin, in the 48th year of his age, the sixteenth of his reign, and the ninth of his monarchy. By his first wife, daughter of Cearlus, king of Mercia, he had two sons, Offrid and Edfrid. By his second, Ethelburga of Kent, he had two other sons and two daughters, who all died in their infancy, except Anfleda, wife of Oswy, subsequently king of Northumbria. Edwin resided at Derventio, now Auldby in Yorkshire.

INTERREGNUM.

The two conquering kings entered Northumberland, and ravaged the country in a terrible manner. Cadwallo, though a Christian, carried his barbarity so far, that Edfrid, son of Edwin, dreading to fall into his hands, surrendered himself to Penda, from whom he expected more favour. He was received at first with some courtesy, but was afterwards, by Penda's command, murdered in his presence. Queen Ethelburga and Paulinus fled to the king of Kent, who gave his sister some lands to found a monastery, where she passed the residue of her days; and Paulinus was made bishop of Rochester.

The Northumbrians were so weakened by their defeat, and the cruelty, or rather fury, of the two victorious kings, that they were a long time recovering themselves; but at length they judged it more honourable to die with their swords in their hands, than perish by the barbarity of the two tyrants. But when they came to elect a leader, the old jealousies between the Bernicians and Deirans revived; and the men of Deira chose Osric, a relation of Edwin; and the Bernicians set Anfrid on the throne; which last, after the defeat and death of his father Adelfrid, had retired into Scotland with Oswald and Oswy, his brothers, where they were all three baptized.

ANFRID
in Bernicia.

These two kings were no sooner on the throne, than they abjured the Christian religion, which they had before professed. Osric rashly besieged Cadwallo in York, who sallied out and routed the Deirans. Osric was slain in this encounter. The Welsh king next marched against the king of Bernicia, who was at the head of 12,000 men, and fell upon him unexpectedly, and made a terrible slaughter of the Northumbrians, Anfrid himself being killed in the battle.

INTERREGNUM.

Cadwallo's rage being inflamed by the efforts of the Northumbrians, seemed incapable of being gladdened with less than the entire destruction of the miserable nation. His barbarities at length determined Oswald, brother of Anfrid, to hazard every thing to relieve a people so cruelly oppressed; and with this generous resolution, he assembled a small body of forces, with which he boldly opposed the usurper. Though the king of Mercia had now returned to his kingdom, Cadwallo looking upon Oswald's army with the utmost contempt, marched against him. Oswald intrenched himself in an advantageous post, where he resolutely expected him. He erected a cross before the camp, and falling down on his knees with the whole army, humbly implored a blessing on his arms. Cadwallo advancing, full of confidence, to encourage his men, attempted in person to force the enemy's intrenchments; and whilst he was intent upon satisfying his rage, and was endeavouring to open a passage to join his enemies, he was shot through the body with an arrow, which put an end to his life. His death causing a great disorder among his troops, the Northumbrians rushed out of their intrenchments, and fell upon their enemies so vigorously, that they were entirely routed. The victory was so complete, and the protection of Heaven was supposed by the Northumbrians to be so visibly in their favour, that the field of battle was named Heofen, or Heaven-field, now called Haledon.

OSWALD.

After this great victory, Oswald took possession of the two kingdoms of Northumbria, to which he was heir; namely, to Bernicia by Adelfrid his father, and to Deira by Acca his mother, sister of Edwin. He was the most able as well as the most pious prince of his age, having been instructed in the Christian religion whilst in Scotland. His strict virtue, great humility, and zeal for the advancement of the Christian religion, gained him, to such a degree, the love and esteem of his subjects, that they revered him as a saint after his death. He had the satisfaction to free his country from the tyranny of Cadwallo, to unite the two kingdoms of Northumbria under his dominion, and moreover, to be elected monarch of the Anglo-Saxons; and it is even pretended that the Welsh, Scots, and Picts, were tributary to him. He took particular care to restore the Christian religion in his dominions, from which the late troubles after Edwin's death had entirely banished it.

Penda, king of Mercia, ever restless and arrogant, would not submit to Oswald as monarch; and to free himself, without making any declaration of war, took up arms to surprise him. Oswald made haste to meet him, before he had assembled all his forces. Penda took advantage of this precipitation, which rendered him superior to his enemy in number of troops, gave him battle, and obtained a signal victory; which would have redounded more to his glory had he not sullied it by his cruelty. The body of Oswald, who was slain in the fight, being found among the dead, the inhuman conqueror cut it in several pieces, and fixing them on stakes, erected them in the field of battle like so many trophies. This battle was fought at Oswestree. Oswald left a son, called Adelwalt, some time after king of Deira.

Penda, after his victory, behaved with his usual barbarity. Having ravaged Northumberland, he laid siege to Bamborough, a strong town built by Ida, where meeting with more resistance than he expected, he resolved to reduce it to ashes; and to that end, having laid under the walls a great quantity of wood, he set fire to it as soon as the wind favoured his design. But hardly was the fire lighted, when the wind changed and blew the flame directly into his camp, by which the besiegers were great sufferers. This stratagem failing, he raised the siege, and quitting Northumbria, carried the war into East-Anglia. Penda's retreat affording the Northumbrians a little respite, the Bernicians placed Oswy, brother of Oswald, upon the throne; and the next year Oswin, son of Osrice slain by Cadwallo, was crowned king of Deira.

in Deira.

Oswy thought himself very unjustly treated in being deprived of part of his brother's dominions; but as he dreaded another invasion from Penda, he had no opportunity of doing himself justice. But when he found Penda was engaged in other wars, he asserted his claim to Deira, and Oswin, after vainly trying several ways to satisfy his enemy, was compelled at last to take up arms. Oswin was mild and peaceable, and being a true Christian, who in his unsophisticated conversion knew not how to accommodate the dictates of the Gospel to worldly practices, and finding there the unreserved command of Christ to avoid the shedding of blood, could not conquer his scruples. He verily believed, the shedding his subjects' blood in his quarrel was the greatest of sins, and therefore, withdrawing privately from his army, he retired to a certain earl's house, whom he supposed to be his best friend, with design to betake himself thence to some monastery. But before he could put his project in execution, his treacherous friend betrayed him to Oswy, who ordered him to be inhumanly murdered, in expectation of seizing his kingdom with greater ease. This barbarous action did not however procure him the advantage he hoped for. The people of Deira exasperated against him, and dreading to fall under his dominion, immediately set Adelwalt, son of Oswald his brother, upon the throne, who was better able to defend himself than his predecessor. Some time after, Oswy touched with remorse, founded a monastery in the very place where Oswin was murdered, flattering himself he should atone for his crime by this easy penance.

OSWY
still in Bernicia.

652. ADELWALT
in Deira.

It was hardly possible for Oswy and Adelwalt, though very near relations, to live peaceably. Oswy still preserved his claim to the kingdom of Deira, and Adelwalt could not be ignorant of it. Consequently it was his interest, not only to suspect his uncle's designs, but even to put it out of his power, if possible, from giving him any disturbance. For this reason, he readily listened to the proposal of a league with the kings of Mercia and East Anglia against Oswy. Penda, though seventy-eight years old, was the author of this league. Oswy being informed of it, did all that lay in his power to divert the impending storm, even to the offering money to Penda, to bribe him to desist from his enterprise. But nothing could appease that prince, the irreconcilable enemy of the Northumbrians, who seeing himself supported by the armies of East-Anglia and Deira, believed he had now a favourable opportunity to gratify his passion. Oswy therefore found he was obliged to stand alone against these three enemies, whose united forces could not but inspire him with some dread; and in this pressing necessity he made a vow to found a dozen monasteries, and make his daughter a nun, if God would give him the victory.

Whilst the two armies were advancing towards one another, Adelwalt formed new projects. He considered, to which side soever the victory inclined, it would prove equally dangerous to him, since he had the same reason to fear being deprived of his dominions by Penda as by Oswy: and therefore he resolved to save his own troops, and stand neuter during the battle, that he might be in condition to defend himself against the conqueror. When the two armies came in sight, Penda, who had not dived into Adelwalt's design, boldly attacked the king of Bernicia, not doubting of being seconded by the Deirans and East-Anglians; but when the Mercians saw Adelwalt draw off his troops, their ardour abated, and thinking they were betrayed, began to give ground. Meanwhile the kings of Mercia and East-Anglia did their utmost to revive the courage of the frightened troops; but being both slain in endeavouring to renew the fight, their army was put to rout. This battle was fought in Yorkshire, on the banks of the Aere, and the place was afterwards called Winwidfield.

After this victory, Oswy, without loss of time, marched into Mercia, and became master of that kingdom, which he enjoyed only three years; but in that interval, the monarchy, vacant ever since the death of Oswald his brother, was conferred upon him. Penda was the only prince that could justly pretend to it, but withal the most dangerous to be intrusted with it.

Oswy held Mercia by right of conquest, whilst the sons of Penda were compelled to seek refuge among their friends; and their misfortunes would doubtless have been of longer continuance, had not the rigorous proceeding of Oswy's officers compelled the Mercians to take up arms; who concerted their measures so well, that when Oswy least expected it, the Northumbrians were on a sudden driven out of Mercia, and Wulpher, son of Penda, placed on the throne.

A few years after, Oswy, in some measure, repaired this loss, by the acquisition of Deira, upon the death of Adelwalt, who died without heirs. Thus Northumbria was once more united into one kingdom.

Oswy alone.

This re-union, however, did not long continue. Oswy's affection for his natural son Alfred induced him to divide Northumberland again, and make him king of Deira, though contrary to the people's inclination.

Oswy
in Bernicia.

Alfred
in Deira

Oswy, after he had reigned twenty-eight years, died in 670. The beginning of his reign was disturbed with wars, but his good fortune prevailed at last, and procured him some quiet. By Anflada, daughter of Edwin, he had two sons and three daughters. Egfrid, his son, succeeded him both in his kingdom and in the monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons. The Deirans, upon Oswy's death, revolted against Alfred, and put themselves under the dominion of Egfrid, who thereby became king of all Northumbria. Alfred retired into Ireland, where he applied himself chiefly to his studies, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to recover his dominions.

Egfrid alone.

Egfrid, though he came to the crown young, soon made himself both esteemed and feared. The Picts invading his territories, were defeated several times, and forced in the end to purchase a peace with part of their country. Wulpher, king of Mercia, thought likewise to make some conquests in Northumbria; but before the end of the war was very glad to preserve his own dominions. Egfrid's success in the beginning of his reign procured him the dignity of monarch, which his father enjoyed before him.

In the year 684, he sent an army into Ireland for the conquest of that island, under the conduct of Bertfrid, whose cruelties to the Irish, especially in not sparing their very churches and monasteries, caused the enterprise to miscarry. The Irish recovering out of their first surprise, defended themselves so well, that Bertfrid was forced to return home with an almost ruined army.

Egfrid not being able to gain anything in Ireland, resolved to enlarge his bounds towards the north, and carried his arms into the country of the Picts, who little expected an invasion. For which reason they betook themselves to their morasses and fens, to avoid the first attack of their enemies; and Egfrid was so unwise as to follow them, and lead his men into unknown defiles, which he could not get clear of. The Picts, who were perfectly acquainted with the country, harassed his nearly starved troops in such a manner, that he lost above half his army; and at last, to open a passage, he was compelled to come to a very unequal engagement, wherein he lost his life, in the fortieth year of his age, and fifteenth of his reign.

Egfrid was twice married; Adelfrida his first wife, daughter of Annas, king of the East-Angles, and widow of Thombert, an English lord, is said to have remained a virgin, though she had two husbands, and at last to have been entirely parted from Egfrid. She founded a monastery at Ely, and was the first abbess herself. She was revered in England by the name of St. Auldry.

The death of Egfrid, and the loss of his army, were extremely prejudicial to the kingdom of Northumbria, which from that time never recovered its former lustre. The Picts improved their victory by the conquest of part of Bernicia, which lay convenient for them; and the Welsh, on the other hand, possessed themselves of the two provinces that formerly composed the kingdom of Aereclute, and out of them erected the kingdoms of Lenox and Cumberland; the first of which was taken from them some years after.

Egfrid leaving no issue, the Northumbrians recalled Alfred from Ireland, and crowned him king of both kingdoms, which from thenceforward remained always united.

Alfred.

The Picts and Welsh having had time to secure their conquests before Alfred was settled in his throne, it was not possible for him, after Egfrid's death, to recover them out of their hands: all he could do was to defend, and that with great difficulty, the rest of his dominions from the frequent attacks of his neighbours. The monarchy of the Anglo-Saxons went to the kings of Wessex.

Alfred ended his days in 705, having reigned twenty years after his restoration. He left his son Osred to succeed him at eight years of age, under the guardianship of a lord named Brithric.

OSRED.

Edulph, a certain lord of the country, taking advantage of Osred's youth, made an attempt upon the crown; and a powerful party having owned him for king, Osred and his guardian were obliged to retire to Bamborough-castle, where they were immediately besieged by Edulph. The length of the siege giving Brithric and his friends an opportunity of rising in favour of their lawful king, Edulph found himself deserted on a sudden, and forced to raise the siege in confusion and hurry. Whereupon, Brithric sallied out in pursuit of the usurper, and taking him prisoner, ordered him to be beheaded, about two months after his usurpation.

When Osred came of age, and was master of himself, he fell into a vicious course of life; and it is asserted he made no scruple to intrigue with the nuns, and even to use violence, when other means would not prevail. After Alfred, Oswy's natural son came to the crown, as all the illegitimate children of the kings, or their descendants, imagined they had the same right to aspire to the throne. Cenred and Osric, descendants of Ogga, natural son of Ida, seeing Osred was not popular, formed a party against him, which was abetted to the utmost of their power by the regular and secular clergy, whose interest it was to have a new sovereign. This party became at length so strong, as to be able to give Osred battle, wherein he was slain, in the nineteenth year of his age, and eleventh of his reign; Cenred, the principal author of the revolt, was his successor.

CENRED

Died in the second year of his reign, and Osric, who assisted him in obtaining the crown, mounted the throne after him.

OSRIC

Reigned eleven years, without doing anything remarkable, and left his crown to his cousin Ceolulph.

CEOLULPH

Became a monk, in the seventh or eighth year of his reign, and passed the residue of his days in the monastery of Lindisfarn. Edbert ascended the throne after him.

EDBERT

The coronation of Edbert was immediately followed by an invasion of the Picts in the northern frontiers; and this war obliging him to march all his forces towards the north, the king of Mercia took advantage of their distance, fell upon the southern parts of Northumbria, and carried off a great booty.

Edbert, towards the end of his reign, having made a league with Oengussa, king of the Picts, recovered the city of Areclute, capital of the kingdom of Lenox, taken by the Welsh in the reign of Alfred. Deovama, general or prince of the Welsh, endeavouring to relieve Areclute, was defeated by the confederate kings. Shortly after, Edbert retired into a monastery, leaving his crown to his son Osulph.

OSULPH.

Osulph was assassinated in the first year of his reign; and Mollon-Adelwald, though not of the blood-royal, was raised to the throne

MOLLON-ADELWALD.

Mollon-Adelwald's election proved in the end the destruction of the kingdom. The Northumbrians having been guilty of the error of placing on the throne a king not of the royal family, all the great chiefs, thought themselves entitled to the crown, as well as the princes of the blood; and hence arose numerous factions, that ended at last in the entire loss of the public liberty. Oswy, one of these lords, led the way, but death freed the king from this competitor. Afterwards, Alcred, descended from Ida by Alaric, one of his natural sons, following the example of Oswy, and secretly conspiring against Mollon, found means to ensnare him and put him to death; after which he was crowned in his stead.

ALCRED.

Mollon's faction, which was very much reduced by his death, having in time recovered, Alcred was compelled to fly to the king of the Picts, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemies. As soon as he was gone, Ethelred, son of Mollon, was placed on the throne by his father's party.

ETHELRED.

As Ethelred had been raised to the crown by the interest of his faction, he judged the best way to fix himself in the throne, would be by the death or banishment of the heads of the contrary party; and accordingly, three of the principal opposers of his election were put to death, for pretended or slight crimes. But this method, instead of having the expected effect, served only to hasten the plots of his enemies, as it furnished them with a plausible pretence to take up arms: and in a short time, they were able to bring into the field an army that gave the king some uneasiness; who, however, sending his best troops against them under the command of a general entirely devoted to his service, was in hopes of speedily reducing them to obedience. But his army was overthrown by the rebels; and this defeat, which was soon followed by a second, compelled him to fly for refuge to some of the neighbouring kingdoms. Upon his retiring, Alfwald, son of Osulph, and grandson of Egbert, was placed on the throne by the victorious party.

ALFWALD I.

Alfwald I. reigned eleven years with great justice and moderation; which did not, however, prevent his being assassinated by one of the contrary faction. He was honoured by his followers as a saint after his death.

OSRED II.

Osred, son of King Alcred, was chosen in his room, who, very unlike his predecessor, became so contemptible, that he was confined to a monastery the first year of his reign. Ethelred's party was deeply concerned in deposing Osred, and had interest enough to recall and place him again on the throne, after fifteen years' exile.

ETHELRED RESTORED.

Ethelred began his new reign with two acts of cruelty, that very much exasperated his enemies against him. He put Osred, his predecessor, to death, who, though a monk, made him uneasy: and then dispatched out of the way Alphas and Alfwin, sons of the good King Alfwald.

During this reign, the Danes made a descent into Northumbria, and burnt Lindisfarn monastery; and allured by the booty taken in this first expedition, they came again the following year, and pillaged Tinmouth monastery, founded by King Egfrid. Ethelred, by the assistance of his father-in-law, Offa, king of Mercia, prevented them from carrying their ravages any further, and drove them back to their ships, where almost all of them perished in a sudden and violent storm on the English coast.

After Ethelred was recalled, his cruel and revengeful temper very much inflamed the enmity of the opposite faction towards him; but regardless of the murmurs of his enemies, he thought only of giutting his revenge, and establishing himself in his throne, by the death or banishment of those he most feared. At length, attempting to send Ardulph, one of the principal lords of the country, into exile, he gave the contrary party an occasion to rebel; and after the civil war had lasted two years, the malcontents, finding they had taken a tedious and uncertain way to get rid of their king, caused him to be assassinated. However, his faction was still powerful enough to place Osbald, one of their own party, on the throne.

Charlemagne, emperor of Germany, was so incensed with the Northumbrians for their conduct towards Ethelred, that he was going to proclaim war against them, as appears by a letter from Alcuin to Offa, king of Mercia.

OSBALD OR OSRED.

Whilst the people were intent upon the public rejoicings at the election of the new king, the opposite party laid their measures so well, that Osbald was dethroned, twenty-seven days after his election, and Ardulph chosen in his room.

ARDULPH.

The divisions that prevailed in Northumbria, still continued to rend that unfortunate kingdom. Ardulph was supported in the throne by one of the factions that was then the most powerful; but which did not hinder the other party from fomenting the most violent disturbances. Alcred, formerly king of Northumbria, left a son named Alcmund, who was head of this party; and as he was beginning to grow formidable, Ardulph put him to death, judging it necessary to sacrifice him to his safety. His death being looked upon by his friends as a martyrdom, Alcmund was ranked in the number of the saints; and it afforded the king's enemies a pretence to rise in arms, who set Alaric, a lord, at their head. But this general being vanquished, and slain in battle, the malcontents remained quiet for some time, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity; and, indeed, the face of affairs was quickly changed; for the opposite party became at length so powerful, that the king was glad to escape out of his enemies' hands, by flying to the court of Charlemagne, where the English were always welcome.

ALFWALD II.

After the retreat of Ardulph, Alfwald II., who had chased him away, was placed on the throne, and reigning about two years, by his death left the crown to Andred.

ANDRED.

In Andred's reign it was that Northumbria submitted to the dominion of Egbert, king of Wessex.

MERCIA.

THE kingdom of Mercia was bounded on the north by the Humber, by which it was separated from Northumbria; on the west by the Severn, beyond which were the Britons or Welsh; on the south by the Thames, by which it was parted from the kingdoms of Kent, Sussex, and Wessex; on the east by the kingdoms of Essex and East-Anglia. Thus Mercia was guarded on three sides by three large rivers that ran into the sea, and served for boundaries to all the other kingdoms. Hence the name, Mercia, from the Saxon word Merc, signifying a bound, and not, as some fancy, from an imaginary river called Mercia. The inhabitants of this kingdom are sometimes termed by historians Mediterranei Angli, or the Mid-land English, and sometimes South-Humbrians, as being south of the Humber; but the most common name is that of Mercians. The principal cities of Mercia were Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, Leicester, Coventry, Lichfield, Northampton, Worcester, Gloucester, Derby, Chester, Shrewsbury, Stafford, Oxford, Bristol. Of all the kingdoms of the Saxons this was the most considerable. Its greatest length was a hundred and sixty miles, and its greatest breadth about one hundred.

Crida, the first king of Mercia, arrived in England in 584. He was crowned the same or the following year, and died in 594.

INTERREGNUM.

After Crida's death, Ethelbert, king of Kent, and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, made himself master of Mercia, and kept it some time, as will be related in the history of the kingdom of Kent. But afterwards he restored it to Wibba, son of Crida, reserving, however, some right of sovereignty, the nature of which, historians have neglected to explain.

WIBBA.

This prince reigned nineteen years, and died in 615. He left a son called Penda, who should have succeeded him, but Ethelbert being still alive, and dreading his restless and turbulent spirit, left Mercia about a year without a king. After that he placed Cearlus, cousin-german of Wibba, on the throne.

CEARLUS.

After the death of Ethelbert in 616, Cearlus freed Mercia from the dominion of the kings of Kent, and having reigned nine years, died in 624. As he left no children, Penda, son of Wibba, possessed the throne after him.

PENDA.

This prince was fifty years old when he came to the crown; and Ethelbert had not without reason passed him by after his father's death, he being a most restless and turbulent prince. We have already, in the history of Northumbria, spoken of his wars with Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy.

In 653, Penda caused Peda his eldest son to be crowned king of Leicester, and then sent him into Northumbria to espouse the daughter of King Oswy, where he was converted to Christianity; and brought back with him some missionaries, who preached the Gospel in Mercia with success. Penda continued a pagan, and was slain in battle in the 18th year of his age, as related in the history of Northumbria, leaving five sons, Peda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Merowald, and Mercelm, and two daughters, Ciniburga and Ciniswintha.

INTERREGNUM.

After the defeat and death of Penda, Oswy became master of Mercia, and kept it three years. However, he left Peda his son-in-law the little kingdom of Leicester. But Peda being soon after poisoned by his wife, Oswy seized that also, and held it with the rest of Mercia, till he was driven thence by Wulfer, as we have seen in the history of Northumbria.

WULFER

Wulfer was almost as much a stranger to peace as his father Penda. He waged war at several times, with all the neighbouring princes, with various success, one while conqueror, another while vanquished; but as the particulars of these wars are not very material, and are but imperfectly related by historians, it is needless to enlarge upon them. We shall only observe, that he took Adelwalch, king of Sussex, prisoner, and brought him to Mercia, after having conquered his kingdom. Some time after, Adelwalch becoming a Christian during his imprisonment, Wulfer gave him the Isle of Wight, which he had likewise subdued. It is conjectured that Wulfer had also conquered the kingdom of Essex, since it is well known he disposed of the bishopric of London in favour of one Wina.

Wulfer was still an idolater when he came to the crown; but shortly after was converted, and his children were brought up in the Christian religion; and Vereburga, one of his daughters, was honoured as a saint. He died in 675, thinking to leave his crown to his son Cenrid; but his brother Ethelred found means to supplant his nephew and obtain the kingdom.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred, as soon as he was seated on the throne, erected Herefordshire into a kingdom, and gave it to Merowald his brother, who dying without heirs, left it to his younger brother Mercelm. But he dying also without children, this little kingdom was reunited to Mercia.

In 679, Ethelred invaded Kent, and made great devastations. After which he turned his arms against Northumbria, and compelled Egfrid to restore certain Mercian towns, taken during the reign of Wulfer. Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, greatly contributed to the peace concluded between these two kings.

In 697, Ostrith, wife of Ethelred, was assassinated, and the little care taken to discover the murderers, gives room to suspect that the king himself was not innocent. However that be, Ethelred growing weary of the world, resigned his crown to Cenred his nephew, son of Wulfer, and turned monk, in Bardney monastery, of which shortly after he was made abbot.

CENRED.

Nothing remarkable was performed by this prince, during his four years' reign, but the exchanging his crown for the monkish habit, after the example of Offa, king of Essex, who was come to his court to demand Ciniswintha, his aunt, daughter of Penda, in marriage. By the persuasions of this princess, both kings were prevailed upon to become monks, and to go to Rome, and receive the tonsure at the pope's hands. Ceolred, son of Ethelred, succeeded his cousin Cenrid.

CEOLRED.

Ceolred had a terrible war to sustain against Ina, king of the West-Saxons; and historians, according to custom, without relating the motives or particulars of it, only say, the two kings fought a bloody battle at Wodenburg in Wiltshire, with such equal success, that neither could boast of the victory.

Ceolred was far from being of his predecessor's mind to prefer the monk's habit to a crown; and not only disregarded the monks and the rest of the clergy, but, if the historians are to be credited, violated their privileges without any scruple. This behaviour, so contrary to that of all the other English princes, raised great clamours against him; and the ecclesiastics in particular took all occasions to paint him in the blackest colours. Their animosity followed him even into the other world; and after his death, which happened in 716, they gave out that he resigned his last breath, blaspheming and talking with the devil. Such kind of reports against those that were not in the interest of the monks, were not spread without design, and the histories of those days abound with the same kind of fabrications. Ethelbald, grandson of Eoppa, brother of Penda, mounted the throne after Ceolred.

ETHELBALD.

This prince was one of the most illustrious kings that had hitherto worn the crown of Mercia, to which he added the dignity of monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, resigned by Ina, king of Wessex, when he became a monk. This dignity seems to have consisted originally only in presiding at the general assemblies, and commanding the armies of the various kingdoms, and some other prerogatives which conferred no right of sovereignty over the other kings. At least, the electors looked upon it in this light; but the monarchs generally considered it in a very different manner; and they were no sooner invested with it, than their first care was to grasp at an unlimited power, to which they thought themselves entitled by the examples of the preceding monarchs. Ethelbald, improving some favourable occurrences, carried the prerogatives of the monarchy to the highest degree, and thereby grew very troublesome and formidable to the other kings. For which reason the kings of Wessex and Northumbria agreed to attack him from two different quarters at once; and as Mercia was situated between these two kingdoms, Ethelbald was obliged to send half his army towards the north, whilst with the other half he himself marched against the West-Saxons commanded by Ethelun. No particulars of this war are known, except that Ethelbald was vanquished and his army put to rout.

Four years after, this prince was slain in a mutiny of the army raised by a chief named Beornred, who was proclaimed king by the soldiers.

BEORNRED, THE USURPER.

Beornred's election by the army, who had no right to assume such an authority, was very displeasing to the Mercian chieftains, especially as the king elect was no ways related to the royal family. And therefore, before Beornred had time to establish himself in his usurpation, they placed on the throne Offa nephew of the late king; who drawing an army together, gave the usurper battle, and obtained a complete victory; where some say, Beornred was slain; and others, that he maintained his ground for a while in some part of Mercia.

OFFA.

Offa was one of the most famous of the Saxon kings, on account of his victories over the Welsh and the neighbouring Saxon princes, and for several other actions which must be briefly related.

He was monarch of the Saxons, and following the example of his predecessors, was engaged in continual wars with such princes as disputed his ambitious pretensions; and whilst he was thus employed, the Welsh, always upon the watch to improve the advantages afforded them by the frequent dissensions of the English, thought they had now a fair opportunity to attack him. This unexpected war, wherein the Welsh at first were successful, compelled him to conclude a peace with the English, in order to turn his arms against these unexpected invaders, whom he quickly reduced to such a condition that they were forced to abandon not only their late conquests in Mercia, but also part of their own country beyond the Severn, which Offa seized and peopled with English colonies; and to prevent them from ever retaking it, he threw up a rampart, defended by a large ditch, by means of which he parted his conquests from the rest of Wales. This rampart, in length twenty-four miles, reaching from the mouth of the Dee, to the place where the Wye runs into the Severn, was called Clawdh Offa, or Offa's Dike.*

In 786, Offa made his son Egfrid partner with him in the government, and gave his daughter Edburgh in marriage to Brithric, king of Wessex.

The greatest stain on Offa's reputation was his treachery to Ethelbert, king of the East-Angles. This young prince designing to marry, came to the court of Offa, and demanded his daughter Adelfrida in marriage. He was received at first with great marks of affection and esteem; but Offa, by the pressing and repeated instigations of Quendrida his wife, who represented to him that he ought by all means to embrace so fair an opportunity of becoming master of East-Anglia, was persuaded to break the sacred laws of honour and hospitality, by murdering Ethelbert. He followed up this crime by attacking East-Anglia, and succeeded in uniting it to Mercia.

He was soon smitten with remorse, and to appease his conscience, he performed, in 794, a journey to Rome, to obtain a pardon from the pope, and secure himself from the punishment due to his crime; and the pope granted his request, on condition he would be liberal to the churches and monasteries; for that was the only way then of atoning for sins. It had been better had restitution been enjoined as a necessary condition.

Among the liberalities of Offa to the churches of Rome, we must not omit one of great consequence for England. Ina, king of the West-Saxons, had founded at Rome a college for the education of English youth; for the maintenance of which the founder ordered a penny to be collected yearly of every family in his dominions; which kind of charity was termed Romescot, that is, tribute of Rome, or sent to Rome. Offa extended this tax throughout Mercia and East-Anglia, the lands belonging to the monastery of St. Albans only excepted; and because this money was paid at Rome on a holiday, called St. Peter's ad vincula, this tax was named Peter-pence, instead of Romescot. By this means the directors of the college were abundantly supplied with means to defray the expense they were at from the great concourse of the English, who came to study at Rome; and in process of time, the popes pretending it was a tribute paid by the English to St. Peter and his successors, converted it to their own use, till it was entirely abolished by Henry VIII.

Before Offa left Rome, he obtained of the pope the canonization of St. Alban, the first British martyr, whose relics were pretended to be found at Verulam; and at his return, he built there a fine church and a stately monastery, to which he granted great privileges and a large revenue; and thenceforth Verulam was called St. Albans. Offa was also very munificent to the church of Hereford, where the body of the king of East-Anglia lay buried, that prayers might be incessantly made for the murdered and the murderer.

His dike: the union of East-Anglia to Mercia: the erecting of Lichfield into an archbishopric: the extension of Peter-pence: and the compiling a body of laws published under the title of Mercens Leaga; i. e. Laws of the Mercians, which served for a pattern to his successors, and the greatest part of which were inserted in the great Alfred's laws, published about the end of the next century, render Offa's reign memorable.

He had contracted a close friendship with Charlemagne; and some of their letters are still extant in the life of Offa at the end of Matthew Paris's History.

Offa died in 796, after a reign of thirty-nine years; and Egfrid, who had already been crowned as his partner, succeeded him both in the kingdom of Mercia, and dignity of monarch.

EGFRID.

Egfrid, who survived his father but four or five months, employed that time in enriching the monks, and particularly those of St. Alban's

* This dike may be seen on Brachy-hill, and near Rhyd ar Helig and Lanterden in Herefordshire; and is continued northwards from Knighton over a part of Shropshire into Montgomeryshire, and goes over the long mountain of Kevn Digoth, to Harden-castle, across the Severn and Llan-Drinio Common; from whence it passes the Vyrnwy again into Shropshire, not far from Oswaldstry. In Denbighshire it is visible along the road between Rhywabon and Wrexham, and being continued through Flintshire, ends a little below Holywell, a place formerly the site of the castle of Basingwerk.

Cenulph, descended from Wibba by another branch, succeeded him in both his dignities.

CENULPH.

Cenulph was no sooner on the throne, than he declared war against Edbert-Pren, king of Kent, which proved fatal to the king of Kent, who, being taken prisoner, was carried to Mercia, where Cenulph ordered his eyes to be put out, after he had placed another king on his throne.

Cenulph died in 819, after a reign of twenty-four years; leaving a son very young, named Cenelm, and two daughters, Quendrida and Burganilda.

CENELM.

Quendrida, eldest sister of Cenelm, hoping to mount the throne, if her brother was out of the way, caused him to be assassinated by one Ascobert, who threw his body into a well, where it was found as it is pretended by a miracle; but Quendrida did not derive any benefit from her crime, for the Mercians placed on the throne Ceoluph, uncle of the late king.

CEOLUPH.

This prince, after a year's reign, was deposed by Bernulph, one of the principal lords of the country.

BERNULPH, 821.

LUDICAN, 823.

WITGLAPH, 825.

Very little is recorded of these kings, but what is known will be related in the history of Wessex.

EAST-ANGLIA.

THE kingdom of the East-Angles was bounded on the north by the Humber; on the east by the German Ocean; on the south by the kingdom of Essex; and on the west by Mercia. Its greatest length was eighty, and its greatest breadth fifty-five miles. It contained the two counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, with part of Cambridgeshire. The chief towns were, Norwich, Thetford, Ely, and Cambridge. It has been already related how this kingdom was founded by the Angles, who landed on the eastern coasts of Britain, under twelve chiefs, the survivor of whom, Uffa, assumed the title of king of the East-Angles.

UFFA

Died in 578, leaving his son Titilus to succeed him.

TITILUS.

All that is known of this king is, that he died in 589, and had for his successor his son Redowald.

REDOWALD.

The few particulars which can be gathered of this king, have been given in the history of Northumbria; the protection of Edwin, and the magnanimity he displayed with regard to placing him on the throne of that country, are proofs of this king's possessing a noble mind. He died in 624, leaving his crown to his son Erpwald.

ERPWALD.

Erpwald seems to have been very weak; as he was in continual subjection to Edwin, king of Northumbria; who was in reality the sovereign of East-Anglia, though he left Erpwald the title of king.

Erpwald was assassinated in 633, after he had reigned about nine years.

INTERREGNUM.

After his death, East-Anglia had no king for three years, the reason of which is unknown. In 636 the East-Angles placed on the throne Sigebert, half-brother of their last king.

SIGEBERT.

This prince, who was banished by Erpwald, his brother on the mother's side, on suspicion of aspiring to the crown, had retired into France, where he became a Christian. As soon as he was king of East-Anglia, he endeavoured to convert his subjects to Christianity, which had been planted among them in the reign of Redowald, but was now almost extinguished. After he had effected this by the assistance of Felix, a Burgundian priest, he retired into a monastery, resigning his crown to Egric, his cousin.

EGRIC.

Egric soon after his coronation being attacked by Penda, king of Mercia, the East-Angles, having no great confidence in their new king, petitioned Sigebert to quit his monastery, and put himself at the head of their army; but it was not till he had been repeatedly entreated that he consented; and notwithstanding the extraordinary expectations formed of his assistance, the East-Anglians were defeated, and both their leaders slain. He is said to have headed the army with Egric, carrying nothing but a switch in his hand.

ANNAS.

Annas, son of Ennius, nephew of Redowald, succeeded to the throne; and by his aid, Cenowalch, king of Wessex, who fled to him for refuge, was restored to his kingdom, of which he had been deprived by Penda in 645.

This action drew upon him the hatred of Penda, king of Mercia, who resolved to carry fire and sword into East-Anglia. Annas died whilst he was preparing for his defence, leaving the management of this dangerous war to Ethelric, his brother and successor.

ETHELRIC.

Ethelric, dreading the power of Penda, bribed him with a sum of money to desist from his war with the East-Anglians; and to induce him to invade Northumbria, offered to accompany him with all his forces. It has been already related how they were both slain in an engagement with Oswy. Adawald, brother of Ethelric, mounted the throne after him.

ADELWALD.

Nothing more of this prince is known, than that he died in 664, leaving his crown to Aldulph, his nephew, son of Ethelric.

ALDULPH.

Of this prince all we can learn is, that he was alive in 680, and assisted at the council of Hatfield. His successor was Alfwald.

ALFWALD.

Alfwald died in 749, and was succeeded by Beorna and Ethelbert, who divided the kingdom.

BEORNA AND ETHELBERT.

Ethelbert dying before the year 758, Beorna reigned alone. But we know nothing of him, but that he was succeeded by Ethelred.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred, dying about the year 790, left the crown to Ethelbert.

ETHELBERT.

This is the prince that Offa, king of Mercia, put to death in order to seize his kingdom in 792. From that time East-Anglia and Mercia formed but one kingdom.

ESSEX.

THE kingdom of Essex or the East-Saxons was bounded on the north by East-Anglia; on the east by the German Ocean; on the south by the Thames; and on the west by Mercia. Its greatest length was seventy-five miles, and its breadth thirty-eight. It contained the counties of Essex and Middlesex, and part of Hertfordshire. The principal cities were London and Colchester; the first of which became afterwards the metropolis of all England; it had formerly been very considerable in the time of the Romans, who made it a colony; but in all probability it was much reduced after the arrival of the Saxons.

This country having been extorted from Vortigern by Hengist, was erected into a kingdom by Erchenwin, the first king. Historians have neglected to inform us of the founding of this kingdom, by which the successors of Hengist were deprived of almost as large a tract of land as the kingdom of Kent.

ERCHENWIN.

Erchenwin began his reign in 527, and died in 587, after he had reigned sixty years. He was succeeded by his son Sledda.

SLEDDA.

It is not known in what year this prince died, but only that his son Sabert, or Saba, reigned in 599.

SABERT.

Sabert was the first Christian king of Essex, being converted by the preaching of Mellitus and solicitation of Ethelbert, king of Kent, his uncle by his mother's side. He was noted for his piety and zeal for Christianity; and dying in 616, was succeeded by his three sons.

SAXRED, SEWARD, AND SIGEBERT.

These three princes reigned together; and forsook with one consent the Christian religion, which they had professed during their father's life. After they had reigned seven years, they rashly came to an unequal engagement with Ginigisil and Quicelm, kings of Wessex, and were all three cut off, with their whole army. Their successor was Sigebert the Little.

SIGEBERT THE LITTLE.

Scarcely anything is known concerning this prince, not even the time of his death; all that can be ascertained is, that he was on the throne in the year 653, and was succeeded by Sigebert the Good, grandson of a brother of pious King Sabert.

SIGEBERT THE GOOD.

Sigebert restored the Christian religion in his dominions, from whence it had been expelled ever since the death of Sabert. He was assisted therein by Cedd, a Northumbrian priest, consecrated bishop of the East-Saxons. This prince was assassinated in 655, by two counts, his relations, who, having been excommunicated by Cedd, complained that the king, instead of avenging their quarrel, had cast himself at the feet of the bishop, begging pardon for conversing with them after their excommunication. His successor was Swithelm, his brother.

SWITHELM.

There is nothing particular concerning this prince, except that Sebba and Siger succeeded him.

SEBBA AND SIGER.

Sebba was son of Seward, and Siger of Sigebert the Little, son of the same Seward. Siger returned to idolatry; but Sebba strictly adhered to the Christian religion. They were vassals to the king of Mercia, as was before observed in the reign of Wulfer. Siger dying in 683, Sebba remained sole king of Essex.

SEBBA ALONE.

Sebba reigned about eleven years longer, and then, being very old, became a monk in 694. He left his crown to Sighard and Senofrid, his sons.

SIGHARD AND SENOFRID.

These two brothers reigned, and very probably died, together about the year 705. Offa, son of Siger, mounted the throne after them.

OFFA.

He desired to marry Ciniswitha, daughter of Penda, king of Mercia, and went to the court of Cenred to demand her in marriage; but she, being very religious and not young, persuaded her lover to become a monk; and he consequently went to Rome with his cousin, the king of Mercia, and received the Tonsure at the pope's hands. He is said by some to have been succeeded by Seolred, or Selred, son of Sigebert the Good.

SEOLRED.

Seolred reigned thirty-eight years, and was killed at last, but by whom, or in what manner, is unknown. Swithred, his son, is supposed to have succeeded him.

SWITHRED.

This is the last king of Essex whose name occurs in the Saxon annals. He began his reign in 746, and if he was alive, which is very unlikely, at the time of the union of the Saxon kingdoms, must have reigned seventy-eight years.

KENT.

THE kingdom of Kent was the first that was founded by the Saxons. It was very advantageously situated, having the sea on the south and east; the Thames on the north; and the little kingdom of Sussex on the west. As long as this last subsisted, it served as a bulwark to the kings of Kent, against the ambition of the kings of Wessex; but after Sussex was subdued by the West-Saxons, the kingdom of Kent was in continual danger of falling under the dominion of these powerful neighbours. The truth is, the jealousy between the kings of Wessex and Mercia, and the equality of their forces, were the only things that long prevented this little kingdom from becoming a prey to one of them. It was not above sixty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The chief towns were, Dorobern, or Canterbury, the capital, Dover, Rochester, and some others not so large indeed, but considerable however for their situation and harbours, as Sandwich, Deal, Folkstone, Reculver, &c.

HENGIST, FIRST KING.

Hengist arrived in Great Britain in 449. He assumed the title of king of Kent in 455, and died in 488. He was succeeded by his son Escus.

ESCUS.

As the Saxons, after the death of Hengist, conferred the command of their armies on Ælla, king of Sussex, Escus very likely was not in so great esteem as his father. Nothing remarkable remains concerning his reign, which lasted to the year 512. His successor was Octa, his son.

OCTA.

This prince suffered, or at least could not prevent the dismembering of Essex and Middlesex from the kingdom of Kent, to form the kingdom of the East-Saxons. This is the only particular we meet with during his reign of twenty-two years. After Octa, Hermenric ascended the throne of Kent.

HERMENRIC.

There is nothing particular concerning this prince, who reigned however thirty years. Before his death he associated Ethelbert, his son and successor.

ETHELBERT.

Ethelbert was one of the most celebrated of the Saxon kings. He was the first Christian king of Kent. At his coming to the crown, Ceaulin, king of Wessex, was monarch; but he resolved to dispute it with him, and was twice defeated. After this defeat he remained quiet till the year 593, when he took up arms again, in conjunction with all the other kings, who were displeased with Ceaulin's seizing the kingdom of Sussex; and Ethelbert being declared general, the former was defeated.

After Ceaulin's death, Ethelbert was elected monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, and exercised an almost absolute power over all the kingdoms lying south of the Humber, the Northumbrians alone retaining their independence.

He had the advantage of being allied to France by means of his marriage with Bertha, daughter of Cherebert, king of Paris; which connexion checked the kings his neighbours, who dreaded his introducing the French into England.

Upon the death of Crida, king of Mercia, Ethelbert seized that kingdom, though the deceased king had left a son of fit age to succeed him; and in so doing he trod exactly in the steps of Ceaulin, though he had himself excited the other kings against that monarch, on account of his ambition. Ethelbert pretended he had a right as monarch, or as descendant of Hengist, to succeed to all the vacant thrones; at which the other kings were naturally alarmed; and he dreading they would join in a league against him, as they did against Ceaulin, thought it prudent to make concessions; and therefore restored the kingdom of Mercia to Wibba, son of Crida, reserving however an authority over him.

This prince had two wives, the first was Bertha of France, by whom he had Edbald his successor, and Ethelberga, married to Edwin, king of Northumbria. The name of his second wife is unknown. He died in 616, after he had reigned fifty-two years.

EDBALD.

Edbald was very unlike his father; he forsook the Christian religion, and turned heathen; and is said to have married the queen, his mother-in-law. His vices rendering him slothful and inactive, the other kings cast off the control Ethelbert had acquired; and the monkish historians say that Laurentius, archbishop of Canterbury, brought him to a sense of his errors, and that he spent the remainder of his days in Christian piety. He left two sons, Ermenfred and Ercombert, which last succeeded him, and a daughter named Enswith, foundress of the abbey of Folkstone.

ERCOMBERT.

Ercombert, though the youngest of Edbald's sons, contrived to ascend the throne, in prejudice of his elder brother. He ordered the heathen temples to be razed to the ground, and the idols to be broken in pieces; and Ermenfred, his brother, being seized with a distemper that brought him to his grave, he promised to leave the crown, which of right belonged to him, to his children; but he broke his word. He died in the year 664, leaving two sons, Egbert and Lothair, and two daughters; Ermenilda the eldest was wife of Wulpher, king of Mercia: the other was a nun.

EGBERT.

Egbert was no sooner on the throne, than he put two sons of his uncle Ermenfrid to death, for fear they should disturb him in the possession of the crown; and presented their sister Domnena with some lands in the isle of Thanet, where she founded a monastery. He died in 673, leaving two sons, Edric and Widred, who were not his immediate successors, the crown being seized by their uncle Lothair.

LOTHAIR.

After Lothair had reigned ten years unmolested, in order to secure the succession of his family, he made his son Richard partner with him in the government. Upon which his nephew Edric, son of his brother Egbert, withdrew from his court, and applied to Edelwalch, king of Sussex, for aid, who put him at the head of an army; with which entering Kent, he vanquished Lothair, who died of the wounds he received in the battle. After this victory, Edric was crowned without opposition; and Richard, son of Lothair, fled into Germany, where Boniface, archbishop of Mentz, an Englishman, gave him his sister in marriage, and caused him to be elected king of Suabia, if we may believe some historians. It is not known how he came to die at Lucca in Tuscany, where his tomb is still to be seen; on which he is styled king of England, though he was but for a time king of Kent.

EDRIC.

This prince reigned but two years, and as he had no children, left the crown to his brother Widred, who made Swabert his partner, whose extraction is unknown.

WIDRED AND SWABERT

After Edric's death, great commotions arose in the kingdom of Kent, occasioned by the ambition of some nobles who combined together, and refused to acknowledge Widred for king. In all probability Swabert was one of the principal of the rebels, since he was associated into the government; but it is not known whether he was any way related to the royal family.

In the reign of these two kings, Cedwallo, king of the West-Saxons, imagining the intestine divisions of Kent would render the kingdom an easy conquest, sent an army thither under the command of his brother Mollon, who overran great part of the country; but at length, the two kings joining forces, vanquished him in battle; and Mollon being closely pursued, took shelter with twelve others in a house which they valiantly defended: but the Kentish soldiers setting fire to it, they all miserably perished in the flames. Cedwallo soon revenged the death of his brother, whom he sincerely loved; and entered Kent with a formidable army, and destroyed the whole country with fire and sword. After this invasion, Kent was so much reduced, that it never regained its importance. Swabert died in 695, and Widred remained sole king of Kent.

WIDRED alone.

He reigned twelve years alone, and died in 725, leaving three sons, Ethelbert, Edbert, and Aldric: the two eldest jointly succeeded him.

ETHELBERT AND EDBERT.

These two brothers reigned together till the year 748, when Edbert died.

ETHELBERT alone.

This prince, after a reign of thirty-six years, left his crown to his brother Aldric. He had associated his son Ardulph, who died before him.

ALDRIC.

Aldric was frequently attacked by his neighbours; and Offa, king of Mercia, gained a decisive victory over him, but the other kings would not suffer Offa to become master of the kingdom.

Aldric had associated his son Alcmund, but that prince dying before him, he left no heirs, and with him ended the race of Hengist. After his death, Edbert, surnamed Pren, was placed on the throne.

EDBERT-PREN.

The kingdom of Kent being extremely weakened, Cenulph, king of Mercia, ravaged it from one end to the other; and at last having defeated and taken Edbert prisoner, carried him into Mercia, where he ordered his eyes to be put out; after which he placed on the throne Cudred, who paid him tribute.

CUDRED.

This tributary king reigned eight years as vassal of the king of Mercia, who permitted, after his death in 805, his son Baldred to succeed him.

BALDRED.

In the reign of Baldred the octarchy was dissolved. The dissolution began with the conquest of Kent by Egbert, king of Wessex; as will be seen hereafter.

SUSSEX.

THE kingdom of Sussex was one of the most considerable of the heptarchy. It contained only the two counties of Sussex and Surrey, the greatest part of which consisted of the large forest of Andredswald, so called by the Saxons from Anderida, the name it had in the time of the Romans. As this forest stood untouched when Ælla conquered Sussex, we may suppose it was cleared by degrees. This kingdom was not above fifty miles long and forty broad. It was bounded on the north by the Thames, on the south by the sea, on the east by the kingdom of Kent, and on the west by Wessex. The capital city was Chichester, built by Cissa the second king of this kingdom, who also built Cissbury, whose ruins are still to be seen.

ÆLLA, FIRST KING.

Ælla arrived in Britain in 476, and was crowned king of Sussex in 491. He was a chief of so much reputation among the Saxons, that they judged him worthy to succeed Hengist in the command of their armies; yet notwithstanding he was frequently defeated by the Britons under Arthur, but not sufficiently to prevent his settling in the country where he first landed, and founding there the kingdom of Sussex or of the South-Saxons. He died in 514, leaving the crown to his only surviving son Cissa.

CISSA.

Cissa was memorable only for his long reign of seventy-six years, and his great age. For supposing him but a year or two old when his father brought him over in 476, he must have been at least one hundred and fifteen, or one hundred and sixteen years of age when he died in 590. But it is not very likely Ælla should bring with him a child of a year old.

Cissa leaving no issue, Ceaulin, king of Wessex and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, seized the kingdom of Sussex; which occasioned the league against him. But notwithstanding his being vanquished, Ceolric, his nephew and successor, remained in possession of Sussex.

From that time the South-Saxons made several attempts to shake off the control of the kings of Wessex; and herein properly consists the history of Sussex, till the kingdom was entirely subdued.

In 607 they revolted against Ceolric, king of Wessex, but were reduced to obedience. In 684, however, they made another struggle with better success; when Cenowalch, king of Wessex, continuing still in East-Anglia, and Penda, king of Mercia, being master of Wessex, they took the opportunity to place on their throne a king named Adelwalch.

ADELWALCH.

The kingdom of Wessex having suffered much by Penda's invasion, who seized and kept it three years, Cenowalch was little able, after his restoration, to dethrone the new king of Sussex. But Adelwalch, however, was not left in peace. Wulpher, king of Mercia, having attacked Cenowalch and defeated him in several encounters, penetrated as far as Sussex, where vanquishing Adelwalch in battle, he took him prisoner, and after that, became master of his kingdom, and the Isle of Wight. Adelwalch having embraced the Christian religion in Mercia, where he was prisoner, Wulpher set him at liberty, and made him a present of the Isle of Wight; and it is very probable, that after the death of Wulpher, he recovered the kingdom of Sussex, since we find in the Saxon annals that he was on the throne in 686.

The same year Cedwalla, a West-Saxon fugitive prince, entered Sussex with an army, and Adelwalch endeavouring to drive him thence, was slain in battle.

After his death, Cedwalla would have made himself master of Sussex, but was opposed by Authun and Berthun, who had returned with an army from an expedition in the kingdom of Kent. At the same time, Cedwalla, hearing of the death of the king of Wessex, who had expelled him his dominions, returned thither, and was placed on the throne; and Authun and Berthun, in the mean time, were crowned kings of Sussex. They are said by some to be sons of Adelwalch, and by others his generals only.

AUTHUN AND BERTHUN

These two kings did not live long undisturbed. Cedwalla, now become king of Wessex, made war upon them, and gained a battle, wherein Berthun was slain.

AUTHUN ALONE.

Authun very probably preserved the crown of Sussex, by an entire dependence on the king of Wessex, who, after the death of Authun, would not suffer the vacant throne to be filled.

The South-Saxons made several attempts to recover their liberty; and took up arms in 722, but unsuccessfully; as Ina, king of Wessex, reduced them to obedience.

Three years after, taking advantage of some dissensions in Wessex, they placed on the throne a king named Albert; but Ina having defeated and slain the new king, united their kingdom to his own.

This did not, however, prevent them, in 754, in the reign of Sigebert, king of Wessex, from revolting once more, and choosing one Osmond for their king; but Cenulph, successor of Sigebert, found means to reduce them again to a state of dependence; and from that time the South-Saxons appear never to have attempted to recover their liberty, their country being considered ever after as a province of Wessex.

WESSEX.

WESSEX, inhabited by Saxons and Jutes, was situated south of the Thames, in breadth about seventy miles, from the Thames to the British Channel; and in length one hundred and fifty, from the frontiers of Sussex to the river Tamar, which parted it from Cornwall. The principal cities were Winchester, the capital, Southampton, Portsmouth, Salisbury, Dorchester, Sherborn, and Exeter, where a great many Britons were mixed with the Saxons. The Isle of Wight, inhabited by Jutes, was also dependent on this kingdom.

As each kingdom of the Saxons derived its name from the inhabitants and situation, the kingdom of Wessex, or of the West-Saxons, was so called, because it lay west of Sussex, Kent, and Essex. Besides the extent, the situation of this kingdom made it very considerable. It was guarded on the north by the Thames, and on the south by the sea; on the east it was bounded by the little kingdom of Sussex, not at all formidable to its neighbours; and on the west by the Britons of Cornwall, divided so from the rest of their countrymen the Welsh, by the mouth of the Severn, that it was almost impossible for them to assist one another.

CERDIC.

This prince, of whom much mention has been already made, arrived in Britain in the year 495, and was crowned the first time king of the West-Saxons in 519, after Arthur had surrendered to him the two counties of Hampshire and Somersetshire, the whole then of this kingdom. He was crowned a second time at Winchester in 532 or 533, by the same title, upon the delivery of Berkshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, and Dorsetshire, by Modred. He died in 534, leaving his crown to his son Cenric.

CENRIC.

Cenric, who during his father's life was renowned for his valour and ability, after he was king, pursued a peaceable life. He defeated the Britons, who ventured to attack him in 552, and dying in 560, was succeeded by Ceaulin, his eldest son.

CEAULIN.

Ceaulin being elected monarch after his father's death, carried the prerogatives of that dignity to a very great height. Having brought the neighbouring princes into subjection, he made them apprehensive, by seizing the kingdom of Sussex after Cissa's death, that he intended to reduce all England into one kingdom. The better to secure Sussex, he went and kept his court at Chichester, leaving the government of Wessex to Ceolric, his nephew, whom he designed for his successor; but his ambition caused all the other kings, Ceolric himself not excepted, to enter into a league against him; and he was vanquished by the king of Kent, who commanded the confederate army, and fled to some unknown retreat, where he ended his days. His wars with the Britons and Aidan, king of Scotland, have been already related.

CEOLRIC.

Nothing particular occurs concerning this prince after his accession to the throne upon the death of his uncle Ceaulin. He died in 598, and was succeeded by his brother Ceoluph.

CEOLUPH.

All we know of this prince is, that in 607 he reduced to obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted; and died in 611, having for his successor Cinigisil, his nephew, son of Ceolric.

CINIGISIL.

A year after his coronation, Cinigisil associated Quicelm, his brother, or rather divided with him the kingdom of Wessex.

CINIGISIL AND QUICELM.

These two brothers obtained, in 614, a signal victory over the Britons.

Quicelm became a Christian a little before his death, which happened in 635.

CINIGISIL ALONE

This prince, who had embraced the Christian religion some time before his brother, reigned alone till his death. He left his crown to his son Cenowalch.

CENOWALCH

The reign of Cenowalch was much disturbed with his wars with the kings of Mercia; and Penda, whose sister he had married and divorced, attacked him when he least expected it, and compelled him to abandon his kingdom, and fly for refuge to Annas, king of the East-Angles, where he remained the three years Penda kept possession of Wessex. Cenowalch was converted to Christianity in East-Anglia, and at length restored to his kingdom by the assistance of Annas.

In 652 he obtained a victory over the Britons, which was followed by another in 658; and some years after, he was engaged in a war with Wulpher, successor of Penda: but which was the aggressor, or what was the success of the war, is uncertain. Wulpher according to some accounts, was defeated and taken prisoner; but others affirm he had entirely the advantage, which seems most probable, as it is certain Wulpher conquered Sussex and the Isle of Wight, which he could not have done if Cenowalch had been in condition to oppose him. Cenowalch died in 672, and left his crown to his queen Sexburga.

SEXBURGA,

A princess of great courage and ability, according to some authors, reigned but one year, and then died; but according to others, she was deposed by the West-Saxons, who thought it a dishonour to obey a woman.

After the death or expulsion of Sexburga, the kingdom was divided among several of the great men, of whom Cenfus, a prince of the royal blood, descended from Cerdic, was the chief. Nothing more particular is known concerning this dismembering of the kingdom, which, however, was united again into one body, after these petty tyrants were either dead or expelled.

CENFUS, ESCWIN, AND CENTWIN.

In 674, Cenfus associated his son Escwin, and probably was compelled to let Centwin, brother to the late King Cenowalch, reign also over some part of the kingdom.

The next year Wulpher attacked the kings of Wessex, whose army was commanded by Escwin; and a bloody battle was fought, in which Wulpher had the advantage; though the loss on both sides was very great.

Cenfus died two years after, and Escwin, his son, did not long survive him; and thus Centwin remained sole king of Wessex.

CENTWIN alone.

The old chroniclers inform us, that in 682 Centwin obtained a victory over the Welsh, upon which Cadwallader their king was compelled to go and sue for assistance from the king of Armorica: and they add, that the Welsh prince afterwards took a journey to Rome, where he died.

About the end of Centwin's reign, Cedwalla, a prince of the blood-royal of Wessex, had so gained the people's affection, that the king being jealous of him, ordered him to depart the kingdom; and as Cedwalla could not dispute the king's command, he retired into Sussex, and being very popular, a great many young people chose to accompany him, and follow his fortune, insomuch that he entered Sussex with a sort of army. Adelwalch, then king of Sussex, angry at Cedwalla's presuming to enter his dominions in a warlike manner, and without his permission, attempted to drive him thence, but was slain in the fight. After this victory, Cedwalla would have seized the kingdom, but was prevented by Authun and Berthun; and about the same time, Centwin happening to die, he returned to Wessex, and was placed on the throne.

CEDWALLA.

Cedwalla was not only king of Wessex, but likewise monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. His first war was with Authun and Berthun, kings of Sussex; which having ended to his advantage, he turned his arms against Kent, from whence he carried off a great booty. He then attacked the Isle of Wight, which belonged to the king of Sussex ever since Wulpher's grant to Adelwalch; and Arwald, brother to Authun, being then governor of the isle, undertook its defence: but as Cedwalla's forces were much superior to his, he was compelled to abandon the isle to the mercy of the conqueror. The inhabitants being yet idolaters, Cedwalla, through a false zeal for religion, resolved to root them out, and people the island with Christians; which barbarous resolution he would have executed, had not Wilfrid, formerly bishop of York, and then bishop of Selsey, in Sussex, represented to him that it would be much better to endeavour to convert them. Upon the bishop's remonstrances, Cedwalla relented, but on condition the inhabitants would be instantly baptized; and the poor wretches, who had no time to deliberate, embraced the Christian religion at the first preaching of Birwin, a priest, nephew of Wilfrid, who was entrusted with their conversion, if the bare declaration of people threatened with death, in case of refusal, may be called by that name.

Some time after, Cedwalla sent his brother Molon with an army into Kent; whose death there, and the terrible manner Cedwalla revenged it, have already been related in the history of that kingdom.

At length, Cedwalla, in 688, resolved to take a journey to Rome, to receive baptism at the hands of the pope; for although he was a Christian and a great zealot, he had never been baptized. As he travelled through France and Lombardy, he was everywhere very honourably received; and Cunibert, king of the Lombards, was particularly remarkable for the noble entertainment he gave him. When he came to Rome, he was baptized by Pope Sergius II., who gave him the name of Peter. He had always expressed a wish to die soon after his baptism, and his desire was gratified, for he died a few weeks after, at Rome; and was buried at St. Peter's church, where a stately tomb was erected to his memory, with an epitaph showing his name, quality, age, and time of his death. He left, by Cendrith, his queen, two sons, who did not succeed him, by reason of their tender age. Ina, his cousin, mounted the throne after him.

INA.

Of all the kings that reigned in England during the octarchy, Ina was one of the most famous and illustrious: he must have been of great repute, since the same year he was crowned he was declared monarch of the Anglo-Saxons in a general assembly, where Sebba, king of Essex, his friend, served him effectually.

Ina's wars with the Britons in Cornwall, the kings of Kent, the South-Saxons, and king of Mercia, rendered his valour, merit, and abilities, more and more conspicuous. But as historians have only told us the success, without mentioning the motives and circumstances of these wars it is impossible to give a particular account of them. They only inform us that he carried his arms into Kent, from whence nothing could drive him but the bribing him with a large sum of money; that in 710, he conquered part of Cornwall: that in 715, Ina and Coelred fought a bloody battle at Wodensburgh in Wiltshire, with equal loss on both sides: and that, lastly, he reduced to obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted, and placed one Albert on their throne.

These are the military exploits that gained Ina his reputation for war: but the panegyrics bestowed on him by historians, were not owing to these so much as to four other particulars, which to them seemed of greater importance, and which they have chiefly dwelt on. First, he rebuilt Glastonbury monastery, and augmented the revenues and privileges in such a manner, that it became one of the most considerable in all England. In the second place, he published a body of laws, entitled, West-Saxon Leaga, that is, Laws of the West-Saxons, which served for foundation to that published in the next century, by Alfred the Great, his successor. Thirdly, Ina signalized his piety by quitting his crown and turning monk, which was then looked upon as an undoubted mark of religion: which resolution was taken by the persuasions of his queen, Ethelburga, who had prepared him for it by frequently representing to him the examples of so many kings, his predecessors, that had done so before, and were honoured as saints. But what contributed most to Ina's fame, was that before he shut himself up in a monastery, he went to Rome, where after conferring with Pope Gregory II., he built a large college, for the instruction and reception of the English ecclesiastics that should come to study at Rome, and for the entertainment and lodging of the kings and princes of the same nation, that should visit the tombs of the Apostles. Adjoining to the college, he built also a stately church, and appointed a certain number of priests to officiate: and besides the charge of the buildings, of the ornaments of the church, and of the necessities of the college, there was an absolute necessity of settling a standing fund for their maintenance, according to the intent of the founder; which Ina had provided for by laying a tax of a penny on every family in the kingdom of Wessex and Sussex, which was to be sent yearly to Rome, under the name of Romescot. Some time after Offa, king of Mercia, imposed the same tax on the kingdom of Mercia and East-Anglia, and termed it Peter-pence, as we have already related. Some say, Ina returned into England to have this tax settled by the general assembly, or parliament of Wessex, and to get the charter signed by all the nobility of the kingdom; after which he returned to Rome, where he took upon him the monkish habit. Ethelburga, who advised him to it only because she had determined to become a nun herself, put on the veil in the monastery of Barking.

Malmsbury is mistaken in saying Ina was sixty-two years on the throne of Wessex, since it is certain he had reigned but thirty-seven, or at most but thirty-nine years when he resigned his crown to his cousin Adelard.

ADELARD.

Though Adelard was placed on the throne with the consent of the assembly-general, Oswald, one of the royal family, disputed the possession of it with him; and their quarrel was decided by a battle, wherein the king was victorious over his rival, whose death, which happened shortly after, restored peace and tranquillity to the kingdom. Adelard died in 740, and was succeeded by Cudred, his brother or cousin.

CUDRED.

We have only the following particulars of the reign of Cudred: for we must not expect to find any connexion between the facts related by the historians, or annalists.

In 743, this prince obtained a signal victory over the Britons in Cornwall; and two years after, Ethelun, a West-Saxon nobleman, dissatisfied with the king, raised a sedition among the soldiers, in which Cenric, son of Cudred, was slain. This action was followed by a civil war, which lasted some time; until Ethelun, the chief of the rebels, gave his sovereign battle, wherein the king, though not without great danger of being vanquished, gained the victory. During the fight, Ethelun gave such proofs of an undaunted courage, and extraordinary ability, that the king chose rather to receive him into favour, than destroy a subject that might be serviceable to him. This was the same Ethelun who, in 752, vanquished Ethelbald, king of Mercia, in a battle mentioned in the history of that kingdom.

Cudred again turned his victorious troops against the Britons of Cornwall, and conquered part of their country, which he united to Wessex. He died shortly after, and left his crown to his nephew Sigebert.

SIGEBERT

Sigebert was very unlike his predecessor; by his vices and cruelties he drew on himself the hatred and contempt of his subjects. A certain chief having expostulated with him concerning his conduct, he ordered him to be put to death in his presence; and his subjects being indignant at such conduct, deposed him, and placed on the throne Cenulph, son of Adelard. Sigebert finding he could have no redress, was compelled to submit to the sentence of the states, fled himself to a forest, where he was killed by a swineherd.

CENULPH.

Cenulph became very famous for his frequent victories over the Britons; but after he had reigned thirty years, he grew jealous of Cunehard, brother of Sigebert, and perhaps not without reason. Cunehard having notice of the king's suspicions, and knowing he intended to dispatch him out of the way, resolved to prevent him; and to this end, discovering him one day, as he went alone to visit a certain lady whom he admired, he followed him, with some of his friends, into the house and attacked him. Cenulph defended himself furiously, and even wounded his enemy, but at last, overpowered with numbers, sank down with his wounds. The king's officers and domestics running in at the noise, and finding him dead, fell upon Cunehard and slew him, not regarding the large offers he made them to spare his life, and place him on the throne. Brithric, son of Cenulph, succeeded his father.

BRITHRIC.

Brithric, three years after he was on the throne, married Edburga, daughter of Offa, king of Mercia, and about the same time banished Egbert the kingdom. Egbert, a prince of the royal family, by his noble qualities had gained the affection of the West-Saxons to such a degree, that the king could not help being jealous of his popularity, which was a sufficient excuse to banish him. Egbert retired at first to the court of Offa, king of Mercia; but did not meet there with the reception he expected, Offa being unwilling to disoblige his son-in-law Brithric, by harbouring a prince that was hateful to him. Whereupon Egbert resolved to retire into France, where he was very courteously received by Charlemagne, who showed him, on several occasions, marks of his esteem. During Egbert's twelve years' abode at this prince's court, he gained great information, and rendered himself capable of executing the grand design of uniting the various kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons into one monarchy.

During the reign of Brithric, the Danes made their first descent in the kingdom of Wessex; and began to be formidable, not only at sea, but on the coasts of several European kingdoms. As in process of time, they had a great effect on English affairs, it is not without reason that historians have been very exact in marking the time of their first descent.

Brithric, in 799, was poisoned by Edburga, his wife; and the West-Saxons were so incensed at this action, that before they proceeded to the election of a new king, they made a law prohibiting the wives of their future kings from taking the title of queen, and sitting on the throne with their husbands; and lest the affection of the kings to their wives might occasion the breaking of this law, it was further enacted, "that hereafter, if any king of Wessex should dispense with the observance of it, he should, ipso facto, be deprived of his royal rights, and his subjects absolved from their oath of allegiance."

An honourable embassy was sent by the West-Saxons to offer the crown to Egbert, who was then at Rome with Charlemagne.

Queen Edburga having left Wessex upon poisoning her husband, fled also to Charlemagne, who, in consideration of the friendship between him and her father Offa, gave her a rich abbey, where she might have spent the remainder of her days in peace; but she was detected in an intrigue with a young Englishman, and the emperor was compelled to send her away; and she wandered about from place to place for some time, and at last ended her days in great want at Pavia.

EGBERT.

Egbert, besides the courage natural to all the Saxon princes, had great knowledge in politics, acquired during his abode at the court of Charlemagne. He was no sooner on the throne of Wessex, than he perceived himself superior to the other kings, and he resolved to indulge his ambitious desires. Being prudent and politic, he determined to proceed by degrees in the execution of his projects; and accordingly, spent the first seven years of his reign in settling the affairs of his kingdom, and in making himself popular with his own subjects, in which he completely succeeded.

The kingdom of Wessex being bounded on the south by the sea, and on the north by the Thames, Egbert must of course begin the extending his borders either eastwards or westwards. To the east lay the kingdom of Kent, which would have been very convenient for him; but as this kingdom was then in subjection to Cenulph, king of Mercia, a prince of distinguished worth, and monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, he avoided it, and carried his arms first towards the west, against the Britons of Cornwall; where his success was so great in a war undertaken in 809, that in one campaign he reduced all Cornwall to his obedience.

The Welsh intending to assist their brethren in Cornwall, gave Egbert a pretence to attack them the next year. He defeated them several times, and at last subdued Venedocia, one of the three kingdoms Wales was then divided into. The struggles of the Welsh afterwards to shake off their yoke, served only to make it the heavier; for Egbert, on re-entering their country, destroyed all with fire and sword.

At length, the death of Cenulph, in the year 819, gave Egbert an opportunity to execute his grand design of uniting the various kingdoms. He was immediately invested with the dignity of monarch, to which none had a better claim than himself: his kingdom was in a flourishing condition, whilst the rest, weakened by intestine divisions, daily lost somewhat of their power: they were already reduced to five, of which he possessed one of the most considerable; and in the other four, the race of their ancient kings being extinct, nothing ensued but dissensions. Egbert therefore resolved to reduce them to one kingdom; a project which almost all the preceding monarchs had aimed at. Everything conspired to favour Egbert: Northumbria had been long rent by two factions, who were only watching opportunities to supplant one another. Mercia was in no better condition: Bernulph, who had deposed Ceolwulph, was supported by a party which, though strong enough to raise him to, could not sustain him on, the throne: the wars of the kings of Kent with the West-Saxons and Mercians had reduced them so much, that they could not avoid being tributary to the king of Mercia, and consequently were not in a condition to withstand Egbert: and as for the kingdom of Essex, besides the probability of its being in subjection to Mercia, it had long made but a very inconsiderable figure, and if it was still governed by Swithred, which is uncertain, that prince must have been extremely old.

Egbert's preparations raised suspicions in the king of Mercia, who conceived it to be the best policy to attack Egbert before his preparations were completed, and he accordingly advanced with his army as far as Ellandunum, near Salisbury, where, contrary to his expectation, he met his enemy, whom he thought to have surprised. The two armies coming to an engagement, the Mercians were routed with so great a loss, that it was not possible for Bernulph ever to retrieve it.

This victory procured Egbert two great advantages. It very much weakened the king of Mercia, and it opened the way to the conquest of Kent, for which Bernulph himself had given a pretence, by attacking him first. By beginning the execution of his designs with the kingdom of Kent, he was the less apprehensive of alarming the Northumbrians, who were too remote (such was the state of the country) to concern themselves with what was transacting beyond the Thames.

Egbert sent his son Ethelwolph with a powerful army into Kent. Baldred, unprepared against an invasion, having urged in vain the king of Mercia to assist him, hazarded a battle alone; and being vanquished retired into Mercia, leaving his kingdom to Egbert, who became master of it without any difficulty. Thus the kingdom of Kent was united to those of Wessex and Sussex, and Egbert was in possession of the whole country lying south of the Thames.

Egbert rendered himself also master of the kingdom of Essex; which is all the account of the conquest of that kingdom that has been transmitted to us; so imperfect is the history of these transactions.

The chief means Egbert employed in conquering the Mercians were the East-Anglians, who since their subjugation had been harshly treated. He fomented their inclination to regain their independence, and they revolting, defeated Bernulph in a battle in which he lost his life. The Mercians maintained the contest for some time, and finally chose Witglaph as their king; on which occasion Egbert openly declared himself the ally and protector of the East-Anglians, and, according to the usual mode of political friendship, made both kingdoms tributary to him.

Northumbria, which now alone remained free from the dominion of Egbert, was but little able to preserve its liberty; Andred, who then reigned, was a king in name only: it was rent by parties, and frequently invaded by the Scots: and consequently, when Egbert approached with an army that had already conquered four kingdoms, Andred and the Northumbrians, unable to make the least opposition, submitted, and accepted of the terms granted the Mercians and East-Anglians.

Thus ended the octarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, by the reduction of the various kingdoms in the year 827. Indeed, Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumbria, preserved a shadow of liberty; but very probably Egbert would not have suffered other kings to be chosen, after the death of those who were then on the throne, if the Danes, who shortly after began their invasions, had given him time to complete his projects.

The government of the various Saxon kingdoms, reckoning from the founding of the kingdom of Mercia, the last of the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms, continued two hundred and forty-three years. But if the time spent by the Saxons in their conquests be added, from the arrival of Hengist to that of Crida, they will be found to have lasted three hundred and seventy-eight years.

The causes of the dissolution of the octarchy are very apparent; the great inequality in extent and power amongst the kingdoms; the default of male heirs, in all except Wessex; the continual jealousies and ambition of each petty monarch; and the warlike and barbarous state of society, all combined to weaken each individual kingdom, and render each of them a prey to any politic and able man who knew how to concentrate his own and divide their power. Such was Egbert, and he taking advantage of all these circumstances, erected England into a monarchy.

The State of the Church of England, from the Conversion of the English to the Dissolution of the Heptarchy.

IN order to have a clear and distinct knowledge of the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, England must be considered as divided into distinct kingdoms. These kingdoms being converted at different times, it will be necessary to treat of each by itself.

THE CHURCH OF KENT.

Ethelbert, by his alliance with Bertha of France, was induced to favour Christianity, and in this favourable juncture it was that Pope Gregory I. sent missionaries into England to instruct the English in the knowledge of the Gospel.

According to Bede, about eighteen or twenty years before their arrival, some young children were sent from Deira to Rome to be sold, which trade was then commonly carried on by the English, who made no scruple of selling their offspring. These young slaves, remarkable for their comeliness, being exposed to sale in the public market, drew the attention of Gregory, archdeacon of Rome, who inquired particularly after the place of their birth, and the religion there professed. As soon as he knew they were English,* and born of idolatrous parents, he resolved to go and preach the Gospel to that nation; and having obtained the pope's licence, prepared for his journey. But the Romans, who had a great veneration for him, petitioned the pope not to deprive them of so useful a pastor; and the pope forbid his departure, and thus Gregory's design remained unexecuted until about eighteen years after, when he became bishop of Rome. His office prevented his coming to England in person, but he selected forty Benedictine monks, with Austin at their head, in quality of abbot. Most probably Bertha had acquainted the pope how well affected Ethelbert was to Christianity, as they were ordered to land in Kent. Austin and his companions having passed through France, where they were supplied with interpreters, arrived at the Isle of Thanet in the year of our Lord 597. As soon as they were landed, he sent the king word that he was come into his dominions with a company of good men, to bring him a message of the greatest importance, and instruct him in what would procure him everlasting happiness. Ethelbert ordered them to stay where they were, designing to go himself and hear from their own mouths the occasion of their journey; and some few days after, he went to the Isle of Thanet, in company with the queen, who, in all probability, was not ignorant of the reason of Austin's coming. As soon as the king arrived, he seated himself in the open air, being apprehensive, as Bede says, of charms or spells, which in the open field, he thought, could have no power over him. Then ordering the strangers to be called before him, he asked them what they had to propose; and Austin made a long harangue, preaching the Gospel in a forcible and

* Bede has either invented, or else heard that Pope Gregory made divers Latin allusions upon the answers to his questions concerning those boys. Particularly being told they were Angli, he replied, "Bene, nam angelicam habent faciem." "Ah, indeed, they have angels' countenances!" Hence some have imagined (particularly Verstegan), that the name of Angli comes from Angelus, an angel. Whereas, it is plain their being called Angli gave occasion to Gregory's pun.

zealous manner. Ethelbert, informed by the interpreters what Austin had said, returned him this answer: "Your proposals are noble, and your promises inviting. But I cannot resolve upon quitting the religion of my ancestors, for one that appears to me supported only by the testimony of persons that are entire strangers to me. However, since, as I perceive, you have undertaken so long a journey on purpose to impart to us what you deem most important and valuable, you shall not be sent away without some satisfaction. I will take care you are treated hospitably in my dominions, and supplied with all things necessary and convenient. And if any of my subjects, convinced by what you shall say to them, desire to embrace your religion, I shall not oppose it."

This first step being gained, the queen obtained leave for the missionaries to settle at Canterbury, the capital of Kent; and in a short time several of the principal Saxons embraced the Christian faith. The swift progress of the Gospel at Canterbury, raised the king's curiosity to be more particularly instructed in the nature of the religion the strangers preached; and at last, by the persuasions of the queen, and frequent conferences with Austin, he received baptism, about a year after the arrival of the missionaries. The conversion of the king being followed by that of multitudes of his subjects, the queen's chapel, which stood without the city, soon became too small to hold them; and therefore they were obliged to turn one of the heathen temples into a church, which was dedicated to St. Pancrace. Shortly after, several other temples were served in the same manner by Ethelbert's order, and the foundations of Canterbury cathedral were laid; which was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and was afterwards called St. Thomas. Austin began also a monastery, which he did not see finished; and Peter, one of his companions, was the first abbot. It was called the monastery of St. Augustin, from its founder. Ethelbert at length leaving Canterbury to the Italian monks went and kept his court at Reculver.

Thus began the conversion of the Saxons in England, a blessing their brethren in Germany enjoyed not till 200 years after, in the reign of Charlemagne. Ethelbert promoted to his utmost the conversion of his subjects, but without using the least violence or compulsion, having learnt of his instructors, as Bede expressly observes, that God requires none to serve him but those who do it with a willing mind. It were to be wished all Christian princes would follow his example! The Saxons were so eager to embrace the Gospel, that, if historians may be credited, Austin, in one day, baptized 10,000 in the river Swale, which runs into the Thames.

The letters of Austin, and the accounts of those he had sent, inspired Gregory with so high an idea of this mission, that looking upon the conversion of the English as accomplished, though it was but just begun, he sent the pall to Austin,*

* The pall is a white piece of woollen cloth, made round at the ends, and thrown over the shoulders. Upon this are two others of the same matter and form, one of which falls down on the breast, and the other on the back, with each of them a red cross, several crosses of the same colour being likewise upon the upper part of it about the shoulders. This pall is laid upon St. Peter's tomb by the pope, and sent away to the respective metropolitans, which, till they have received from the see of Rome, they cannot call a council, bless the chrism as a mark of distinction and honour. He ordered him also to erect bishops' sees in several places, particularly at York, where was to be a metropolitan with twelve suffragans, and that after the death of one of the two archbishops, the survivor should consecrate another in his place, and have the precedence of him. The reason of this preference with regard to York, was, because it had formerly, under the Romans, been an archbishopric as well as London and Caerleon. As for this last, it being then in the hands of the Britons, and already an archbishop's see, though not under the pope's jurisdiction, there was no occasion to mention it. Gregory's intent, therefore, in making London an archbishopric, was to restore things to their former state. He, however, afterwards altered his measures at the instance of Austin, who was desirous of procuring that honour for Canterbury, the metropolis of Kent, where he had begun to exercise his ministerial functions. The pope's view then, it appears, was only to put things upon an ancient footing, when, in his answer to Austin, he told him he meant that the two archbishops of London and York should be independent of one another, but that Austin, during life, should have jurisdiction, as well over them as all the rest of the bishops of Great Britain.

But all the pains Gregory took, produced but little effect at the time, and the Christian religion was still far enough from extending to Northumbria. However, the great hopes he had conceived from the letters and messengers of Austin, induced him to give directions concerning the English churches, as if they had been really formed; and besides these general orders, he exhorted Austin, in the same letter, not to be elated at his having received from heaven the gift of miracles, which makes it probable word had been sent him that several miracles had been wrought by Austin. He also charged him not to pull down such idol temples as were fit to be converted into churches, but to consecrate them by sprinkling holy-water, and placing relics under the altars; and as the Saxons had been accustomed to offer sacrifices to their gods on their festival days, he advised that (upon the anniversary of the saints, whose relics were lodged there, or upon the return of the day of the church's consecration) they should kill some cattle, and provide an entertainment, to which they were to invite the poor. At the same time he wrote to Ethelbert and Bertha, exhorting them to persevere in the true religion, and promote the great work undertaken by Austin. Peter and Laurence, accompanied with Mellitus, Paulinus, Ruffinianus, and some other new missionaries, brought back these letters, together with sacred vessels, and ornaments for the altars, vestments for the priests, relics, books, and other things necessary for celebrating divine service. Austin received also the resolution of the questions he had sent to the pope, some of which, with their answers, were to the following effect:—

I. How are bishops to behave with respect to their clergy? Into how many portions are the offerings at the altar to be divided? And how ought a bishop to act in the church?

consecrate churches, or a bishop, ordain a priest, &c. At the delivery of it they are to swear fealty to the pope. The ancient pall, from the Latin pallium, was an entire and magnificent habit, designed to put the bishop in mind that his life should answer up to the dignity of his appearance

For satisfaction in the first point, the pope refers him to St. Paul's epistle to Timothy. To the second, he answers, that it was the custom of the church to divide the offerings into four parts, one for the bishop; another for the clergy; a third for the poor; and a fourth for the repairs of the churches. As to the last article, which would have been very obscure had not the pope explained it in his answer, he replies, that Austin being a monk, ought not to live apart from the rest of the clergy, but according to the practice of the Primitive Christians, should have all things in common.* He adds, if there were any clerks not admitted into holy orders, who desired they might marry, and receive the stipends at their own houses, according to the words of Scripture, distribution was made to each of them according to every one's wants. As for other Christians, he says, there was no need to prescribe any rules in relation to their almsgiving, since our Saviour himself says, give alms of such things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

II. Since there is but one faith, how comes it that there are different customs in churches, one manner of saying mass in the Roman, and another in the Gallican church?

The pope advises him to select from each church, what he thought most convenient for the church of England.

III. What punishment ought to be inflicted on him that has stolen any thing from the church?

Gregory replies, the motives of the theft must be considered, whether it was done out of necessity or covetousness, and the punishment to be proportioned accordingly, with charity and temper. As for restitution, God forbid the church should receive more than she lost.

IV. Whether two brothers may marry two sisters, that are no way related to them.

Gregory answers, this may be done very lawfully.

V. To what degree of consanguinity are marriages forbid?

The pope answers, To the second degree inclusively, and no further. He would not however have those separated who have married within the prohibited degrees before their conversion, because they did it out of ignorance. But he would have all the new converts charged not to presume to do any such thing, and in case they did, to be debarred the communion.

VI. Whether a single bishop may ordain another, without the assistance of other bishops, when the length of the journey makes it inconvenient for them to meet?

Gregory replies, That since Austin was now the only bishop in England, he might consecrate others without any assistance. But in order to avoid the like inconvenience for the future, he would have him place bishops so, as that they might not be at too great a distance from one another.

VII. How ought I to manage with the bishops of Gaul?

The pope tells him, that he allows him no manner of jurisdiction over them, because he had no design to deprive the archbishop of Arles of the authority he was in possession of.

There are several more queries which would seem to be rather within the province of the physician than the divine to solve.

Austin's care was not confined to the conversion of the Saxons only. He undertook also, what seemed to him no less worthy of his zeal, the bringing the British bishops to a conformity with the Roman church, and the making them acknowledge the pope's jurisdiction. As this is a remarkable circumstance of Austin's life, it will be necessary to enlarge upon it a little. This design of his was not easy to be executed. The Britons thought they could justify their adhering to the same rites and customs they had practised ever since the conversion of Britain. Besides, they could not conceive, upon what grounds they were obliged to conform to a church so remote, or what advantage the owning the pope's authority would be to them. These difficulties did not discourage Austin. He had, besides his zeal for the see of Rome, another, and perhaps no less powerful motive, to induce him to this undertaking, which was his claim to the primacy of all Britain, by virtue of the pope's grant. He applied therefore all his endeavours to accomplish this enterprise, which cost him more trouble than the conversion of the Saxons, without having the satisfaction of reaping the fruits of his labour.

From the earliest days, the Britons had constantly adhered to the customs and rules prescribed to them by their first teachers. But the church of Rome had made several innovations in the divine service, to which they pretended all other churches ought to conform. The opposition the bishops of Rome everywhere met with, was not sufficient to make them abandon their pretensions. Although this difference was of no great consequence, it caused, towards the end of the second century, a most violent controversy between Pope Victor I., and the churches of Asia.

The Britons considered the bishops of Rome only as bishops of a particular diocese, or at most but as patriarchs, on whom the British church had not the least dependence; and so far were they from owning the papal authority, that they did not so much as know he pretended to have any over them. But Austin resolved to bring them to acknowledge the pope as head of the church in general.

But neither promises nor threats could prevail with the British prelates to admit of the least change in their ancient customs; and Bede tells us that Austin caused a Saxon blind man to be brought into an assembly, and when the Britons had tried in vain to cure him, he restored him to sight by his prayers. But, whether the miracle admitted of some dispute, because the blind man was a Saxon; or Bede, who lived long after the fact, was wrongly informed; the Britons stood out against this evidence; and all Austin could obtain, was, that they would meet again and determine the matter in a more numerous synod. At this second council were present seven British bishops, accompanied with Dinoh, abbot of Bangor, who brought several of his monks along with him; who before they came to the synod, advised with a hermit of great repute among them, what course they should pursue. The good old man told them, he saw no reason to admit of any alterations in their divine service upon the bare request of a man to them entirely unknown: but however, as the essence of religion consisted in union and charity, it would not be amiss to comply in some measure with Austin provided he was a holy man, and one sent from God. Upon which the bishops desired to be informed, how they should know whether he was such a person or not. To which he replied, they should know it by his humility, the most unquestionable mark of a true Christian: and they would see whether he was endued with this virtue, by his respectful rising up to salute them at their coming into the council-room; for if he paid them not that civility, it was a sure token of his pride. Pursuant to this advice, they took care to come last to the place of appointment; and upon Austin's not rising from his seat to salute them, they conceived an invincible prejudice against him.

As Austin in the synod was earnestly pressing the Britons to submit to the pope, and carrying the papal prerogatives to a great height, Dinoh, abbot of Bangor, made him this answer: "You propose to us obedience to the church of Rome; are you ignorant that we already owe a deference to the church of God, to the bishop of Rome, and to all Christians, of love and charity, which obliges us to endeavour by all possible means to assist and do them all the good we can. Other obedience than this to him you call the pope, we know not of, and this we are always ready to pay. But for a superior, what need have we to go so far as Rome, when we are governed, under God, by the bishop of Caerleon, who hath authority to take care of our churches and spiritual affairs?" It is said, Austin despairing to overcome their obstinacy, after a long dispute, cried out, full of indignation, "Since you refuse peace from your brethren, you shall have war from your enemies; and since you will not join with us in preaching the word of eternal life to your neighbours, you shall receive death at their hands." Hence it appears, that Austin had not only pressed the Britons to a conformity with the church of Rome, and obedience to the papal authority, but also had reproached them for their negligence and want of zeal, in not promoting the conversion of the Saxons. Perhaps he designed to intimate to them, that the conversion of all England was prevented only by the want of the union he proposed to them. However this be, these words of Austin were looked upon as a prediction of the massacre of the monks of Bangor, mentioned in the history of Northumberland.

Austin not having the success he expected in this affair, confined himself within the true bounds of his mission, and caused the Gospel to be preached to the East-Saxons by Mellitus. He was commonly called the Apostle of the English, and lived eight years in England; arriving in 597, and dying in 605, according to the generally-received opinion. Some fix the date of his death sooner, and others, though without grounds, bring it down to 613. He was buried at Canterbury, near the cathedral, which was not then finished, with an inscription on his tomb, of which the following is a translation:—"Here lies Augustin, the first archbishop of Dorebern, who having been sent hither by Gregory, pontiff of Rome, and supported by the co-operation of God with miracles, converted King Ethelbert and his nation to the faith; and having accomplished the days of his ministry, departed this life the 7th of the calends of June, in the reign of the said king."

Austin was succeeded by Laurentius, who was equally solicitous to reduce the Britons to the obedience of the pope, and to a conformity with the Roman church in the celebration of Easter. He wrote very pressing letters to them, in which he upbraided them for their obstinacy, bitterly complaining, that a Scotch bishop, Dagham, by name, passing through Canterbury, had refused to eat with him, on account of their difference of opinion concerning Easter-day; but his letters proved of no effect.

Gregory I. pretended not to a jurisdiction over the British churches, as universal bishop; a title he was so far from assuming, that he had declaimed against it with great vehemence. However, he believed he might, as patriarch of the west, claim the obedience of the British as well as the English bishops, to his spiritual jurisdiction. But Boniface IV., who, not long after Gregory I., was promoted to the see of Rome, being supported by the Emperor Phocas, took upon him the title of universal bishop; and this was a fresh motive for the missionaries in England to renew their endeavours to bring the Britons to own his authority; but they could not prevail with them. Mellitus was therefore sent to Rome for instructions from the pope upon this head; but the death of Ethelbert, which happened in the meantime, caused them to lay aside all thoughts of this matter, and reduced the Christians to a deplorable condition. Edbald, son and successor of Ethelbert, having turned Pagan again, the missionaries lost the powerful protection they had till then so prosperously enjoyed; and to complete their misfortunes, Sebert, king of Essex, who had been converted by Mellitus, dying also a little after, his three sons, who jointly succeeded him, apostatized from Christianity, and forbade Mellitus, who was come back from Rome, to remain in their dominions; who consequently fled to Laurentius, archbishop of Canterbury, as did also Justus, bishop of Rochester, the inhabitants of that place having in all appearance abandoned the faith. These three prelates having consulted together, resolved upon going into France, and leaving the apostate Saxons to themselves; which proves either that the people of Kent and Essex went all back to paganism, or that there were not so many converts as Gregory was made to believe. Mellitus and Justus went, according to their resolution; but Laurentius staid behind, though with intent to follow them in a short time; but when he was ready to depart, it is affirmed, that lying one night in his church, St. Peter appeared to him, and scourged him severely, as a punishment for offering to abandon his mission; and the day after he went to Edbald, and having shown him the marks of the scourge, he converted him, and persuaded him to disengage himself from his unlawful marriage; he having taken his father's widow to wife. It is certain Edbald was converted, as all historians are unanimous in asserting that fact. Edbald having thus returned to the faith, recalled Justus and Mellitus, and restored them to their respective dioceses of Rochester and London: but the East-Saxons at London refusing to admit Mellitus, he returned to Kent, where he soon after succeeded Laurentius in the archbishopric of Canterbury; and he is said by his prayers to have put a stop to a great fire, that in all probability would have reduced the city to ashes, and to have wrought several other miracles.

Mellitus was succeeded by Justus, bishop of Rochester, to whom the pope sent the pall; and after him came Honorius, whose successor was Deusdedit. After his death, there was a vacancy for four years; when Egbert and Oswy, kings of Kent and Northumbria, having held a conference together about the affairs of the church, resolved to send Wighard, a Kentish priest, to be consecrated archbishop of Canterbury at Rome. Wighard dying there, Vitalian the pope cast his eyes upon Adrian and Andrew, two monks, who both refused the archbishopric, as too great a burden for them; but Theodorus, a Greek, native of Tarsus in Cilicia, to whom it was also offered, not having the same scruples, was consecrated at Rome, and departed for England. The pope ordered Adrian to go with him, lest, says a historian, Theodorus, being a Greek, might introduce customs in Britain contrary to those of the church of Rome.

As the English were yet very ignorant, Theodorus, endeavoured, to the utmost of his power, to instruct them, by erecting a school or seminary, at Crecklade, where he and Adrian, besides divinity, taught arithmetic, music, astronomy, Greek, and Latin; and Bede assures us, he knew several of their scholars that could express themselves as readily in Greek and Latin as in their own language. Theodorus was not satisfied with promoting the love of learning among the English, by exhortations and instructions only, but also by the books he brought, and sent for, into England; some of which are still extant in manuscript, as David's Psalms, St. Chrysostom's Homilies, and Homer, all written in a beautiful hand. He himself composed a large work called Pœnitentiale, which remained long entire at Cambridge, but is not to be found there now. In 1677, extracts of it, with some other of his treatises, were published at Paris, with notes by Jacobus Petitus.

Theodorus died in 690; but the see was not filled till two years after, by Berthwald, abbot of Reculver, who, having been archbishop thirty-eight years, gave place by his death to Tatwine, a person of great learning and probity. He exercised his archiepiscopal functions nearly two years before he received the pall; which is a clear evidence it was not yet thought an absolutely necessary qualification for an archbishop. Tatwine dying in 735, Nothelm, a priest of the diocese of London, succeeded him, and went and received the pall at Rome, where he was consecrated by Gregory III.; and dying in 741, the year following, Cuthbert, bishop of Hereford, was chosen in his room. To him succeeded Bregwin, of a noble family in Germany: a prelate exemplary for his religious and holy life, during the two years he held the see; and Jambert, or Lambert, abbot of St. Austin's, was his successor. He had the mortification to see the churches of Mercia and East-Anglia wrested from his jurisdiction, by the erecting Lichfield into an archbishop's see, in the reign of Offa; and notwithstanding all his endeavours, he could neither prevent it, nor recover his rights. Athelard, his successor, was more fortunate, for he obtained what his predecessor had sued for in vain; and the churches of Mercia and East-Anglia were again subject to the jurisdiction of the see of Canterbury. Wulfrid, who succeeded him in 804, was living at the time the heptarchy was reduced to a monarchy.

Before we leave the church of Kent, it will be proper to observe, that Gregory's scheme, who had ordered Canterbury and York should be both archbishops' sees, and independent of one another, remained unexecuted, upon several accounts. In the first place, the Northumbrians did not receive the Gospel so soon as that pope expected. Again, they all deserted the faith, after the retreat of Paulinus, who had received the pall. Lastly, the dissensions Northumbria was continually disturbed with, prevented the first bishops of York from taking advantage of the pope's regulation, which besides they did not much regard. This was the reason Theodorus became possessed of all the authority, as well over the northern as southern churches, and that his successors making him their precedent, laid claim to the primacy of all England, exclusive of the archbishop of York; which proved, in process of time, the ground of great disputes between the two archbishops.

THE CHURCH OF NORTHUMBRIA.

Having already given an account of Edwin's marriage with Ethelburga of Kent, it need only be added, that Paulinus, who accompanied her as bishop of the Northumbrians, spent a whole year at Edwin's court, without making any great progress among people not yet disposed to receive his instructions; but at length several accidents concurred to encourage his zeal and promote his designs, of which a particular relation is requisite.

Quicelm, one of the kings of Wessex, bore the yoke of Edwin with such impatience that he resolved to free himself from it, by means of an assassin, whom he sent to him on some pretence, privately armed with a poisoned dagger. The ruffian being introduced into the presence-chamber, took his opportunity, and made so furious a pass at the king, that he was wounded through the body of Lilla his favourite, who interposed himself, and received the blow. Paulinus being informed of this accident, hastily ran into the room, and finding Edwin in a great rage with the king of Wessex, told him, God, to whom such wretches were an abomination, would not fail to punish so horrid a villany; and it is said that Edwin, whom the queen had hitherto solicited in vain, promised at the same time to renounce idolatry, if the God of the Christians would revenge him of his enemy. At the same instant, news was brought him, that the queen, after a hard labour, was brought to bed of a princess, for which he returned thanks to his gods; and Paulinus, for his part, having been in great fears for the queen, fell upon his knees, and thanked God for her deliverance. The prelate's zeal was so pleasing to the king, that immediately conceiving a favourable opinion of the Christian religion, he consented Paulinus should baptize the new-born infant; and the young princess who was named Anflæda, was the first that received baptism in Northumbria.

Edwin, however, not forgetting the perfidiousness of the king of Wessex, marched with an army into his dominions, and, after defeating him several times, compelled him to sue for peace, and make him ample satisfaction. But though he returned with victory according to his wish, he deferred the performance of his promises. When the queen and Paulinus pressed him, his continual reply was, that the forsaking his religion and embracing a new one was a matter requiring the deepest examination; and indeed he heartily set about it, and frequently conferred with Coifi, the pagan high-priest, upon the reasons alleged by Paulinus in favour of Christianity. Coifi, perceiving the king was very near becoming a Christian, resolved to ensure his future favour by conforming to his will. Perhaps it would not be impossible in the like case, to find some of this character among the Christian clergy.

Meantime, the queen and Paulinus continued to solicit the king to perform his promise; and to give the greater weight to what they said to him, they engaged the pope to write him a letter; but it was of no avail; Edwin still demurred, and could not decide. At last the circumstances of the vision he had formerly seen in the garden of Redowald, being, as it is pretended, revealed to Paulinus, the work was accomplished in an extraordinary way. Bede relates, that one day as the king was surrounded with a crowd of courtiers, Paulinus came in suddenly, and laying his hand on Edwin's head, asked him whether he understood the meaning of that token? At these words, Edwin recollecting what had passed between him and the stranger in Redowald's garden, threw himself at Paulinus's feet, who, with an air of authority, said to him thus: "My lord, you have escaped the hands of your enemies, and are become a great king. All that was foretold you is come to pass; it is your duty now to make good your promise." Upon hearing this, Edwin is said to have replied, that he was fully satisfied, and ready to receive the Christian faith; and from that moment he strove not only to be better informed himself, but also to prevail with his subjects to follow his example, and embrace the Gospel.

The greatest opposition was expected to come from Coifi, because it was his interest to keep the people attached to the worship of idols; but the king was agreeably surprised to find, that instead of opposing, he was ready to comply with his desire. One day as the king was discoursing with him upon this subject, the high-priest, like a ready courtier, said to him: "I have for a good while been seriously reflecting on our religion, and on the nature of our gods, and must own I am not at all satisfied in these points, neither can I forbear calling in question their goodness, justice, or power. Never perhaps did any person serve them with greater zeal, respect, and assiduity, than myself. You, sir, are a witness with what devotion and care I have all along performed the functions of my office; and yet I never got anything by it: neither is there a man in your court but what is better preferred than I am. Now, can I help concluding, that since our gods take so little care of their most sincere worshippers, they must be either unjust, or weak, or rather no gods at all?"

Edwin, extremely well pleased with the answer of the high-priest, determined to examine the sentiments of another priest, next in dignity to Coifi; who, encouraged by the example of his superior, is said, according to Bede, to have answered the king as follows: "Sir, the more we reflect on the nature of our soul, the less we know of it; it is with our soul, as with the little bird that came in the other day at one of the windows of the room where you sat at dinner, and flew out immediately at the other. Whilst it was in the room, we knew something about it; but as soon as it was gone, we could not say whence it came, or whether it was flown. Thus, whilst our soul animates our body, we may know some of its properties, but when once separated, we know not whither it goes, or from whence it came. Since then Paulinus pretends to give us clearer notions of these matters, it is my opinion that we give him the hearing, and laying aside all passion and prejudice, follow that which shall appear most conformable to right reason."

This advice, which agreed so well with the king's intentions, being approved of, it was resolved Paulinus should explain himself upon the subject of religion, in the presence of the pontiff and other priests, which he accordingly did; and as soon as Coifi had heard the bishop, he declared aloud, he could not see any reason to doubt of the truth of the Christian religion. Edwin being thus sure of the concurrence of the high-priest and some of his principal courtiers, called a wittenagemot or parliament, to debate, whether the Christian religion should be received or not; and the majority having determined already for the affirmative, it passed without any opposition. Coifi was one of the most forward to attack the pagan worship; and being desirous to show some marks of the sincerity of his conversion, put himself at the head of his priests, and marching towards the heathen temple, darted his javelin against the idol: after which it was broke in pieces by the king's order, and the temple burnt to the ground; and the same day Edwin was baptized, with his niece Hilda, who was afterwards abbess of Whitby.

The Northumbrians following the example of their king in his conversion, the bishop on a sudden found himself fully employed, by the prodigious crowds that daily came to be taught and baptized: and if it is true, as some Saxon writers affirm, that he baptized in one day 10,000, his instructions must have been very concise. A church of timber was hastily run up at York for the new converts, who were very numerous; and shortly after, Edwin laid the foundation of a church of freestone round the former, which stood till the other of stone was erected; but he had not, however, the satisfaction of finishing it, which was done by Oswald his successor. Paulinus is said to have preached also at Lincoln, where he converted Blecca the Saxon governor.

Thus was Northumbria converted to the faith of Christ; but some time after, Edwin being slain in battle, such desolation ensued, that Paulinus being compelled to leave the kingdom, the Northumbrians fell back again to idolatry: and Aelfric and Osric, kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the example of their subjects, though they had been instructed in the Christian religion in Scotland, where they had lived in exile. The apostatizing of these two princes, and the barbarity of Cadwallo after their death, almost entirely rooted out Christianity in Northumbria; as during these calamities, neither priest nor monk had the courage to attempt the restoring the Northumbrians to the faith. James the deacon, whom Paulinus left at York, was not able alone to put a stop to the general revolt; and matters remained in this sad state, till Oswald ascended the throne, who, as soon as he had restored peace and tranquillity, laboured with all his power to make religion flourish again. To that end, he desired the king of Scotland to send some persons of learning to instruct his subjects; and accordingly Cormac, a monk of Jena, who has been elsewhere spoken of, was sent with some others: but he being a man of a rugged temper, and disliked by the English, returned to his monastery, and making his report of his mission in a full chapter, Aidan, one of the brotherhood, found by what he said, that he had not used that conciliation towards the English which their circumstances required, and therefore (according to Bede) said, "It is my opinion, brother, that you have dealt a little too roughly with those you designed to convert; not remembering that the Christian religion ought to be infused in the mind, not by violent, but by mild and gentle methods." Upon these words, the monks unanimously declared Aidan was the fittest person to be sent to the Northumbrians; and he undertook the affair, and being consecrated bishop, set out for Northumbria. Bede gives Aidan the character of a pious and religious person, but adds, his zeal was without knowledge, because he kept Easter after the manner of the eastern Christians, and not according to the custom of the church of Rome. However, as much a schismatic as he was in Bede's opinion, nothing can be added to his commendation of him for holiness of life. He not only, says he, instructed Christians in their duty, but also gave them an example of a good life, and fervent charity, which charmed the very heathens, and allured them to the faith; and his success was so great among the Northumbrians, that they returned in crowds to the profession of Christ. Oswald, who was extremely desirous of the conversion of his subjects, did all he could to promote the work, even to the becoming Aidan's interpreter, in explaining his discourses to the people. It may perhaps seem strange, that Oswald should not recall Paulinus, who was then bishop of Rochester, or make use of the ministry of James, who was left by Paulinus in Northumbria. But it must be remembered, that Oswald, having been instructed in the Christian religion in Scotland, had an aversion for the Roman missionaries, on account of the difference between the Romanists and Scots about Easter, and the ecclesiastical tonsure. Aidan dying after he had governed the church of Northumbria seventeen years, Finan, another monk of Jona, was sent to supply his place. He fixed the episcopal see in the little island of Lindisfarn,* contrary to Gregory's regulation, who ordered that the principal see for the northern parts should be settled at York.

Towards the end of the second century, a controversy had arisen in the church, concerning the day on which the Easter festival was to be celebrated. The churches of Asia were of opinion, it was to be kept on the fourteenth day of the moon, according to the custom of the Jews, on what day of the week soever it should chance to fall. The western churches, on the contrary, put it off till the Sunday after the fourteenth day, because our Saviour's resurrection was on that day. Several councils were held about this matter, as well in the east as in the west; but neither party would recede from their opinion, each pleading apostolical tradition in their behalf, the eastern bishops from St. John, and the western from St. Peter and St. Paul. Supposing the truth of both these traditions, the inference was plain, that either of them might indifferently be followed, and that it was no material point, since the apostles had not settled it among themselves. And in fact, this diversity of custom prevented not the two parties from holding communion with each other, till Victor I., bishop of Rome, made a rupture, by excommunicating the Quartodecimans, or those that keep Easter on the fourteenth day of the moon. This proceeding of Victor gave such great offence, that Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, though of the same opinion with Victor, severely reprimanded him for breach of charity, on account of a thing of so little moment. He alleged the example of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, Telesphorus, Xistus, predecessors of Victor, who, notwithstanding this difference, brake not communion with the churches of Asia; adding, he would have acted much better in imitating Anicetus, who gave the Eucharist with his own hand to Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, though of a different opinion from him in this very point.

To avoid a diversity, the council of Arles, in 314, had ordered that Easter should everywhere be kept on the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the moon, which happened next after the vernal equinox, or 21st of March. This canon was confirmed by the council of Nice, in 325, and the emperor sent orders throughout all the Roman empire to have it put in practice.

In the same synod was debated also the controversy about the ecclesiastical tonsure. The Romanists maintained, that the head ought to be shaved round just in the place where our Saviour wore the crown of thorns, of which it was the emblem. But the Scotch priests shaved the forepart of the head from ear to ear. Bede does not tell us how this matter was decided; but most probably it was determined in favour of the Romanists.

The dispute about Easter having been decided to the disadvantage of the Scots, Colman and all his adherents retired into Scotland, not being able to prevail with themselves to submit to a decision that appeared to them so unjust. Thus is it in matters of religion, things that seem at first perfectly indifferent, become at last of the greatest consequence by the pride and uncharitableness of the clergy. Cedd, bishop of the East-Saxons, who had been interpreter to both parties in the synod, was the only one of the Scotch party that thought it his duty not to leave his flock for a thing of so little moment, though he was of a contrary opinion to the Romanists. Tuda succeeded to Colman's see, and Eatta was made abbot of Lindisfarn in the room of him that went off with Colman.

Thus was the storm raised by this controversy appeased at last, to the great satisfaction of the pope and his party, who were very sensible that their success in this affair would greatly contribute to the establishing the papal authority over the northern churches, as it ultimately did. The church of Northumbria had been governed for thirty years by Aidan, Finan, and Colman, whom their adversaries could charge with nothing but their firm adherence to the customs of their ancestors in relation to Easter; but after Colman's retiring into Scotland, the government of the church of Northumbria was always put into the hands either of Saxons or foreigners bred up in the principles of the church of Rome, the Scots being entirely excluded.

Tuda dying soon after, Alfred, king of Deira, was desirous of having Wilfrid, his preceptor, made bishop of York, the see whereof was then at Lindisfarn; and for that purpose he ordered him to go into France to be consecrated by Agilbert, bishop of Paris. But Wilfrid making a long stay in France, Chad, then abbot of Lestingham, was made bishop of the Northumbrians. Chad being gone into Kent to be consecrated by Deusdedit, archbishop of Canterbury, and finding he was lately dead, applied to Wina, bishop of Winchester, for consecration, and then returned into Northumbria. Bede tells us, he was a very religious person, without pride or ambition, and one that accepted of the episcopal dignity purely in obedience to the king's order.

What Finan did, was to erect there a cathedral church; which was built after the Scottish fashion, not of stone, but of timber, and thatched. Edbert, one of Finan's successors, covered the walls and roof with lead.

In the meanwhile, Wilfrid being returned into England, remained some time at Canterbury, to take care of that diocese till the arrival of Theodorus, whom the pope had made archbishop. After a few months' stay at Canterbury, he went to Northumbria; where finding Chad was made bishop of Lindisfarn, and not daring to complain of the inconstancy of the king of Deira, he retired to his monastery at Rippon. Some time after, Theodorus, in his visitation of all the churches in England coming to York, severely reprimanded Chad for being consecrated by the bishop of Winchester. Chad humbly submitted to his censure, and without endeavouring to justify himself, did all the archbishop required of him. Theodorus, charmed with his modest behaviour, consecrated him anew; but ordered him to return to his monastery, and make room for Wilfrid, whom the two kings of Northumbria had designed for the bishopric of York or Lindisfarn. Though Bede does not say for what reason Chad was sent back to his monastery after his second consecration, yet it is plain Theodorus was gained by the two kings, who were for Wilfrid; and, indeed, there seems to be no reason for the deposing of Chad, since all the defects of his former ordination, supposing there were any, were removed by the latter.

Wilfrid, who was arrogant and domineering, was for some time supported by the two kings of Northumbria; but at length, Oswy being dead, Alfred, his son, deposed, and Egfrid, who had no opinion of this prelate, in possession of the throne, Wilfrid, after many violent contests, withdrew to the monastery of Glastonbury, where Berthwald, the abbot, gave him a safe retreat, until Ethelred, king of Mercia, and uncle to Berthwald, desired him to dismiss him, on account of the king of Northumbria. In this perplexity, Wilfrid fled for refuge to Adelwalch, king of Sussex, who was converted during his imprisonment in Mercia, but his subjects were still idolaters; and this chief having granted him his protection, he succeeded in converting them; and remained some years in Sussex, and was made bishop of Selsey.

Theodorus, who at this time was the sole archbishop in England, embraced the opportunity to extend his jurisdiction over the north. For that purpose probably it was that he deposed Wilfrid, from whose temper and character he expected opposition; that he divided York into three bishoprics, on pretence it would be more convenient for the people; and lastly, that he deposed Thumbert, who had openly censured his usurpations.

The same council that deposed Thumbert, chose in his room Cuthbert, a monk of Lindisfarn, who was the only person that opposed his own election, out of an excess of modesty and humility.

Theodorus being very old, and finding he had not long to live, was touched with remorse for what he had done to Wilfrid, and wanted to be reconciled to him; and to this end he interceded for him so earnestly with Alfred, successor to Egfrid, that he was recalled. The bishopric of Lindisfarn being then vacant by the voluntary resignation of Cuthbert, Bosa was translated thither, and Wilfrid restored to York.

Cuthbert having returned to his monastery at Lindisfarn, died soon after; and in process of time, his body being removed to Durham, became so famous for miracles, that among all the English saints he had the greatest veneration paid him.

The dignity of archbishop of York, and metropolitan of the north, ceased with Paulinus. After that prelate left Northumbria, and the Northumbrians deserted the faith, the monks, sent for from Scotland by Oswald to instruct the people, were contented with the bare title of bishop, without applying to the pope for the pall, whose jurisdiction they did not acknowledge. Afterwards, Wilfrid, successor to Colman, having been deposed, the bishopric of the Northumbrians was divided into four, namely, York, Whithern, Lindisfarn, and Hagulstad; which division was an additional obstacle to any bishop of York obtaining the pall, his see being so considerably lessened by it. And as it happened, Bosa, John, and Wilfrid the younger, who were successively bishops of York, were pious and good men, who thought of nothing less than aspiring to mere worldly titles. But Egbert, who was bishop of York, whilst his brother sat on the throne of Northumbria, having more ambition than his predecessors, improved the respect they had for him at Rome on account of his birth, and procured the pall with the archiepiscopal dignity: by which means he acquired a jurisdiction over the three other northern bishops, who became his suffragans. From that time the archbishops of York began to be upon a level with those of Canterbury, and to insist on Gregory's regulation, whereby it was ordered there should be an entire equality and independency between the two archbishops. On the other hand, the archbishops of Canterbury pleaded the jurisdiction exercised by Theodorus over the north, and all the rest of England; and hence arose a contest between the two metropolitans, which was not decided until many ages after. Alcuin gives Egbert, whom he calls his master, the character of an able and learned prelate, and takes notice of his building a library at York, and furnishing it with a noble collection of books. Eanbald, who succeeded Egbert, was living at the time of the dissolution of the octarchy.

THE CHURCH OF WESSEX.

It does not appear that Austin sent any of his companions to preach the Gospel in the kingdom of Wessex; and it was not till forty years after his arrival in Britain, that the West-Saxons were converted by the ministry of Birinus. This priest, zealous for the advancement of the kingdom of Christ, being informed there were still in England nations to whom the Gospel was unpreached, desired Pope Honorius to send him thither. He accidentally arrived in the kingdom of Wessex; and finding the inhabitants idolaters, resolved to stay among them and endeavour their conversion; and after some time he had the satisfaction to baptize Cinigisil, the king, and Quicelm, his brother.* Soon after, Birinus found his audience very numerous, multitudes following the example of their kings; and he continued for fourteen years to edify this people by his discourses and example, and after having made considerable progress in their conversion, died at Dorchester, where he had built a church, and fixed his episcopal see.

After Birinus's death, Wessex was involved in many difficulties. Cenowalch, who succeeded his father Cinigisil, being as yet a pagan, was no favourer of the Christians; and what was even worse, Penda, king of Mercia, became master of the kingdom and kept it three years, Cenowalch being forced to fly into East-Anglia. It may be easily judged Christianity, during these three years, made no great progress; for besides Penda's being an idolater, it is unlikely religion should flourish in the midst of wars and commotions. Cenowalch had the good fortune to be converted during his retreat in East-Anglia, and afterwards to be restored to his dominions. The peaceable times that ensued afforded him means to promote religion again in Wessex, where, after Birinus's death, none had been very forward to go and strengthen the new Christians. Whilst the king was looking out for some fit person to preach to his subjects Agilbert, a Frenchman, who was just come from his studies in Ireland, passed through Winchester on his way home; and Cenowalch having seen him, invited him to stay with him, and instruct the people. Agilbert complied with his request; and being consecrated bishop, went and resided at Dorchester; but as he was not master of the language, he made but little progress; and Cenowalch perceiving he could not learn the English, and that it was impossible his subjects should edify by the instructions of one who spoke to them in a foreign dialect, began to grow weary of him; and at last he divided his kingdom into two dioceses, and leaving Agilbert at Dorchester, made one Wina, a Saxon, that had been bred and consecrated in France, bishop of Winchester, and built a fine cathedral there. Agilbert was exceedingly indignant that the king should make this partition without consulting him, and much more, that he should give the preference to the new bishop by placing him in his capital; but his complaints upon this occasion not being much regarded, he took his leave and retired into France, where he was made bishop of Paris. He afterwards returned into England, to assist at the council of Whitby. Cenowalch some time after disagreed with Wina, and dismissed him also; and Wessex remaining thus without a bishop, and ecclesiastics fit for such an employment not being very common in England, Cenowalch would have recalled Agilbert, but he did not think proper to quit Paris for Winchester. However, he made an offer to Cenowalch of his nephew Eleutherius, a priest, whom he recommended, as well qualified for the episcopal function; and he being accepted of, and consecrated by Theodorus, became sole bishop of the West-Saxons.

After the death of Cenowalch, Wessex was distracted with civil wars for ten years. Eleutherius dying during the dissensions, was succeeded by Heda, after whose death, the number of Christians being very much increased in Wessex, it was found necessary to divide the kingdom again into two dioceses, the sees whereof were fixed at Winchester and Sherborn. Daniel was made bishop of the first, and Aldhelm of the last, who was nephew to King Ina, and the first Englishman that wrote in Latin, a language he was better skilled in than any of his countrymen before him. When he was promoted to his bishopric, he was abbot of the monastery of Malmesbury, so named from Maidulph, a Scotchman, the first abbot, and Aldhelm, his successor.* Forthere, who, according to Bede, was well versed in the Holy Scriptures, was bishop of Sherborn after Aldhelm, and to Daniel succeeded Almund in the bishopric of Winchester. From that time to the dissolution of the heptarchy, there is nothing in the ecclesiastical history of Wessex worth notice.

THE CHURCH OF MERCIA.

It was above fifty years after the conversion of Kent, that the Mercians embraced the Christian faith. Penda, who sat on the throne of Mercia above thirty years, was of too turbulent a spirit to embrace a religion so contrary to his temper and character; but however, he was ultimately induced, though not to profess, yet at least to tolerate the Christian religion in his dominions. Penda, his eldest son, whom he had made king of Leicester, being gone to Northumbria to demand Alflada, King Oswy's daughter, in marriage, could obtain her upon no other terms but his turning Christian.† Whether the young prince was apprehensive of the same obstruction to his marriage in all the other kingdoms, which were already converted, or had a favourable opinion of Christianity, he received baptism before he left Northumbria. At his return, he brought with him four priests, Cedda, Adda, Beti, and Diuma, to preach the Gospel to the Mercians, which the king his father opposed not.‡ Diuma, who was a Scotchman, and the only bishop of the four, governed the Mercian church prosperously for some years; and Cellach succeeded him.

After the death of Penda, Mercia was subject three years to Oswy, king of Northumbria; but he being a Christian, religion received no detriment from that revolution. But Wulpher, who succeeded to the throne, being yet an idolater, was carried by a false zeal to persecute his Christian subjects, even to the putting to death two of his own sons, who refused to renounce their faith, if they may be credited who relate this fact, which does not seem to be well supported. Happily for the Christians he was converted soon after.

During the persecution, Cellach retired into Scotland, so that Mercia being without a bishop when Wulpher embraced the Gospel, he sent for an English priest, named Trumhere, who had been educated in Scotland, and caused him to be consecrated bishop of Mercia. To him succeeded Jaruman, who had the honour of replanting the Christian religion in the kingdom of Essex, as will be related hereafter; and upon Jaruman's death Wulpher desired Theodorus to send him a bishop; who gladly complied with his request, as giving him a good opportunity of promoting Chad, whom he had deprived of the see of York, in the manner before related in the history of the church of Northumbria. Chad on his arrival in Mercia fixed his see † Bede says, that upon his having preached to him the doctrines of a heavenly kingdom, of a resurrection, and future immortality, he declared he would embrace the Christian religion, even though he were not to have the young princess in marriage.

at Lichfield,* where he died, after he had governed the church prudently and happily for many years. Reference should be made to Bede's Ecclesiastical History, by those who are desirous of seeing a list of St. Chad's miracles, and the hymns the angels sung in the air over his house when he was dying.

As the Christians increased in Mercia, Ethelred, successor to Wulpher, finding one bishop was not sufficient for so large a flock, divided his kingdom into four dioceses, the sees whereof were established at Lichfield, Worcester, Hereford, and Chester. Saxulph continued at Lichfield. Fadric was sent to Worcester, but dying before he was consecrated, Boselus was put in his place. Cuthwin was bishop of Leicester, and Putta of Hereford. After Cuthwin's death Leicester was united to Lichfield; but some time after they were separated again upon Wilfrid's account, who was dispossessed of the see of York, and held not this long. Hedda succeeded Saxulph in the bishopric of Lichfield.†

Offa, jealous of the authority exercised by the archbishop of Canterbury over the churches of Mercia, and having besides a particular quarrel with Lambert, who then filled the archiepiscopal see, resolved to withdraw the churches of Mercia from his jurisdiction. To this end, he privately solicited Pope Adrian I. to make the bishop of Lichfield an archbishop, and the bishops of Mercia and East-Anglia his suffragans. The pope willingly consented to his request, as glad of the opportunity, by obliging this prince, to extend over the church of England his jurisdiction, which was not yet thoroughly submitted to, or at least not to that degree he desired. With this view he sent Gregory, bishop of Ostia, and Theophylact, bishop of Todi, with the character of legates to transact this affair. To prevent Lambert from taking measures to avoid the blow that was aiming at him, the sending of these legates was pretended to be on account of calling synods in England for confirming the churches in the faith. Upon the arrival of the legates, Theophylact stayed some time with Offa to concert measures how to accomplish their designs, whilst Gregory went on to Northumbria, where he convened a synod, of which mention will be made in another place. At his return to Mercia, the two legates summoned a national council of the seven kingdoms at Calcuith, where King Offa was present; and after ratifying the canons of the Northumbrian synod, the erecting of Lichfield into an archiepiscopal see was proposed. Lambert opposed it to the utmost of his power, but in vain; the matter having been settled beforehand, the authority of Offa and the legates bore down all opposition. Higbert, then bishop of Lichfield, was declared an archbishop, and the bishops of Mercia and East-Anglia were made his suffragans; but he was prevented by death from receiving the pall, and Adulph his successor had that honour from the pope, who ratified what the council had done. Some are of opinion Offa purchased this favour with the tax of the Peter-pence levied on Mercia and East-Anglia; but this is only a groundless conjecture. Lichfield did not enjoy the title of an archbishopric

* This was a very large diocese, comprehending the country of the Mercians, Middle Angles, and what was afterwards called Lincoln. For so far King Wulpher's dominions extended.

above fourteen years; for after the death of Offa and Egfrid his son, Cenulph was so far prevailed upon by the urgent instances of the archbishops of Canterbury and York who represented to him, that according to the regulation of Gregory I. there ought to be but two archbishops in England, that he wrote to the pope with his own hand, to desire him to revive the former custom as to this matter. Adelard, archbishop of Canterbury, took upon him the management of the affair at Rome, where (after a nine years' solicitation) he obtained of Pope Leo III. that Mercia and East-Anglia should again be under the jurisdiction of the see of Canterbury.

THE CHURCH OF ESSEX.

Mellitus, one of the missionaries sent over to Austin, was the first that preached the Gospel to the East-Saxons, particularly at London. As far as can be judged, he made no great progress among the people. Probably what success he met with was entirely owing to the authority of Sebert, king of Essex, and Ethelbert, king of Kent;* since upon their deaths all the East-Saxon Christians fell back to paganism, and expelled Mellitus,† without ever admitting him any more. The conversion of the East-Saxons is not properly to be dated from this time, but rather from the reign of Sigebert the Good; who living in strict friendship with Oswy, king of Northumbria, and paying him frequent visits, was instructed in the knowledge of the Gospel at his court, where he was baptized. He brought home with him Cedd, a Northumbrian priest, who, being consecrated bishop, heartily set about instructing the East-Saxons, among whom in a short time he made a very great progress.‡ He was the only Scotchman who after the council of Whitby was unwilling to leave his flock, though the controversy about Easter was decided contrary to his opinion. As Cedd went often to Northumbria, where he had spent great part of his life, Adelwalt, king of Deira, made him a present of certain lands lying near Lestingham, where he founded a monastery; and thither he used to retire and practise the greatest austerities. Here also it was that he died of the plague after he had governed the church of Essex several years. Bede, who gives Cedd great encomiums, and mentions his austere way of living, takes occasion from thence to say, that fasting was religiously practised by all who pretended to a regular life, and adds, that some fasted every Wednesday and Friday until three o'clock in the afternoon. The Saxon Homilies also most earnestly recommend fasting; but withal take care to warn Christians against over-acting their part in this respect, as some did, and indeed treat very rationally upon this matter.

After the death of Sigebert the Good, and Swithelm his brother, it happened that in the reign of Sebba and Siger, the plague raged terribly in the kingdom of Essex, particularly at London. Siger being persuaded that the plague was sent upon the East-Saxons as a punishment from the gods for abandoning the religion of their ancestors, returned to idolatry, and drew after him those of his subjects who had not been thoroughly converted. But Sebba steadfastly adhered to the Christian religion; and Wulpher, king of Mercia, on whom these two princes were then in dependence, having been informed of what passed in Essex, sent thither Jaruman, his bishop, to endeavour to restore the East-Saxons to the way of truth. Jaruman's pains were crowned so successfully, that the people at length returned to the faith; and shortly after, Wulpher gave the first instance of simony in England, by selling the bishopric of London to Wina, who had been driven from Winchester; and who governed the church of Essex until his death in 675. His successor, Erkenwald, was famous for his great affection to the city of London, as well as for the holiness of his life, on account of which he was enrolled in the catalogue of the saints. After his death a great contest arose between the canons of St. Paul's, at London, and the monks of Barking, who should bury him. The first carried their point, and interred him in their cathedral, where it is affirmed he wrought several miracles.* It will be needless to carry down the succession of the bishops of London to the dissolution of the octarchy, since nothing remarkable happened concerning them.

* This King Ethelbert founded the cathedral church of St. Paul's about the year 610; though others say it was done by King Sebert.

† In the year 614, Mellitus, with the assistance of King Ethelbert, founded a church and monastery near London, in a place called Thorney; which he dedicated to St. Peter: as it lay west of London, it came afterwards to be called Westminster.

THE CHURCH OF EAST-ANGLIA.

The first conversion of the East-Angles is said to have been in the reign of Redowald; but by whom is not known. There is reason to believe, that during this prince's life the Christian religion made no great progress in East-Anglia; but all that can be probably conjectured is, that Redowald, out of respect for Ethelbert, king of Kent (at whose court some say he was baptized), gave leave to some of Austin's companions to preach in his dominions, and persecuted not those who had a mind to embrace the Gospel. What is said of his suffering the true God and the pagan deities to be worshipped in the same temple, seems to infer that he was not himself a Christian, and that the number of converts in East-Anglia was very inconsiderable. Thus much at least is certain, Christianity flourished not in that kingdom, in his or his son Erpwald's reign; and therefore we cannot be greatly mistaken in placing the conversion of the East-Angles in the reign of Sigebert, successor to Erpwald.

Sigebert, who had spent great part of his time in France, where he had been baptized, was thoroughly instructed in the Christian religion; and when he returned to England to take possession of the crown, he brought along with him a Burgundian priest, named Felix, who was consecrated bishop of Canterbury. On his arrival in East-Anglia, the East-Angles came in crowds to be baptized; and Sigebert believing nothing would more benefit his subjects than permanent and continual instructions to confirm them in the faith, erected schools, after the manner of those he had seen in France. Some will have it that the university of Cambridge owes its original to these schools; but this opinion seems not to be well grounded.

Whilst Sigebert was thus employed in works of piety, he received further assistance from one Furseus, an Irish monk, who preached to the East-Angles with good success. Bede gives him an extraordinary commendation; attributes several miracles to him, and assures us he was, like St. Paul, wrapt up into heaven. This same Furseus built a monastery at Cnobersburgh,* which was largely endowed at several times by the kings of East-Anglia. The disturbances that arose after Sigebert's resigning the crown, obliged Furseus to retire into France, where he founded the monastery of Lagny, in the jurisdiction of Meaux.

Felix was bishop of the East-Angles seventeen years. His see was fixed at Dummoc, a little town by the sea-side, now called Dunwich; where he converted and baptized Cenowalch, king of Wessex, who had fled for refuge into East-Anglia. Felix was succeeded by Thomas, a deacon of his church; after him came Berchtgistus, surnamed Boniface, whom Bisus succeeded. Bisus being grown old and infirm, Becca and Badwin were made his assistants, and East-Anglia was divided into two dioceses. Becca resided at Dummoc, and Badwin at Elmham, a poor village, now in Norfolk. These two bishoprics continued in being, until the Danes becoming masters of East-Anglia, they both lay vacant for above one hundred years; after which the diocese of Dummoc was united to that of Elmham, whence the episcopal see was removed to Thetford, and afterwards to Norwich,† where it remains to this day.

THE CHURCH OF SUSSEX.

It is no wonder the kingdom of Sussex continued so long after the rest in an idolatrous state, since it was in subjection to Wessex, where the Gospel was not preached till forty years after the arrival of Austin. If we may credit the author of the life of Wilfrid, bishop of York, the conversion of the South-Saxons, about the year 686, was owing to the disgrace of that prelate, who fled for refuge into their country. Adelwalch, king of Sussex, who received him into his protection, had already attempted the conversion of his subjects, by founding a monastery in his little kingdom;‡ but his endeavours answered not his expectation; and perhaps Wilfrid himself would have found it a difficult matter to have made any impression upon them, had not a favourable juncture unexpectedly paved the way for him. Not long after his arrival, the country being miserably distressed for want of provisions, he taught the inhabitants the art of fishing in the sea, their skill before going no further than the catching of eels; and this improvement greatly relieving them, wrought so upon their minds, that they listened with the same attention to his instructions about their spiritual, as they had before to those about their worldly wants. But to complete the matter, seasonable showers, after a three years' drought, restoring to the earth its former fruitful-

In the year 1386, Robert Braybroke, bishop of London, made a constitution for the revival of St. Erkenwald's holy-day, which had been neglected. The solemnity was kept upon the last day of April.

ness, they were thoroughly convinced that Wilfrid was an extraordinary person, and highly favoured by Heaven. At least, this is what the writer of his life would make us believe. Wilfrid perceiving the Christians daily increase, established his episcopal see at Selsey,* a small peninsula given him by Adelwalch, where he founded a monastery also, which he furnished with the monks he had brought with him from Northumbria. Here he usually resided during the time of his banishment; but at length being recalled into his own country, Selsey remained a long while without a bishop, because the South-Saxons, after their becoming subject to the king of Wessex, were put under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the West-Saxons. Some time after, Wessex being divided into two dioceses, Sussex was annexed to the see of Winchester; where it continued till a synod held in Wessex, in the time of Daniel, decreed Sussex should be a distinct diocese again, and the see fixed at Selsey as formerly. Edbert was the first bishop. His successors resided at the same place, down to the year 1070, when the see was removed to Chichester,† where it continues to this day.

As for the Isle of Wight, after it was converted by the furious zeal of Cedwalla, it remained all along under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Winchester.

After this account of the most remarkable particulars relating to the conversion of the seven kingdoms, it will be necessary to take a general view of the councils held in England during those early times of the church.

COUNCILS.

Two synods had been convened at Austin's request, in order to endeavour to bring the Britons to the obedience of the pope. Though these were not properly English, but rather British councils, they cannot be passed over without making this single observation. Bede in his Ecclesiastical History tells us, that Austin required of the British bishops these four things: that they would celebrate the Paschal feast the same day with the Romanists; that they would conform to the ceremonies practised by the church of Rome in administering baptism; that they would assist the Roman missionaries in converting the Saxons; and that they would submit to the papal authority. Had Austin equally insisted on these four articles, Bede would naturally have related the sentiments of the British concerning the three first, and yet we find he speaks only of the last. Hence we may conclude that this was the main point, and that which Austin chiefly dwelt upon. For the same reason, also, the abbot of Bangor answered only to this point, being very sensible that was the principal thing in dispute.

There is no occasion to add anything to what has already been said of the council of Whithy, or Streaneshalh, and the other synods that were held upon Wilfrid's account.

In 673, Theodorus, archbishop of Canterbury, convened a national synod at Hertford, at which were present all the English bishops, with a great number of other ecclesiastics. The archbishop, who was president, put the question to the bishops, whether they were willing the church of England should be governed by the canons of the ancient councils. To which they all having agreed, he produced a list of the canons, and fixing upon ten of them, ordered them to be read before the council, and asked their consent to each of them.

I. That the festival of Easter might be uniformly kept in all the English churches, on the first Sunday after the full moon in March.

II. That no bishop should encroach upon the jurisdiction of another.

III. That bishops should not meddle with the temporal concerns of the monasteries.

IV. That no monk should have the liberty to quit his monastery without leave from the abbot.

V. That it should not be lawful for any of the clergy to abandon their diocese without the bishop's leave, and that they should not be received into another diocese, without a recommendation under the bishop's own hand.

VI. That bishops and clergy, who are out of their diocese, ought not to execute any part of their function, but should be contented with a hospitable reception.

VII. That a synod should be convened twice a year. This canon was altered to once a year.

VIII. That the bishops should take their places at councils according to their seniority.

IX. That new sees should be erected, as the number of Christians increased. This was thrown out.

X. That no marriage should be annulled but on account of adultery. That if a man put away his wife, he ought not to marry another, but either be reconciled, or live single.

Nine of these canons being agreed to, the council denounced excommunication and degradation upon all that should infringe them, and then broke up.

Baronius pretends this council was convened by the pope's order, and that Theodorus presided as legate of the holy see; but when we examine the grounds of his assertion, we find he states it only upon Theodorus's saying in his harangue, at the opening of the council, that he was consecrated by the pope, as if that were equivalent to his being made legate. Bede, Malmsbury, and Florence of Worcester, who speak of this council, say not a word to support the cardinal's notion.

Theodorus summoned another council, or synod, at Hatfield,* in 680, at the request of the pope, who wanted to know the sentiments of the church of England with reference to the heresy of the Monothelites,† which then made a great noise in the world. The pope had all the satisfaction he desired, the English being entirely free from that error. This synod received the five first general councils,‡ together with the synod held just before at Rome, against the Monothelites.

The next council was convened at Becanceld in 694,§ by Withred, king of Kent, who presided himself, the council being composed of the clergy and nobility. The constitutions were all drawn up in the form of a charter, wherein the king granted several privileges to the church, particularly an exemption from the payment of taxes and other services and incumbrances incident to a lay-fee. He declares, moreover, that the church has power to govern her own body, the prerogative royal not reaching to religious matters. This article has given occasion to some to call in question the genuineness of this council. They object, for instance, that the five abbesses, who subscribed this charter, not only signed before all the priests, but also before Botred, a bishop, contrary to all precedent. On the other hand, others are as zealous in the defence of it, as substantiating the independence of the church. As it would carry us too far from our present design to examine the reasons pro and con; it is sufficient to acquaint the reader there was such a dispute.

The next year the synod at Berghamsted was held in the reign of the same king; which was composed, like the foregoing one, of clergy and laity. Its canons related chiefly to the sin of adultery, and the privileges of the clergy. With regard to adultery, it was enacted, that the offender should be put under penance; and if he refused to submit to that discipline, he should be excommunicated; but if he was a stranger, he was to forfeit one hundred shillings.

With respect to the clergy, it was decreed, that the church should be free, and enjoy all her privileges.

That the breach of the church's peace should be punished with a fine of fifty shillings.*

That the bare affirmation of the king or a bishop should be equivalent to their oath.

That if a bishop, abbot, or deacon, is charged with any crime, and being brought to the altar he declares solemnly he speaks the truth, this declaration shall be the same as his oath.

That if any clergyman should be prosecuted, the cognisance of the cause belongs to the church.

Thus, by degrees, the clergy obtained their privileges, which they have but too often abused.†

The two councils that are pretended to have been held at London and Alne, in 714, being looked upon by the best authorities as forged, it would be lost time to say anything of them.

In 747 was held at Cloveshoo, or Cliff,‡ in the kingdom of Kent, a national synod, at which Ethelbald, king of Mercia, was present, with twelve bishops and a great number of thanes. Cuthbert, archbishop of Canterbury, who was president, read Pope Zachary's letter, wherein the pope admonished the English to reform their lives, and threatened those with excommunication that continued in their wickedness. They drew up a body of twenty-eight canons, most of them relating to ecclesiastical discipline, the government of monasteries, the duties of bishops and other clergymen, the public service, singing psalms, keeping the Sabbath, and other holidays. The three following are selected as the most worthy of note.

The 10th orders the priests to be thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines of Christianity, and to teach the people the Apostles' Creed, and the Lord's Prayer in English. Agreeably to this was Bede's advice to Egbert, archbishop of York; that it was absolutely necessary Christians should know what they said when they prayed to God; and that they should be instructed in their own native tongue, and therefore that he himself had translated the Creed and the Lord's Prayer into English for the benefit of those that did not understand Latin.

The 26th warns Christians from vainly imagining that by giving alms they can compound for their sins, or dispense with the discipline of the church.

The 27th was made upon the account of a rich layman, who having been excommunicated, requested to be admitted again into the church, upon his having procured several persons to fast in his stead; alleging that the penance they had undergone in his name, was more than he could have done himself in three hundred years. The canon declares with great indignation against this intolerable presumption, since at that rate the rich might much more easily get to heaven than the poor, contrary to the express declaration of our Saviour.

In this canon we have the form of a prayer for the dead, which runs thus: "O Lord, we beseech thee, grant that the soul of such a person may be secured in a state of repose, and admitted, with the rest of thy saints, into the regions of light and bliss."

The council of Calcuith, or Calchite, held in 785, or according to others, in 787, on account of erecting Lichfield into an archbishopric, ratified the canons of a synod that had been convened just before in Northumbria. Gregory and Theophylact, who presided as the pope's legates, acknowledged in their letter to the pope, that they were the first that had been sent into England with that character. The following are some of the canons of the synod of Northumbria, ratified by the council of Calcuith.

1. That all in holy orders strictly adhere to the council of Nice.

2. That baptism is only to be administered at Easter and Whitsuntide, unless in case of necessity. That it is the duty of godfathers to teach their god-children the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, both which all Christians are obliged to have by heart.

8. The ancient privileges of the church are carefully to be preserved.

This was a never-failing canon in all the councils.

9. The priests are not to eat in private, unless indisposed. By this, one would think the clergy were not dispersed in parishes, but lived in the capital of the diocese in common.

The 10th forbids the clergy to perform the divine service without stockings, and to use a chalice or patene of horn.

The 11th exhorts princes to govern their kingdoms by the directions of the bishops, to whom the power of binding and loosing is delivered.

* The same as the king's.

† The 10th, 25th, and 28th articles, having something particular in them, it will not be amiss to lay them before the reader. The 10th runs thus: If on Saturday evening, after sunset; or Sunday evening after the same time, a servant or slave (servus) shall do any servile work, let his master be fined eighty shillings. 25th. If a layman kill a thief, let him lie without any wiregild, that is without any satisfaction being made to the thief's relations. 28th. If a stranger wanders about, and does neither halloo nor sound a horn, he is to be accounted as a thief, and to be either slain or banished.

‡ Cliff at Hoo is a town on a rock near Rochester. But the presence of the king of Mercia at this, and some other councils, held at Cloveshoo, makes it supposed that it is the same with Abingdon, in Berkshire, about the middle of the nation, anciently written Shovesham by mistake for Clovesham, or Cloveshoo.

The 12th excludes bastards from succeeding to the crown.

The 15th condemns marriages within the prohibited degrees.

The 16th makes bastards, particularly the children of nuns, incapable of inheriting.

The 17th urges the payment of tithes from the authority of the law of Moses.

The 18th presses a strict performance of vows.

Some irregularities in the subscription list in the several copies of the canons of this council, have caused the council itself to be called in question; but they are insufficient to render the whole questionable.*

In 798 a synod was held at Finchale, in Northumbria,† by Eanbald, archbishop of York; the design of which was to make some regulations with regard to discipline; but the archbishop took advantage of the opportunity, and ordered the canons of the first five general councils to be read, which were unanimously received.

The council, held at Cloveshoo, or Cliff, in 800, under Adelard, archbishop of Canterbury, was convened for the recovery of certain church-lands usurped by the kings of Mercia.

Three years after, another council was held at the same place, wherein, according to Pope Leo's constitution, and with the consent of Cenulph, king of Mercia, the archbishopric of Lichfield was reduced to a bishopric, as formerly.

In 816, Wilfrid, archbishop of Canterbury, summoned a council at Calcuith, at which Cenulph, king of Mercia and Monarch, was present, with all the English bishops except those of Northumbria. There were eleven canons drawn up by this synod, of which the 2nd and 5th seem to be the most remarkable.

The 2nd orders all churches to be consecrated by the bishop of the diocese, with the following formalities. The bishop shall bless the holy-water, and sprinkle the church with it, according to the directions of the ritual; then having consecrated the eucharist, he shall put it in a box with some relics to be laid up in the church; and in case there are no relics, the consecrated elements, being the body and blood of our Lord, shall be sufficient. Every bishop shall be obliged to have drawn upon the altar, or upon the wall, the figure of the saint to whom the church is dedicated.

The 5th declares against allowing any Scotchmen to baptize, or read the divine service in England.

There is mention of two councils more convened in Mercia in the reign of Bernulph, one in 822, and the other in 824. Probably the first is a forgery; but they are both of little consequence.

CHAPTER IV.

Origin of the Danes. Their continual irruptions, from the reign of Egbert to Edward the Martyr. The laws and customs introduced by Alfred the Great, which are the basis of the present laws of England. The state of the church and religion, from Egbert to Edward the martyr, inclusive.

the various kingdoms, seemed to be better secured than ever from foreign invasions. Yet the Danes now began their descents with a fury, equal to that with which the English themselves had formerly attacked the Britons; and for above two hundred years these new enemies were so bent upon the conquest of the island, that it will be necessary to give some account of a nation, who in the ninth century became so formidable to all Europe, and especially to England.

Scandia, or Scandinavia,* situated in the north of Europe, contains a tract of land in length, from north to south, about four hundred leagues, and in breadth, from east to west, about one hundred and fifty. If the northern historians are to be credited, this country was peopled soon after the flood by two nations, or rather two branches of the same nation, namely, the Goths and Swedes, who founded two large kingdoms in this part of the world. From these two nations, who were sometimes united and sometimes divided, sprang, as they say, all those colonies which after the decline of the Roman empire overran the rest of Europe.

In the reign of Eric, the sixth king of the Goths,† Gothland was become so exceeding populous, that the country was unable to maintain its inhabitants. To remedy this inconvenience, which daily increased, Eric was compelled to send away part of his subjects to seek their fortune in the neighbouring isles.‡ These colonies at length not only peopled the islands, but also Jutland, on the continent, known to the Romans by the name of Cimbrica Chersonesus. The people thus spread over the isles and the Chersonese, acknowledged above seven hundred years the kings of Gothland for their sovereigns; until Humel, the sixteenth king of the Goths, first made them independent, by letting them have for their king, Dan, his son, from whom Denmark received its name.§ Norway also very probably was peopled by Gothic colonies, since it remained a long while under the dominion of the kings of Gothland; but in process of time, and after many revolutions, it was governed by chieftains independent of Gothland, till about the end of the ninth century, when it became subject to a king.

The Danes and Norwegians being thus separated from their ancestors the Goths and Swedes, became so powerful as to be in condition to make head against them both in several wars; and the situation of their country, and the great plenty of all things necessary for building and equipping a fleet, soon made them superior at sea to all their neighbours. In time, they employed all their naval forces in plundering ships, and ravaging the coasts of Europe; France, England, and the Low-Countries, were most exposed to their robberies. For above one hundred and fifty years the sea was covered with Danish pirates; who were grown so powerful, that Charlemagne could never subdue the Saxons, whilst assisted by the Danes. History tells us that this emperor, having sent his son Pepin to

* It contained Norway, with as much of Sweden as lay west of the Gulf of Bothnia. It was also called Baltia, whence the Baltic Sea.

† They pretend he was contemporary with Terah, Abraham's father.

‡ As in those days none had a permanent interest in land, which was cantoned out to the people to be possessed for one year only, it was decided by lot who were to leave their country to go in quest of new habitations.

§ Dan, according to northern historians, was contemporary with Gideon.

make war upon the Saxons, he was prevented in his designs by Gothric, king of Denmark, sending a reinforcement of Danes on board three hundred vessels; and a northern historian affirms, that Charlemagne was never better pleased than at the news of Gothric's death, having despaired of accomplishing his ends as long as that prince was alive.

As people increase and multiply exceedingly in cold countries, it often happened that Denmark and Norway were overstocked with inhabitants, and therefore forced, in order to make room for the rest, to send away large colonies. Their natural inclination to a sea-life made these colonies readily abandon their country; and the great booty the first adventurers gained, tempted the richest and most powerful of their countrymen to urge their fortune in the same manner; and they entered into associations, and fitted out large fleets to seek and ravage foreign countries. These associations were much of the same nature with those entered into now in time of war, by the corsairs of Barbary; and they became so entirely devoted to this mode of life, that very considerable fleets were put to sea. They had the authority and example of their highest leaders for what they did, who occasionally commanded them in person, and who were known by the name of Vikings, or Sea-kings. Their fleets made great devastation in several parts of Europe, particularly France, England, and the Low-Countries. In France they were called Normans, that is, men of the north; but in England they were generally styled Danes or Goths. There is no doubt but the Swedes and Goths very often joined with the Danes in their piratical expeditions; and it appears that the Frieslanders also were concerned with them in ravaging the coasts of France and England. The Saxon historians call them indifferently, Getes, Goths, Jutes, Norwegians, Dacians, Danes, Swedes, Vandals, and Frieslanders, their bands being a mixed multitude of these several nations.

The Danes, when they first invaded the coasts of England, only plundered; and therefore they made war, not like regular troops, with some fixed and settled design, but like pirates, sacking and destroying what they could not carry away; and as they were divided into several independent bands, it frequently happened that no sooner had one departed, than another came; by which means the settled inhabitants had scarcely any respite from their incursions.

However, it is but proper to observe that the Saxon and Danish historians give very contradictory accounts of these wars. Each endeavours to magnify the advantages of his own nation, and lessen those of the opposite party. But it is very certain the Danes could not have gained such footing in England, had not victory generally inclined to their side. The historians differ chiefly in chronological matters, and in the names of the persons of whom they are speaking; which may greatly arise from the difference of language.

EGBERT, FIRST KING OF ENGLAND.

Egbert, who began his reign over the West-Saxons in 800, finished not his conquests till 827 or 828, from which time his title of king of England is to be dated. But to have a correct notion of the limits of his power, it must be remembered that the kingdom he was in actual possession of, consisted only of the ancient kingdoms of Wessex, Sussex, Kent, and Essex, which were peopled by Saxons and Jutes. The other three kingdoms, whose inhabitants were Angles, he was contented with reserving a nominal sovereignty over, permitting them to be governed by their own kings, who were his vassals and tributaries.

We have already seen that Egbert, before he turned his arms against his countrymen, attacked and subdued the Britons of Cornwall and Wales. But although his power after his subjection of the octarchy was exceedingly increased, yet the Welsh, by their proceedings, plainly indicated a design to shake off his yoke; and Egbert, to give them no time to complete their revolt, marched into their country with so numerous an army, that they were compelled to submit, without even offering to come to a battle.

Whilst he was enjoying the fruits of his victories, the Danes, who had before made two descents on England,* arrived at Charmouth,† with thirty-five vessels; and as they met with no opposition, they landed and ravaged the country. Upon the first news of this descent, Egbert marched against them with what troops he could hastily draw together, believing at his approach they would repair to their ships; but finding, contrary to his expectations, that they firmly stood their ground, he resolved to attack them; and soon experienced he had to deal with much more formidable enemies than he imagined. After a long and bloody battle, the Danes were victorious, and his own army was entirely routed; and he found himself so very hard pressed, that he was compelled at last to follow his flying troops; and was indebted to the darkness of the night for his life. The Danes, having no design to make conquests, were satisfied with plundering the country, and returning to their ships.

Two years after, another band of Danish pirates, having been informed by their emissaries that the Cornish Britons were extremely desirous of throwing off the yoke of the English, came and landed in their territories, where they were received with joy; and being reinforced with some British troops, they began their march in order to give the English king battle; and were in hopes of surprising him, but were themselves astonished by finding he was marching towards them with the same intent. The two armies met near Hengistdun, in Cornwall, and Egbert obtained a signal victory.

This delivered the English for a short space from the Danish invasions; and it is said that Egbert, by a public edict, approved by the general assembly of the nation, ordered, that for the future the name of England should be given to that part of Britain conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, and by them erected into various kingdoms.‡ But it is much more likely he only confirmed or revived this name, which certainly is older than the reign of Egbert. We find in Bede's Ecclesiastical History, that before that time the three nations settled in Great Britain, are indifferently called Angli or English. And indeed

* In 789, at Portland; and in 832, in the isle of Sheppy, which they laid waste.

† In Dorsetshire.

‡ The Saxon chronicler says, "Egbert having subdued the six Saxon kingdoms, and forced them to submit to his dominions, called a great council at Winchester, whereto were summoned all the great men of the whole kingdom; and there, by the general consent of the clergy and laity, Egbert was crowned king; and at the same time he enacted, that it should be for ever after called England; and that those who before were named Jutes or Saxons, should now be styled Englishmen." Egbert may indeed have published an edict for the confirming or reviving that name; but that it was in use long before his time, is evident from the laws of King Ina.

Bede himself, who wrote long before Egbert, gives his history the title of the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation, though it much more relates to the churches of Kent, Wessex, Sussex and Essex, than to those of Mercia, Northumberland, and East-Anglia. We have already said, that the change of the name of Britain into that of England, ought to be carried back to the year 585 or 586; and Egbert had no reason to call the various kingdoms England, since he himself was a Saxon, and the provinces his own kingdom consisted of were peopled with Saxons and Jutes. Some historians positively affirm, that very shortly after the founding of the various kingdoms, the name of England was given to Britain by the unanimous consent of the various kings; but this can by no means be applied to the time of Egbert (above two hundred and fifty years after), since that prince could not have published this edict till after the dissolution of the octarchy. Besides, how can we explain why Bede, who lived one hundred and fifty years before Egbert, should call the three nations settled in Britain, English, if that monarch was the author of that name? But what is still more convincing is, that though the subjects of Ina, king of Wessex, were Saxons or Jutes, that prince, in his laws enacted for the West-Saxons, only styles them English. "If an Englishman," says he, "commits theft,"—Again, "If a Welsh slave shall kill an Englishman,"—Is it not plain, that unless this name had been common to the three nations, Ina would not have called his subjects Englishmen, but Saxons? In short, it is not at all strange that immediately after founding the different kingdoms, the Anglo-Saxons should term their conquest, England, since the Angles were in possession of a larger and more considerable tract of land than both the Saxons and Jutes. But it was not probable this name should be introduced in the reign of Egbert, when the three kingdoms of the Angles were gone to decay, and the kingdom of the West-Saxons was in a flourishing condition.

Egbert died in 836, after he had reigned thirty-six years, twenty years as king of Wessex only, six years with the dignity of monarch, and ten years as chief sovereign of all England. Redburg, his wife, had never assumed the title and port of a queen, because of the law made in Wessex, on account of the death of Brithric. She is said to have persuaded the king to forbid the Welsh, on pain of death, to come beyond Offa's dike, the boundary of Mercia and Wales.

Egbert was succeeded by a son named Ethelwulph, both as king of Wessex, Essex, Kent, and Sussex, and as sovereign of the other three kingdoms. Egbert had had, doubtless, another son, as Ethelwulph was designed for the church; but whether he died previously to his father, is doubtful. A modern historian, Mackintosh, says, Egbert "weakened the power of his successor, and lessened the influence of the Bretwalda, by bequeathing all his own dominions, except Wessex, to a younger son." What became of this other son, if he did survive his father, is unknown. He must have died, as we hear of no interruption from him of the dominion of Ethelwulph. Some say there was also a daughter called Edgith, who founded the abbey of Pollesworth, but this is equally uncertain.

By all that has been recorded of Egbert, we perceive he had the qualifications of a great warrior. He accomplished his ends, not by such treacherous methods as Hengist and Offa, but by way of arms, which though no less criminal, tarnishes not the reputation of those that make use of it, especially when crowned with success. It is a lamentable thing that ambition, by which princes are led to invade the property of others, should pass in the world for a virtue, and that a historian, by reason of men's depraved notions, should not dare to represent it in its true colours, since, generally speaking, all ambitious princes are honoured with the surname of great.

ETHELWULPH.

Some historians assert that Ethelwulph was obliged to have a dispensation from the pope, because he was in holy orders; but it is a matter of very great doubt, and at the same time of very little consequence.

Ethelwulph was hardly seated on his throne before a fleet of Danes appeared near Southampton; and after they had roved up and down for some time, they landed and ravaged the country along the shore. Ethelwulph, who was a lover of peace and ease, sent Wulfherd, his general, against them, who drove them back to their ships. But the king had not reason long to rejoice at this victory; for before his army returned, news was brought him that more Danish forces, having landed at Portland, were plundering and destroying the country. Though he had no reason to be displeased with Wulfherd, he sent Earl Ethelhelm to command the army, who was shamefully beaten and put to flight; and Herbert, the succeeding general, was still more unfortunate, for he was not only vanquished, but lost his life in the battle. These two victories gave the Danes the opportunity of overrunning several counties, particularly Kent and Middlesex. Canterbury, Rochester, and London, were great sufferers on this occasion, the enemy committing great atrocities before they returned to their ships.

Some historians make Witglaph, king of Mercia, die this year, 839; whilst others place his death two years sooner, in 837; but this difference is of little moment, as he was but of little importance after he became vassal to the king of Wessex. Berthulph, his brother, succeeded him.

The next year Ethelwulph, not at all satisfied with his two last generals, resolved to go in person against a body of Danes who arrived in thirty-five ships, and landed on the coast of Wessex. The two armies engaging at Charmouth, the English were defeated, and thought themselves happy that the enemies, after their victory, were contented with carrying off their booty, the only aim of these Danish expeditions.

This year, 840 (or as some historians say, the year before), was very remarkable for the entire destruction of the Picts. After a long war with the Scots, their neighbours, they lost two successive battles, which disabled them from making any further resistance; and Keneth II., king of Scotland, who was exasperated against them for having slain his father, and inhumanly mangling his corpse, told the Scots they ought not to lose the present opportunity of rooting out a nation that had been their perpetual enemies. His advice was approved of, and executed with such a barbarous fury, that from that time nothing remained of that miserable nation. It is chiefly owing to his extirpating, or at least entirely subjecting the Picts, that Keneth II. was looked upon by the Scots as an illustrious prince, and one of the founders of their monarchy.

The Danes continuing their incursions, Ethelwulph, who was naturally slothful, thought himself unable to govern alone all his dominions, exposed as they were to the perpetual insults of foreigners; and this consideration, strengthened perhaps by his tender affection for Athelstan, his natural son,* made him resolve to resign to him the kingdoms of Kent, Essex, and Sussex, with the title of king of Kent, reserving to himself the sovereignty of all England, with the kingdom of Wessex.

ETHELWULPH in Wessex. ATHELSTAN in Kent.

Andred, king of Northumbria, died in 841, and was succeeded by Ethelred his son.

Roderic, surnamed Mawr, that is, the Great, who was then king of Wales, a prince, to whom the British historians give the highest commendations, about this time attacked Berthulph, king of Mercia, with great success. Roderic left three sons, among whom he shared his dominions, which by that means were divided into the three kingdoms of Venedotia, Demetia, and Powis.

Ethelred, who ascended the throne of Northumbria in 841, was driven out of the country three years after, by one of the factions that for a long time prevailed in that kingdom, and Redowald put in his place; but the new king being slain shortly after by the Danes, in a descent made on Northumbria, Ethelred was recalled by his party, who were now become powerful enough to support him in the throne.

The Danes never failed to visit England once a year, purely for the sake of plunder; and in 845, the earls Enulph and Osric, with Bishop Alstan, gave them battle near the river Parret, in Somersetshire, and obtained a victory, which probably was the reason the English remained unmolested for some years.

The king of Northumbria reigned but three years after his restoration; the opposite party having put him to death, a thane, named Osbert, was placed on the throne by a faction; but the troubles and divisions in that kingdom gave the Danes opportunity of making frequent incursions; and whenever they came, they were sure of being welcome to the weakest party; neither of the factions scrupling to join with them.

Whilst the Danes were thus employed in the north, the southern provinces enjoyed some tranquillity. But at length, in 851, they landed on the coast of Wessex, where they committed great atrocities, and after ravaging the country, were met as they were returning to their ships with their booty, by Earl Ceorle, Ethelwulph's general, who waited for them at Wenbury, and being incumbered with their spoils, they fought in such disorder, that they were entirely routed. Some time after King Athelstan attacked the Danes on the sea near Sandwich, and took nine of their ships, but could not, however, prevent another band from wintering in the Island of Sheppy.

The Danes, next spring, came up the Thames with 300 sail, and nothing being able to oppose them, landed near London, where they began their usual ravages.

Whilst the two kings were making preparations, the Danes not content with ravaging the country, attacked the towns; and London and Canterbury were great sufferers on this occasion. Having pillaged these two cities, they marched into Mercia, and overthrew an army led against them by Berthulph; and would have overrun all England, if the preparations of Ethelwulph and Athelstan had not deterred them; and induced them to repass the Thames, with the design to give the two kings battle, now encamped at Okely in Surrey, where a bloody battle was fought, in which the English were victorious, who made such a slaughter of the Danes, that few escaped.

Berthulph, king of Mercia, died this year, and was succeeded by Buthred, with the consent of Ethelwulph, whose daughter he had married.

After the battle of Okely we hear nothing more of Athelstan, and therefore presume he did not long survive that great victory, to which his valour greatly contributed.

ETHELWULPH alone.

Ethelwulph was very religious, if not bigoted; and was entirely guided by Swithin, bishop of Winchester, and Alstan, bishop of Sherborn. He is said to have granted to the church the tithes of all his dominions, by the advice of Swithin; and from his zeal for religion, he sent to Rome his youngest son Alfred, then about five years of age. In the year 855 he himself visited Rome.

The English college founded by Ina and enlarged by Offa, having been burnt down the year before, he caused it to be rebuilt in a more magnificent manner than before; and desiring to endow the college with greater revenues than his predecessors had done, extended the tax of Peter-pence all over his dominions, which till then had been levied only in Wessex and Mercia. He obliged himself also to send to Rome yearly the sum of three hundred mancuses, or marks, two hundred whereof were to be expended in wax tapers for the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the remaining one hundred for the pope's private use. These are the liberalities that have given occasion to certain historians to assert, that Ethelwulph made his kingdom tributary to the holy see. But whatever wrong appliance might be made of them in the course of time, it is certain they were no more originally than charitable donations to the churches and English college.

Ethelwulph having satisfied his devotion and curiosity by a twelve months' stay at Rome, returned home through France, where he married Judith,* the daughter of Charles the Bald, a young princess of twelve years of age.† This unsuitable as well as unseasonable match, he having already several children, was made another pretence for the conspiracy forming against him in England by Alstan, bishop of Sherborn, and Ethelbald his son.

By the mediation of the nobility Ethelwulph resigned to his son the ancient kingdom of Wessex, and retained only that of Kent for himself, in which were comprised also Essex and Sussex.

ETHELWULPH in Kent. ETHELBALD in Wessex.

Ethelwulph out-lived this partition but two years, which he spent in doing acts of charity, administer-

* She is called Leotheta in the Saxon annals.

† This does not appear from our English historians. R. Higden says, that he married her in the 12th year of his reign. Ethelwulph's first wife was Osburga, the daughter of Osloc his cup-bearer, who was descended from Stuff and Withgar.

* The Sax. Ann. W. Malmb. and Ethelwerd, call him only the son of Athelwulph. Chronic. de Mailros styles him Ethelwulph's brother, and Mat. Westm. says, that he was his natural son. So little agreement is there between the ancient historians in this and other matters.

ing justice to his subjects, and endeavouring, by the force of his example, to induce them to lead lives conformable to the precepts of the Gospel.

The Saxon annals tell us, that about this time, Edmund, a youth of fifteen years of age, was crowned king of East-Anglia. He was son of Alcmund, a prince of the royal blood, who fled into Germany when Offa seized upon East-Anglia; but it is not said whether this was done with the consent of Ethelwulph and Ethelbald, or whether, taking advantage of the dissension between the father and son, the East-Angles resolved to have a king of their own. Edmund was guided, during his youth, by the advice of Bishop Humbert, who instilled into him sentiments of justice and equity, of which his subjects reaped the benefit.

Ethelwulph, by his will, disposed of the kingdom of Kent to his second son Ethelbert, and the kingdom of Wessex to Ethelbald, Ethelred, and Alfred, in the order of seniority. It is not clearly ascertained whether it was customary for the kings to dispose of their dominions by will, or whether Ethelwulph was the first that did so. However that may be, it is certain Ethelwulph's sons succeeded one another by virtue of this will. He also directed his heirs to maintain one poor person for every tithing in his hereditary lands. He died in 857, having reigned twenty-one years, leaving behind him four sons and one daughter, who was married to Buthred, king of Mercia, and died at Pavia in 888. Ethelbald, the eldest son, was already in possession of the kingdom of Wessex; and Ethelbert, his brother, succeeded to Kent, Essex, Surrey, and Sussex, comprised under the name of the kingdom of Kent. Ethelred and Alfred were ill provided for; but we shall see that they in succession mounted the throne.

ETHELBAID in Wessex. ETHELBERT in Kent.

Ethelbald's reign was remarkable neither for any event of moment, nor for any action of his own, worth recording. All historians agree, that he was a prince of little capacity, and of an evil disposition. He is said by some Saxon historians to have married Judith of France, his father's widow; and to have been brought to a sense of his fault by Swithin, bishop of Winchester, and to have undergone a severe penance for it; which probably consisted in making grants to monasteries. He died in 860, having reigned two years in Wessex during his father's life, and about two years and a half after his decease. Ethelbert, his brother, already in possession of the kingdom of Kent, succeeding to Wessex, by virtue of their father's will, reunited the two kingdoms.

ETHELBERT alone.

The Danes having left England for some years unmolested, immediately after Ethelbert's coronation renewed their invasions. Landing at Southampton, they penetrated as far as Winchester, the metropolis of Wessex, which they reduced to ashes; and they would have proceeded to much greater mischiefs, had not Osric and Ethelwulph, two West-Saxon earls, with some troops drawn together in haste, beaten them back to their ships.

Another time they came in autumn, and landed in the Isle of Thanet, where they wintered in order to begin their incursions in the spring. Ethelbert offered them a sum of money to retire, which they accepted on the terms proposed, but treacherously rushed into Kent. Ethelbert levied an army to intercept them in their retreat, and prevent them from carrying off their booty; the dread of which preparations made them embark with their plunder so hastily, that it was not possible to intercept them.

Ethelbert's reign, which lasted but six years, affords little matter for history. He died in 866, leaving two sons, Adhelm, and Ethelward, who did not succeed him, his younger brother Ethelred ascending the throne by virtue of Ethelwulph's will.

ETHELRED I.

The reign of Ethelred was short and unfortunate. From his coronation to his death, he had one continued conflict with the Danes; who began with attacking Northumbria, which at length they became masters of. They proceeded next to East-Anglia, which they also subdued; and after extorting money from the Mercians, they entered Wessex.

The authority reserved by Egbert over the kingdoms of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumbria, and enjoyed also by his son Ethelwulph, was now much weakened by the frequent invasions of the Danes. Whilst the kings of Wessex were employed in the defence of their own dominions, it was hardly possible for them to think of enforcing their sovereignty over the three kingdoms of the Angles, to whom Egbert was willing to leave a shadow of liberty; and therefore, by degrees, the Northumbrians, as most remote from Wessex, had freed themselves from servitude; and the various factions had so far agreed at last as with unanimous consent to place Osbert on the throne.

But a civil war was excited by an outrage of Osbert on the wife of a thane of the name of Bruern-Brocard; he being said to have ravished her during the absence of her husband when entertained by her on returning from a hunting party. By the incitement of the injured earl, the Bernicians successfully revolted, and elected a king of the name of Ælla. And not satisfied with this revenge, he invited a body of the Danes over to expel him entirely from Northumbria, and consequently, Ivar entered the Humber with a numerous fleet, and without any difficulty became master of the northern side of the Humber; whence he marched directly to York, where Osbert was preparing an army to oppose him.

After two signal victories, Ivar, without any difficulty, took possession of all Northumbria; but this not satisfying his ambition, he marched into Mercia, plundering and ravaging without mercy whatever came in his way. Buthred, king of Mercia, having had time to prepare, had called to his assistance Ethelred, his brother-in-law, who joined him with all the forces of Wessex. Ivar was now advanced as far as Nottingham, in expectation of surprising the king of Mercia; but when he was informed Ethelred had joined him, he stopped short, being apprised that his forces were inferior to those of the English chiefs. The two armies remained near one another for some time, but at last separated without fighting.

Ivar, from the time he arrived in England, had cruelly ravaged all the places wherever he came, particularly the monasteries, where the English endeavoured to conceal the most valuable effects. He left Hubba, his brother, in Northumbria, and embarking with the flower of his troops, made a descent on East-Anglia, where Edmund was king, of whom we have already spoken. This young prince, more used to acts of devotion than to the exercise of arms, having given the Danes battle, was easily overthrown, and compelled to save himself by flight. He endeavoured to conceal himself in a church, but being discovered, was brought before Ivar at Hegilsdon.* The conqueror offered to leave him in possession of his kingdom, provided he would acknowledge him for sovereign, and pay him tribute; but Edmund refusing these terms, Ivar ordered him to be tied to a tree, and shot at with arrows, and then to have his head cut off. Humbert, bishop of the East-Angles, was also put to death by Ivar's order; and Edmund's head being found some time after, was interred with his body at St. Edmund's Bury, so called from him; and whilst the Roman Catholic religion was predominant in England, great numbers of miracles were pretended to be wrought at his shrine.

Ivar, being thus master of East-Anglia, appointed a Danish captain, one Godrim, or Guthrun, governor of it; and afterwards having recalled his brother Hubba from Northumbria to be near his person, he made Egbert, by birth an Englishman, but entirely at his devotion, king there.

The success the Danes had met with during this war inspiring them with hopes of becoming masters of all England, they began to form new projects. Ivar, having perfect information of the state of the island, embarked his troops and sailed for the coast of Wessex, where, landing his army, he advanced as far as Reading; but Ethelred, who had foreseen his design, marched his army towards that quarter, accompanied by Alfred, his brother. It would be tedious, and perhaps impracticable, to relate the particulars of this war.† It is sufficient to say, that within the compass of one year, Ethelred fought nine pitched battles, and upon all occasions gave signal proofs of his courage and conduct, though fortune did not always prove favourable. In the last battle, which was fought near Wittingham, he received a mortal wound, of which he died in 871, after a reign of five years.

Though Ethelred was noted for his great bravery, yet his piety is said to have surpassed even his valour. A historian tells us, that being at prayers on a day of battle, he resolved not to move until the service was over, though the fight was begun, and the Danes had some advantage; and he adds, God rewarded his piety with a signal victory.

Ethelred left several children, amongst whom, according to some historians, was a daughter called Thyra, married to Trotho VI., king of Denmark. Ethelred's sons did not succeed to the crown, for the same reason that the sons of his elder brother Ethelbert were set aside, namely, the will of Ethelwulph; according to which, Alfred, his brother, mounted the throne without any question being made to his title.

* Now called Hoxon, in Suffolk.

† The particulars delivered by Huntingdon and the Saxon annals are as follows:—"The first battle in these parts between the English and Danes (three days after the coming of these) was fought at Inglefield, in Berkshire, in which the English got the victory. Four days after, there was another fight at Reading, in which Ethelred and Alfred were overcome. But four days after, they defeated the Danes at Aston, near Wallingford, and Basreg (so in the originals), the two Sidrocs, and several thousands of Danes, were then slain. A fortnight after, the English were beaten at Basing, in Hampshire; and again, two months after, at Marden, in Wiltshire, in which last battle Ethelred received his death's wound. After the battle of Basing, there came a fresh army of Danes from beyond sea, and joined those that were already in England."

During Ethelred's reign, the Danes demolished the famous monasteries of Croyland, Ely, Peterborough or Medeshamsted, besides that of Coldingham before mentioned. It is chiefly on the description of what befell the abbeyes that historians have enlarged, whilst doubtless they omitted events more remarkable, and more worthy the notice of a curious reader.

ALFRED THE GREAT.

Ethelred had left the affairs of his kingdom in a deplorable condition. The Danes, already masters of Northumbria and East-Anglia, were in the very heart of the kingdom of Wessex; and notwithstanding the many battles Ethelred had fought with them, they were in possession of several towns, and not only maintained their position in the country, but had reason to hope they should soon complete the conquest of it. Alfred had scarcely been a month on the throne, when he found himself obliged to take the field against these formidable enemies, who were advanced as far as Wilton; whither he marched to attack them the first time, after his brother's death. Victory for some time inclined to his side; but changed on a sudden in favour of the Danes; but his loss was not so considerable as to make him despair, though the victory certainly belonged to the Danes. He laboured incessantly to put his army in condition to give them battle again, before they should be reinforced; and they were astonished at his expedition, and though victorious, sued for peace, finding they were unable to continue the war; and as they offered to march out of his dominions, on condition he would molest them in no other part of England, he accepted their offer, and gained by this treaty time to prepare against a new invasion.

The Danes, quitting Wessex, retired to London, which they had taken during the late war. Ivar was gone back to Denmark, having left the command of the army to his brother Hubba, who being prevented from attacking Wessex, turned his arms against Mercia. Buthred, knowing he was unable to resist, since Alfred was bound not to send him any succours, thought it his wisest course to buy off the Danes with a sum of money, and save his country from their depredations. Upon the receipt of the money, they marched towards Northumbria, designing to take up their quarters with their countrymen; but their provisions running short, in consequence of the devastations they themselves had made there, they were under the necessity of returning into Mercia. Before they had left Northumbria, they had deposed Egbert, whom they had placed on the throne, and put Ricsige, a Danish earl, in his room. Buthred finding they were come again into his dominions, complained of their breach of faith; but without regarding his complaints, they obliged him to give them another considerable sum to save his country from the destruction it was threatened with; but no sooner was the money paid, than they fell to plundering and ravaging; and Buthred soon found that even his own person was in danger. The fear of falling into their hands obliged him to abandon his kingdom, and retire to Rome, where he spent the residue of his days in the English college. Mercia being thus left without a king, and Alfred being prevented by his own treaty from lending any assistance, the Danes without difficulty became masters of that spacious kingdom. However, not to alarm the Mercians too much, they set over them for king, Ceoluph, one of Buthred's domestics. And though the new king was an Englishman, yet holding the kingdom in trust only for the barbarians till they should otherwise dispose of it, he resolved to make use of his time to gratify his private avarice: so that the Mercians suffered as much by the continual rapines and extortions of their degenerate countryman, as they would perhaps have done by the rapacity of a foreigner.

Though the Danes were masters of Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumbria, they were not contented; but fearing to renew the war, cultivated the lands they had acquired, and began to consider the country they had so often and so terribly laid waste, as their own; and England, thus divided between the English and Danes, seemed about to be restored to tranquillity.

But whilst Alfred flattered himself with the enjoyment of some quiet, new calamities were preparing for him in Denmark; Halfden, a Danish general, having fitted out a fleet, with which he made a descent upon East-Anglia. The arrival of Halfden with these fresh forces, ought to have put Alfred upon his guard; but trusting to the treaty he had lately made with the Danes, he remained unprepared, of which Halfden did not fail to take the advantage. In the beginning of the spring the latter put to sea, and took by surprise Warham-castle, the strongest place in all Wessex.

The English seemed hitherto not to be aware what kind of enemies they had to deal with. They considered the Danish irruptions as a regular war, wherein the whole nation was concerned; and accordingly imagined that a treaty concluded with one band or party was obligatory on all the rest. But the Danes entered, with the consent of their kings, into private associations to man out fleets and go shares in what booty they could get in England and other countries; and for this reason, the several bands were independent of one another, all thinking themselves bound by no other treaty but that which they themselves entered into. Alfred had made an agreement with Hubba; but Halfden did not consider himself as included in it. However, the English considering the surprise of Warham as treachery, exclaimed bitterly against the violation of the treaty; but Halfden, regardless of their complaints, was about to penetrate further into Wessex, had not Alfred prevented him by entering into a particular treaty with him. The author of his life says, "the Danes swore by the holy relics of the church, that they would never set foot again in Wessex." It is probable it cost the king very dear to bring them to these terms; and it is something strange that Alfred should insist upon men's swearing by the holy relics, who being yet pagans could not think themselves more strongly bound by this, than by their usual oath, by their bracelets. Perhaps he considered the oath as really more religiously binding, or that his subjects would be more indignant if they violated it, which they immediately did, and began ravaging as they were even quitting Wessex; and as they were marching towards Mercia, they met a body of English horse, who were riding in a careless manner, in consequence of the treaty being concluded, and unexpectedly setting upon them, slew the greatest part of them. The horses they took upon this occasion, were of service to carry them with the more speed towards the western parts of Wessex, where they laid siege to Exeter.

Alfred finding it was in vain to conclude treaties with such a perfidious race of people, resolved to take more effectual measures to secure himself from their treachery; and to this purpose convened a general assembly, and represented to them that they had nothing to trust to but their own valour and courage, to deliver them from their miseries; and urged upon them the absolute necessity of venturing their lives in defence of their country, and of sacrificing part of their estates to preserve the remainder. His eloquent remonstrances having produced the effect he expected, an army was immediately levied, with which he engaged the enemy seven times in one campaign; but as fortune was not equally favourable to him in all these engagements, he was once more constrained to treat with the Danes; and though he could have no great dependence upon their promises, it was the only way by which he could put an end to a disastrous war. The new treaty, in which the Danes undertook not to return any more into Wessex, was somewhat better kept than the former.

The West-Saxons looked upon the retreat of these formidable enemies as a great deliverance; but they were yet far from the climax of their miseries. This band, which had struck them with such terror, were scarce gone, when a new swarm arrived, under the command of Rollo, the famous Norman general, who became afterwards the scourge of France. Fortunately, Alfred was in some measure prepared to receive them; and after some attempts, Rollo despairing of procuring a settlement in England, resolved to go in quest of one in France. In all probability, finding the best part of England in possession of his countrymen, and Alfred ready to dispute the rest with him, he imagined he had a better prospect in France. Some superstitious chroniclers inform us, it was revealed to Rollo in a dream what success he should meet with in France.

After his departure, Alfred enjoyed some repose, which afforded him leisure to revolve means to prevent these frequent invasions; and he ultimately determined to equip a fleet, and engage the Danes before they came to land, where they generally had the advantage; and as the latter had not contemplated being engaged at sea, their ships were only fit for transports, whereas those built by Alfred were contrived on purpose for warlike service. It was not long before he reaped the fruit of this wise precaution; for his fleet meeting with six Danish vessels, gave chase to them, and one of the largest being taken, the soldiers and mariners were thrown overboard; and this first engagement was followed by a much more considerable one. A hundred and twenty sail of Danish transport ships making to the shore in order to land their men, the king's fleet attacked them, and sunk the greatest part of them; and the next year another Danish fleet sailing westward, met with so violent a storm, that all the ships perished, except a few which fell into the hands of the English.

Alfred, encouraged by these successes, resolved to attack the Danes in the west, where they had fortified themselves by the taking of Exeter, and where the Cornish men had always taken part with them; and he ultimately obliged them to give him hostages, and entirely abandon Wessex. They retired into Mercia, where being weary with leading such unsettled lives, they were incorporated with their countrymen, who were already in possession of that kingdom. After which they deposed, with one consent, Ceoluph, and divided the land among themselves. What kind of government they established we know not; the Saxon historians, passing over in silence the civil affairs of the Danes, and relating only their wars. Thus was an end put to the kingdom of Mercia, after having subsisted near three hundred years.

The year before, the kingdom of Northumbria had met with the same fate. Halfden, who was gone thither, made Egbert king in the room of Ric-sige, who died in 876; but the new king, or viceroy, was of no long continuance; for in the first year of his reign, Halfden dethroned him, and divided the land among his countrymen; which no doubt excited the Danes in Mercia to do the same. Thus the kingdom of Northumbria, which had lasted three hundred and thirty years from the time of Ida the first king, was divided among the Danish marauders.

Though the Danes were in possession of three of the ancient kingdoms of the heptarchy, or octarchy, yet was there not space enough for all those that were already in England, and for those which were continually coming over with intent to settle. The new-comers consequently beheld Wessex with a rapacious eye; and on the other hand, those who had shared the lands of the other kingdoms among them, perceiving their countrymen envied their good fortune, were apprehensive they might think of dispossessing them, if they were not otherwise provided for: which made them all desirous to invade Wessex, and exert their utmost to conquer that kingdom, which hitherto had so bravely withstood their attacks. They carried on their design with the utmost secrecy and expedition; and suddenly, a formidable army of Danes appeared in the field, which advanced rapidly towards Wessex,* before Alfred could possibly put himself in a posture of defence; and attacking Chippenham,† one of the finest and strongest cities of the kingdom, made themselves masters of it in a few days. The loss of this place inspired the West-Saxons with such a terror, that they had no longer the courage to defend themselves. Some fled into Wales, or beyond sea, whilst others went over to the Danes, and swore allegiance to them; and in this so general a revolt, Alfred was left alone with a few domestics, who, out of duty and affection, were unwilling to abandon him in his adversity. But as they were chargeable to him, and could do him little service, he dismissed them all, that he might with more ease provide for himself; and such was his distress, that he was compelled to conceal himself at a neat-herd's‡ in the Isle of Athelney in Somersetshire.§ This place was surrounded with a large morass, through which there was but one narrow footpath leading to the neat-herd's cottage, which was hid by bushes and briars; and here the king lay concealed for some time from his friends as well as enemies, without being even known by the neat-herd's wife, who employed him about her household affairs.* This was a wretched situation; but he had not been six months in his retreat, before he was relieved by an unexpected turn in his affairs.

Hubba, who commanded the Danish troops in the absence of his brother Ivar, had invaded Wales, and destroyed all with fire and sword. After which he entered Devonshire, in the kingdom of Wessex, with the same intent; and at his approach, the earl of Devon, with a handful of brave men, retired into Kinworth-castle† to avoid the first shock of his fury. Hubba was not long before he laid siege to the castle, not doubting but the garrison, being few in number, would soon be obliged to surrender; but the earl of Devon, finding all the defence he could make would be to no purpose, induced the besieged to sally out sword in hand upon the Danes, which they did, and by their furious attack put them immediately in extreme disorder; and continued so to press them without giving them any time to recover themselves, that they at length entirely dispersed and made a dreadful slaughter of them.‡ Hubba was slain, and his famous standard, called reafan, or the raven, in which the Danes believed there was a secret virtue, and which Ivar's sisters had themselves wrought,§ fell into the hands of the English. It is said that the Danish soldiers believed that the raven on the standard presaged victory or defeat, by either clapping or drooping his wings before battle: probably some rude deception on the part of their leaders.

On this victory, Alfred immediately collected his friends, and advised them to draw together in several parts of the kingdom, small bodies of troops, which at the shortest warning might be ready to join one another.|| The most difficult as well as most important point was, to know exactly the posture of the enemy; and Alfred, not knowing who to employ on this most dangerous and difficult service, resolved himself to undertake it. Having disguised himself, and taken a harp in his hand, as if he had maintained himself by playing on that instrument, he entered the Danish camp, and stayed there several days. He found that the Danes had neglected their usual precaution of encamping themselves on a hill; that they had not placed any advanced guards to secure the avenues to their camp, and, in fact, considering themselves in a state of perfect security, as the Saxons had no army in the field, were totally unprepared for service. He returned to his friends at Athelney, and appointed Selwood forest¶ for the general rendezvous of all their troops; and the matter was transacted so expeditiously, that in a little time Alfred attacked the Danes at the head of an army, consisting of the inhabitants of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire, that had not fled beyond sea. The Danes, though assaulted thus unexpectedly, defended themselves with their usual courage. But whether it was that they had not time to draw up their troops in order, or the loss of their standard had possessed them with a notion that their gods were adverse to them, they were at length entirely routed, and almost their whole army cut in pieces; and the few that escaped betook themselves to a castle, where they were immediately besieged. Alfred taking advantage of the consternation thus struck into the whole body of resident Danes, compelled them to capitulate; and granted them terms more advantageous than they could have expected. Agreeing to entirely resign the lands of East-Anglia to those who were willing to become Christians, and requiring those who were not, immediately to quit the island, with a promise never to return; hostages for the performance of which were to be given. Guthrun, chief of East-Anglia, who since the death of Hubba commanded the Danish army, agreed to these conditions, and came to Alfred with thirty of his chief officers, having embarked all those that refused to be baptized.*

Alfred thus by a single battle recovered his kingdom, and every day his subjects, whom fear had dispersed or constrained to submit to the enemy, flocked to him. All the historians agree, that he invested the Danish general with the title of king of East-Anglia; but it is not known whether he did so by virtue of some private treaty made before, or with a view to engage him in his interests. The kingdom of East-Anglia was now wholly inhabited by Danes, and Guthrun divided the lands among his countrymen, and exercised the regal authority as long as he lived.

It is to be observed, that at the time of the last battle, there were in England two sorts of Danes; those who were already settled, and those who were endeavouring to procure themselves habitations. It was probably with the last that Alfred treated; as the former were anxious to be left in quiet possession of their settlements; and accordingly all those Danes settled in the three kingdoms of the Angles, submitted quietly, and swore allegiance to him. But they were not all equally satisfied; as several had accepted of the terms of the last treaty, only because they knew not whither to go, and became Christians, to procure a subsistence, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to return to their old course of life. That this was the case, evidently appears from what followed. When it was least expected, the most considerable among them, headed by Hastings, earnestly solicited Guthrun to renew the war in Wessex;† but not prevailing, they put to sea, and went and ravaged the coast of Flanders; and shortly after, another and no less numerous troop, informed of the great booty the first ravagers had met with at Kent, embarked to join them. These two bands thus united Petra Ecbrecht, supposed to be Brixton in Somersetshire: staying there one night, he marched away the next morning to Æglea, or Okely, where he encamped one night: the next day he came to Ethandum, or Edington, in Somersetshire, where the battle was fought.

overran Brabant, Hainault, Flanders, Picardy, and Artois, perpetrating unheard-of cruelties. After which, having again divided into two bodies, one of them sailed back to England, in hopes of plundering the country, where they imagined they should come unexpected. Having landed in Kent, they marched towards Rochester, with design to surprise that city; but Alfred, who, contrary to their expectation, had his army in readiness, speedily marched towards them upon the first notice of their arrival, and his approach was sufficient to make them fly to their ships in such haste that they left their plunder behind them.* His vigilance having prevented their designs upon England, they returned to France, and rejoining their companions, continued their devastations in that kingdom.

Hitherto the English had only acted on the defensive. Exposed to the continual invasions of the Danes, and uncertain where the enemy would land, they were generally surprised, before it was in their power to defend themselves; and the sea-coast being uninhabited, there was nothing to prevent the piratical marauders from landing unopposed. Alfred's first care, therefore, was to equip a considerable fleet, the advantage of which he had already experienced, with which he determined to cruise along the coasts, and attack all Danish ships laden with booty. Sixteen were surprised in the port of Harwich in East-Anglia, part of which were captured and the remainder sunk; and a considerable booty was also obtained.† Guthrun, incensed at this act of hostility in one of his harbours, suffered the parties aggrieved to endeavour to retrieve their losses, and even furnished them with means; and it was not long before they found an opportunity of attacking, and gaining some advantage over Alfred's ships. The Saxon fleet, however, in general maintained the superiority and kept the Danes in awe.

Alfred having thus secured the sea-coasts, fortified the kingdom with castles and walled towns; repairing those that had gone to ruin, and building others in so strong a manner that they could not easily be assaulted; and as London, considerable both for its size and situation, remained in the hands of the Danes, and gave them a passage into Wessex, he resolved to invest it, and the besieged were in a little time obliged to capitulate. He is said to have added both to its strength and beauty,‡ and committed the government of it to Ethelred, who had married his daughter Elfreda, or rather gave it him, with the title of earl of Mercia. Some historians say that he conferred on him the title of king; but there appears to be no authority for such an assertion. The creating Ethel-† Asser says, that all their ships and booty were taken, and Alfred ordered all the men to be put to death.

‡ We have no certain account of the origin of this celebrated city. But as it is not evident there was any such place in Cæsar's time, and yet a large town in Nero's, it is probable it was founded in the reign of Claudius, and inhabited by the Britons and Romans together, being a trading, though not a military colony from the very beginning. The walls are said to have been built by Constantine the Great, at the request of Helena his mother, containing within them an oblong space of three miles in compass. The origin of its name is unknown. Cæsar's saying, the Britons called the places fenced round with woods and groves, cities or towns, made Camden conjecture London was so named from Llhwn, which signifies in British, a particular town, as if we should say, by way of eminence, the city.

red, earl of Mercia, did not invest him with power over any other part of that province, except London; as all the rest was in possession of the Danes, over whom he asserted no other right but that of a nominal sovereignty, to which they had lately consented. Ethelred, therefore, was honoured with an empty title, until such time as by his valour he could conquer a larger dominion for himself.

The repairing and fortifying great numbers of towns by Alfred, employed him some years; and these fortifications served equally to defend the kingdom against the Danes, and to keep those in subjection who were settled in the island; who finding every precaution was taken, were disposed to remain quiet; and they even permitted several of the English, whom they had driven from their habitations, to return and live among them under the protection of their chieftain.*

This state of things lasted for the then almost unprecedented term of twelve years, and during this comparatively long peace, Alfred by his wisdom and genius perpetuated the foundation, if he did not entirely found, the future glories and liberties of England. But as the particulars of this eventful period will be more fully related hereafter, we shall at present pursue the relation of the wars.

The Danes, who, under the conduct of Hastings, their most notorious chief, ravaged for twelve or thirteen years together France and the Low-Countries, were not satisfied with the prodigious booty they had gained. And as according to the custom of pirates, they prodigally squandered away what they had acquired without pains or labour, they were always compelled to renew their ravages. Disheartened by two terrible checks given them by Eudes and Arnulph, kings of France and Germany, they resolved to return into England, not so much for the sake of settling, as to plunder; and for this purpose they fitted out three hundred ships, which they divided into two fleets. With the first, consisting of two hundred sail, they arrived on the coast of Kent,† and took Appledore;‡ and this place, which was then considerable, made them masters not only of that province, but also of Sussex and Surrey. The other fleet commanded by Hastings, and consisting of eighty sail, entered the Thames, and landed at Middleton.§ It would be difficult to describe the miseries inflicted on the inhabitants by these barbarians. Alfred was then in East-Anglia, on account of Guthrun's death; and as he had received no intelligence of their designs, he had made no preparations for his defence. All he could do, therefore, was to take a new oath of fidelity from the East-Anglian Danes, which they regarded only whilst he stayed with them: for on his departure, they immediately went and joined Hastings, in hopes to share in the plunder. Alfred, amidst all these dangers, was not however discouraged; but drawing together what troops he could, he marched against those Danes who were pillaging Kent; but being informed by the way that another body of Danes had entered Wessex, he altered his course, and advanced towards these last, as judging them most dangerous; and those Danes, who were before Exeter, consequently raised the siege in haste, and went and vented their fury in some other place.

The Saxon historians are so exceedingly confused in their accounts of this war, that it is impossible to give the particulars of it. There being several different bands of Danes in a state of hostility at the same time, is probably the cause of the contradictions and intricacy of the old chroniclers.

We are ignorant, also, by what fortunate occurrence Alfred found himself suddenly freed from enemies so lately spread over the whole kingdom. It is however certain, after they had reduced England to a deplorable state, the last comers suddenly retired, though historians have not told us the cause of their departure. Some have conjectured it was owing to the plague, which raged then in England, and swept away great numbers of Danes as well as English; but it is probable, that having plundered the country in such a manner that there was nothing left to pillage, the greatest part of them returned to France, under the command of Hastings. The terror that successful marauder had everywhere spread along the sea-coasts having put all upon their guard, he resolved to steer his course where he was not expected, and sailed for the Mediterranean; and whilst there, he contrived, by the following impious and perfidious stratagem, to become master of Luna, a town situated on the coast of Tuscany. He pretended to be desirous of becoming a Christian, and was actually baptized by the bishop, whom he had sent for; and some days after, he had the same bishop falsely informed that he had died like a good Christian, and earnestly desired to be buried in the church of Luna, to which he had bequeathed a considerable legacy; by which device, he and a great number of Danes, under the mask of the funeral, entered the city, and immediately murdered and plundered the inhabitants.

This powerful bandit ultimately fixed on Chartres* for his residence, a town that the French king, Charles the Simple, had presented to him to purchase his forbearance. And there he ended in peace a life almost wholly spent in plundering the maritime countries of Europe. The Danes, who refused to follow him when he left England, put themselves under the command of one Sigefert, settled in Northumbria, and for some time, they also committed ravages on the coast of Wessex,† without venturing, however, to advance into the country, and at last retired to ravage elsewhere.

As soon as the Danes, who had settled in England, found they were deprived of the assistance of their countrymen, they applied themselves how to secure their present possessions. The continuation of the war was so far from being likely to increase their advantages, that they had reason to fear they should by that means lose what they already possessed; and were therefore induced at last to submit to the dominion of Alfred, and acknowledge him for sovereign of all England. Historians do not inform us whether he was compelled to use force to perfect this desirable object: but it is certain his authority was acknowledged, as well in Northumbria, Mercia, and East-Anglia, as in Wessex. The Welsh themselves, who had been terribly plundered by the Danes, finding they were in no condition to resist, became his tributaries; and it is said, the king of Scotland paid him homage also. But this is too disputable a point to be positively affirmed.

As the laws, during the war, had been very much neglected, and were become almost unknown to the people, Alfred made a collection of the best he could find. He inserted some of the judicial laws of the Old Testament, and several of those formerly enacted by Ina, king of Wessex, and Offa, king of Mercia, in their respective kingdoms; and to these he added many of his own, adapted to the circumstances of his people. Throughout these laws may easily be observed an ardent zeal for justice, and a sincere desire of rooting out oppression and violence. They were indeed mild, if compared with those of later ages, seeing they punished most offences by mulcts and fines; but the strictness wherewith Alfred caused them to be observed, counterbalanced their lenity. If with respect to private persons the rigour of the law was somewhat abated, it was not so with regard to corrupt magistrates; for to such Alfred was ever inexorable; and history informs us that he executed four-and-forty judges within the space of one year, for corruption.

These precautions seemed to be sufficient to hinder the poor and the defenceless from being oppressed by the rich and great. But as Alfred was sensible the spirit of oppression naturally grew upon men in authority, he studied to prevent that injustice; and to that end, ordered, that in all criminal actions, twelve men, chosen for that purpose, should determine concerning the fact, and the judge give sentence according to their verdict. This privilege, enjoyed by the English to this day, is doubtless the noblest and most valuable that subjects can have; and an Englishman accused of any crime, is to be tried only by his peers, that is, by persons of his own rank. These twelve men, chosen out of many others, with the approbation of the person accused, are called by the collective name of jury; and these are properly the persons by whom the life or death of the party accused is determined. We must here remark that the purity of the jury would be greater, if this rule of being tried by peers (equals) were more strictly attended to. The law makes but the distinction of nobles and commons; whereas, there is a much greater distinction between a labourer and a wealthy trader, than there is between one of that class and a modern nobleman.

The wars had caused such disorders and licentiousness in the kingdom, that vagabonds and vagrants everywhere abounded, who committed all kind of crimes with impunity, their poor and mean condition screening them from justice; and as they had no settled abode, upon committing any offence they merely shifted their quarters, and thus eluded justice. To prevent this and other evils, Alfred divided all England into shires* or counties, the counties into hundreds, and the hundreds into tithings; which being done, all the inhabitants of the kingdom were obliged to belong to some tithing; and whoever did not, was looked upon as a vagabond, and as such denied the protection of the law.

* From the Saxon word scyre, that is, to branch or divide. Spelman says, that Alfred was not the first that divided the kingdom into shires, but only fixed their number and limits.

Every householder was to answer for his wife, his children under fifteen years of age, and his domestics. If any one by his way of living fell under suspicion, he was obliged to give security for his good behaviour; and in case he could find none, the tithing threw him into prison, to prevent their being liable to the penalty he might incur by any offence. Thus the householders being responsible for their families, the tithing for the householders, the hundreds for the tithings, and the counties for the hundreds, every one was watchful over the public conduct. If a stranger guilty of any crime made his escape, information was taken of the house where he lodged, and if he had been there three days, the master of the family was condemned to pay his fine; but in case he had not stayed so long as three days, the householder was acquitted upon making oath he was not privy to his crime.

Alfred also invited over from foreign countries learned men, to whom he gave pensions, and dispersed them in the several dioceses, to instruct the people; and not satisfied with this, and desirous of having in his own kingdom a nursery of learning, he founded four schools or colleges at Oxford. In the first, the abbot Neots and Grimald read divinity; in the second, Asserius, a Benedictine monk, taught grammar and rhetoric; in the third, John, a monk of St. David's, set up a chair for logic, arithmetic and music; and in the fourth, Johannes Scotus professed geometry and astronomy. This last was surnamed Erigena, that is, the Irishman, from the word Erin, or Irin, the true name of Ireland; and he was also called Scotus, no doubt upon the same account, the inhabitants of Ireland being then termed Scots. It is related of this Johannes Scotus, so famous in the republic of letters, that he was stabbed to death by his pupils with penknives; but some say, he taught in Malmsbury-abbey, and not at Oxford.* We find also among the learned men encouraged by Alfred, Plegmund, a Mercian, who became archbishop of Canterbury, and many others. It is unnecessary to stay to examine whether the colleges founded by Alfred were the first foundations of the university of Oxford, or whether before that, there were at a place called Grecklade the like schools, which were removed from thence to this city. It is enough to observe, that from very small foundations, the university of Oxford has advanced to its present state.

All resolutions relating to the public Alfred governed with the advice and assistance of the general council or assembly of the nation, called in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, to which rank and office gave a right to sit, and which was independent of the king. This assembly, styled at present the parliament, a name taken from the French, was composed of the two archbishops of Canterbury and York, the bishops, earls, viscounts, or high-sheriffs of the counties, and the thanes of the first rank or barons. It has been disputed with great warmth, whether the people had a right to send representatives to this assembly.

Alfred induced the English to build their houses in a stronger and more regular manner. At that time there was scarce any but timber houses; but Alfred

* Camden says, Alfred founded but three halls or schools; the first, at the end of High-street for grammarians, was called Little-University-Hall; the second in School-street, for philosophy, was styled Less-University-Hall; and the third, in High-street, more to the west than the first, for divinity, was named Great-University-Hall, now University-College.

having raised his palaces with stone or brick, the nobility by degrees began to follow his example; but this mode did not become general till several ages after. The monasteries, that were destroyed by the Danes, and afterwards rebuilt, had, we may conclude, the benefit of this improvement, as places that were held in still greater veneration in the following than in the present century. The religious houses, however, did not begin to be inhabited again until the following reigns; and at the time we are speaking of they were almost forsaken, for the lands designed for the maintenance of the monks being wasted by the Danish wars, there was scarce a man to be found willing to embrace a monastic life; which is a clear evidence, that it was not so much devotion as idleness that filled the religious houses. During the reign of Alfred, the repugnance to a monkish life was so great, that the king was compelled to stock the monasteries with foreigners, there being scarce such a thing as a monk in the kingdom. But after his death, when the lands were restored to the monasteries, the zeal for that mode of life began to rekindle; and, although in Alfred's days, there were more monasteries than monks; in a few years after, the monks were grown so numerous, and increased daily in such a manner, that there were not religious houses enough to contain them.

Whilst Alfred lay concealed in the Isle of Athelney, he made a vow to dedicate to the service of God the third part of his time, as soon as he should be restored to a state of tranquillity. He was punctual to his vow, and allotted eight hours every day to acts of devotion, eight hours to public affairs, and as many to sleep, study, and necessary refreshment; and as the use of clocks and hour-glasses was not yet introduced into England, he measured the time by means of wax-candles, marked with circular lines of different colours, which served as so many hour-lines.* And to prevent the wind from making them burn unsteadily, it is said he invented the expedient of enclosing them in lanterns.† But it is doubted whether this invention is of so modern a date.

His charities were very extraordinary considering his revenues. He educated, at court or at Oxford, a great many young noblemen, who were instructed in all things necessary to render them one day serviceable to their country. But this was not his only method of promoting the arts and sciences, for his own example, and devotion to his studies, greatly contributed towards it. The progress he made in learning, notwithstanding his being so long employed in his wars and the administration of the government, demonstrates how well he improved his intervals of public business. The author of his life assures us, he was the best Saxon poet of his time, and for the age an excellent grammarian, orator, philosopher, architect, geometrician, and historian. He composed several works, that were in great esteem; and among others, translated into Saxon, Pope Gregory's Pastoral, Boethius de Consolatione, and Bede's Ecclesiastical History. He complained bitterly, that from the Humber to the Thames there was not a priest that understood the Liturgy in his mother tongue, and that from the Thames to the sea, there was not one that knew how to translate the easiest piece of Latin. This universal ignorance, and the little relish the English then had for the arts and sciences, caused him to earnestly invite to his dominions foreigners who were eminent in their professions; and he took particular care to have always about him the most noted workmen and architects, and to keep them employed, with the sole view of improving their skill. He placed in the chairs at Oxford, men famous for their learning, and rewarded them handsomely. His aim was to excite the emulation of the English, and to redeem them from the barbarous state of ignorance into which they had sunk. The fame of his great wisdom and piety reaching as far as Rome, the pope sent him a large quantity of relics, and upon his account granted some new privileges to the English college; and Abel, the patriarch of Jerusalem, willing also to show him marks of his esteem, sent him a present of relics, which he received with great satisfaction.

He divided his revenues in two parts, one of which was wholly assigned for charitable uses, and subdivided into four portions. The first for alms to the poor: the second for the maintenance of the monasteries he had founded: the third for the subsistence of the professors and scholars at Oxford: the fourth for poor monks, as well foreigners as English. The other half was divided into three divisions; one was expended in his family; another in paying his architects, and other curious workmen; and the rest was bestowed in pensions upon strangers, invited to his court for the encouragement and instruction of his subjects. This monarch is justly distinguished with the surname of Great; and all historians unanimously represent him as one of the greatest that ever wore a crown. It is, however, said that in the commencement of his reign he was subject to great violence of temper; that he was haughty towards his subjects, and indulged the impetuosity of his passions; so much indeed, as to draw down the censure of his kinsman St. Neot. But these may be the assertions of faction which his vigour subdued; and at all events, are but the weaknesses incidental to humanity. His subsequent greatness proves his was one of those firm and lofty souls which misfortune strengthens and purifies.

He died in 901, in the fifty-third year of his age, after a reign of twenty-nine years and six months, the greatest part of which was spent in war.

Alfred had several children by Alswitha his queen: some of whom died before him; which was the case with Edmund, his eldest son, whom he designed for his successor. Of those that survived him, Edward mounted the throne after him. Ethelwald was educated at Oxford, and became a very learned man, and died in the fortieth year of his age, in 922. Elfleda, the eldest daughter, wife to Ethelred, earl of Mercia, became very famous in her brother Edward's reign. Alswitha, or Ethelswitha, called also Eltrude by the Flemish writers, married Baldwin, earl of Flanders; and Ethel-

* He ordered just such a quantity of wax to be made into six candles, each twelve inches long, with the division of the inches marked out distinctly. These being lighted in succession, burned four hours each, that is, every three inches an hour, so that the whole six candles lasted just twenty-four hours, the watching of which was committed to the keepers of his chapel, whose office it was to put him in mind how each hour passed.

† Glass was then a great rarity in England, and it is said that the king ordered some fine white horn to be scraped so thin as to become transparent, and put into close frames of wood, which defended the candles from the injury of the wind. Thus lanterns, though of vulgar use and estimation, were the invention of a man of genius.

githa, a nun, was made abbess of Shaftsbury nunnery, which had been founded by her father.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

When Edward ascended the throne, England was almost equally divided between the English and Danes. The Danes inhabited Northumbria and East-Anglia, whence they had driven the English during the wars. The English were still in possession of Wessex, containing the ancient kingdom of Essex, and all the country lying south of the Thames. Mercia was peopled with a mixture of Danes and English, but in such a manner, that the English were superior in the south and west parts, and the Danes in the east and north. During the latter part of Alfred's reign, the Danes had remained very quiet, from fear of provoking that prince to invade their possessions. Besides, they were very well satisfied to enjoy some repose, in order to fortify their settlements in England; and therefore, the retreat of their countrymen was to them rather an occasion of joy than sorrow.

It has been observed that King Ethelbert, elder brother to Alfred, left two infant sons. Ethelward, the eldest, having arrived at the death of Alfred, to man's estate, determined to lay claim to the crown; under the plea that Ethelwulph, his grandfather, could not with justice settle the kingdom upon all his sons successively, to the prejudice of the children of the eldest. He further argued, that granting he had a power to do this, there was no reason the succession, after the death of the four brothers, should continue in the family of the youngest, when the heirs of the second were alive. That besides, at most he could but entail the kingdom of Kent, which he was in possession of, and not the kingdom of Wessex, which belonged not to him when he made his will. Though these reasons appeared plausible; yet Ethelward met with no encouragement from the English, most probably from the great veneration they had for Alfred's memory, which made them adhere to his son. The ancient historians not having expressed themselves clearly upon this point, it would be difficult to decide the abstract title by the public laws of the Saxons, which are not sufficiently known.

Ethelward, finding his countrymen unwilling to support his title, applied to the Danes, who very probably had incited him to this undertaking; and began his design upon the crown by seizing Winburn, a fortified town in Dorsetshire. He expected to be attacked; but hoped, if that place made ever so little resistance, the Danes would keep Edward so much employed in other parts, that it would not be possible for him to retake it. But his hopes were in vain. Edward came upon him with such expedition, that he nearly surprised him in Winburn, before he had taken necessary measures for his defence; and he had hardly time to escape out of the town, and fly to the Danes, who were now in arms; and who, on his arrival, proclaimed him king of England, pretending, as they were in possession of half the kingdom, they had as much right to make a king as the West-Saxons.

The retreat of Ethelward among the Danes, made the king sensible he was about to be involved in a war, the consequences of which were to be dreaded; and immediately after the taking of Winburn, he marched towards Northumbria, at the head of his army which daily increased by the arrival of troops from all parts of the country. The Danes were astonished at his expedition, and finding themselves in no condition to resist him, were constrained to abandon and banish from their country the prince they had undertaken to protect. They also soon had reason to repent of having espoused his cause, or not defending it better; for this fruitless attempt cost them several strong holds in Mercia, which Edward deemed necessary to secure. He did not think proper to chastise them more severely at this time, lest he should urge them to the necessity of sending for succours from Denmark; and he remained satisfied therefore with repairing some fortresses in Mercia, in order to confine them within narrower bounds.

Ethelred, earl of Mercia, and Elfreda his wife, were very serviceable to the king in this war, by making head against the Mercian-Danes, and preventing the Welsh from coming to their aid. It is related of Elfreda, that having suffered exceedingly with her first child, she made a resolution never to have another, and kept her resolution; and from thenceforward wholly devoted herself to arms, and like a true Amazon, gave proofs of her courage in all the king her brother's wars with the Danes. She was generally styled (not only lady and queen, but) king, in admiration of her manlike and royal abilities.

Ethelward, upon leaving England, applied to France, and obtained a powerful aid of Normans; and with these forces he landed in Essex, and easily became master of that kingdom. Edward, not expecting his enemy could have been so soon ready to make a fresh attempt, had taken care only to guard Mercia against the Northumbrian-Danes, imagining Essex to be in no danger. The arrival of the Normans roused the Danes of Northumbria and East-Anglia, who ravaged the country inhabited by the English in a merciless manner. But Edward, in this war, ultimately gained so many victories, that the Danes lost all hopes of throwing off the English yoke, and his cousin of mounting the throne; and at length Ethelward being slain in battle, and the Danish forces considerably diminished, they were not able to carry on the war with the vigour with which they began it. However, they continued it two years after Ethelward's death; when having in vain endeavoured to repair their losses, they sued for peace; which Edward readily granted them, on condition the Danes would acknowledge him for sovereign as they had done his father, and the Normans forthwith return to France.

After three years, the war was renewed, and proved fatal to the Danes, who lost in a very little time two battles; and Edward took from them several towns in Mercia, and at length drove them quite out of that kingdom. Then it was that Ethelred, who had all along bravely seconded the king his brother-in-law, became in reality earl of Mercia; but he died almost as soon as that whole province was united under his government. This earl was not merely governor or viceroy of Mercia; he had some particular power, the nature of which it is very difficult to learn from the historians that speak of it. Malmsbury says he held the country as a fief of the crown, much in the same manner as the German princes held their territories of the empire. Of this, Elfreda his widow's cession to the king her brother of the cities of London and Oxford, is a further proof. If Ethelred had been only governor or viceroy, Elfreda would have had no right to resign these two places, since they would not have belonged to her.

Elfreda having taken upon her the government of Mercia, after Ethelred's death, followed the example of her father and brother, in fortifying the towns, to take away from the Danes all hopes of settling in Mercia again. Among the places she repaired, or fortified, the chief were, Warwick, Tamworth, Wedensbury, Charbury, Eadsbury, and Chester. The last had lain in ruins for some time. When Elfreda had taken these precautions, she carried her arms into Wales, and after several victories, obliged the Welsh to become her tributaries.

The year 915, according to some historians, is memorable for the founding of the University of Cambridge by King Edward; but some maintain it to be of a much later date, and others again, on the contrary, carry its antiquity a great deal higher, and attribute the founding of it to one Cantabrigia, a Spaniard, three hundred and fifteen years before the birth of our Saviour; and some cutting off almost a thousand years of this antiquity, are contented with asserting, that Sebert, who reigned in Essex in the beginning of the seventh century, was the first founder.

From the year 910, when the war between the English and Danes was rekindled, to the year 922, we find in history nothing but a long series of battles; during which the Princess Elfreda, sister to King Edward, died, leaving an only daughter, named Elswina, then marriageable.

In these wars, the Danes daily lost ground; and the Mercian-Danes were the first that threw down their arms. The East-Angles followed soon after, submitting without terms; and the Northumbrians were the last, as being the most powerful, almost all Northumbria being inhabited by Danes. The progress Edward had made in the other provinces, convinced them it would be better to submit than continue a war which must end in their ruin. They were then governed by three kings; Sithric and Nigel his brother reigned beyond the Tyne, and Reginald, who resided at York, ruled all the country between the Tyne and the Humber. Some time after, Sithric having slain his brother Nigel, became sole king of the north.

The state of the Welsh depended in some measure on that of the Danes. As long as the Danes were in arms, the kings of England left the Welsh peaceably to enjoy their liberty; but as soon as they had nothing to fear from the north, they seldom failed to attack them. At such a juncture it was, that Elfreda, assisted by the troops of the king her brother, compelled them to become her tributaries; but on her death the Welsh endeavoured to free themselves from the tribute she had laid upon them, and to keep Edward employed, sent a powerful aid to the Danes. Edward, having then other affairs upon his hands, took no notice of it: but as soon as he had concluded a peace with the Danes, marched against Rees ap Madoc, then king, who was assisted by Leoffreth, a Danish general; and after several indecisive skirmishes, obtained a signal victory, which reduced the Welsh to a necessity of suing for peace, with a promise of paying the usual tribute. The Britons of Cumberland, who had put themselves under the protection of the Danes, submitted also to Edward.

virtues, it must be owned he was far short of his illustrious father in all other respects. He had children by three women, the first named Egwina, a shepherd's daughter, was only a concubine. Malmsbury relates concerning this woman a sort of romance, which, on account of the sequel, it will be necessary to insert: although it has no better foundation than some old ballads handed down to his time. The historian says, Egwina, a shepherd's daughter, as she lay asleep in the fields, dreamt that the moon shone out of her womb so bright that all England was enlightened by the splendour; and some time after, she took occasion to relate her dream to an old woman that had been King Edward's nurse. This woman, who pretended to interpret dreams, imagining there was something extraordinary in this, took Egwina into her house, and educated her, not as a country girl, but as a person of superior quality; and Egwina answered all the old nurse's care; for whilst she was in the house of her benefactress, Edward fell desperately in love with her; and the old woman induced Egwina to consent to his wishes. Edward was extremely fond of her, and had by her three children, of whom Athelstan, the eldest, succeeded him; Alfred, the second, died before his father; and the third was a daughter, called by some Editha, by others Beatrix.

Edward had two sons and six daughters. Elfwald, the eldest son, died at Oxford a few days after his father; Edwin, the second, was deprived of his just rights, and came to a miserable end, as will be related hereafter. Of the six daughters, some were married to powerful princes, by the care of their brother Athelstan, and others became nuns. Elfreda, the eldest, was abbess of Ramsey. Ogina was married to Charles the Simple, king of France, and was mother of Lewis d'Outre Mer. Edilda passed her days in a monastery. The fourth, of the same name, was married to Hugh the Great, earl of Paris, father of Hugh Capet. Edgitha was wife of Otho, emperor of Germany. Edgiva, the youngest, espoused Lewis the Blind, king of Provence, who had a son by her, named Constantine.

By Edgiva, Edward had two sons and two daughters. Edmund and Edred, the two sons, were both kings of England. Edburga was a nun, and her sister Edgiva was married to Lewis, prince of Aquitain.

It is very probable, that Edgiva was confounded with her sister of the same name by the second wife, who was married to Lewis, king of Provence, because there was then no prince of Aquitain mentioned in history.

The Danish historians give Edward another daughter, named Thyra, who, as they affirm, was wife of Gormon III., one of their kings; but it is strange they should speak so positively of a princess of England, unknown to all the English historians.

During the reign of Edward the Elder, Rollo, chief of the Normans in France, had gained such firm footing in Neustria, that it was not in the power of the French to drive him thence; and Charles the Simple, then king of France, was compelled, in order to free himself from the continual fears of so troublesome a neighbour, to confirm to him by a grant, that part of Neustria of which he was already possessed, lying between the Seine and the Epte, with the title of duke of Normandy. The conditions were, that Rollo should do homage to the crown of France, be baptized, and marry Giselle the king's daughter. Rollo died, according to Mezerai, in 917; but some authors place his death in 924, and others with still less reason in 928. William his son, by Poppa, daughter of the earl of Bayeux, was his successor.

ATHELSTAN.

Elfward, Edward's eldest son, surviving his father but a few days, and the rest of the legitimate children being all under age, Athelstan, son of Egwina, was placed on the throne, with the consent of the clergy and nobility. Alfred, his grandfather, had conferred the honour of knight-hood upon him, by girding him with a sword, according to the custom of those days. Edward his father had committed the care of his education to Earl Ethelred, his brother-in-law, and the Princess Elfreda his sister, who did not neglect the trust reposed in them.

Some of the principal chieftains disdaining, as it is said, to be governed by a bastard, conspired to dethrone Athelstan, and place Edwin in his room. Alfred, the chief of the conspirators, had even taken private measures to seize Athelstan at Winchester, and put out his eyes; but his plot being discovered, he was apprehended by the king's order, but would confess nothing; and obstinately persisted in protesting his innocence, and offered to purge himself by oath in the presence of the pope. Although this way of justifying himself was far from being a proof of his innocence, Athelstan agreed to it, and sent him to Rome, to take his oath before Pope John. Perhaps he was unwilling to begin his reign with blood, or, it may be, was apprehensive the treating too severely a person of the first rank would draw upon him the further ill-will of the nobles. Shortly after, word was sent him from Rome, that Alfred having sworn his innocence before the pope, suddenly fell into a fainting fit, which lasting three days, ended with his life; and that the pope, convinced by this accident of Alfred's perjury, had ordered his body to remain in the English college till the king's pleasure should be known. Upon which, Athelstan, pleased with being thus rid of his enemy without having directly contributed to his death, consented he should have Christian burial: his lands were, however, confiscated, and given to Malmsbury monastery, and the king had inserted in the grant the whole conspiracy, "to testify to the world that he dedicated to God what was his own."

The death of Edward, and the conspiracy of Alfred, affording the Danes, as they imagined, a favourable opportunity to revolt, they had begun to take such measures as obliged Athelstan to march into their country; but as they had not yet drawn their forces together, they were so surprised by the arrival of the king on their frontiers, that without endeavouring to defend themselves, they returned to their allegiance; and Sithric, one of their kings, sued for peace, upon whatever terms the king might be pleased to impose. Athelstan being desirous to live in peace with the Danes, that he might have time to establish himself in the throne, not only pardoned his revolt, but gave him his sister Editha in marriage, on condition he would receive baptism.

The dissensions in the north being thus appeased,

Athelstan marched back to Wessex, where advice was brought him soon after of Sithric's death, who by a former marriage had left two sons, Anlaff and Godfrid. As the historians of those times are not very particular, we are ignorant of the reason of Athelstan's resolving to deprive these two princes of their father's dominions; but however that be, as soon as he heard of Sithric's death, he returned at the head of his army into Northumbria, by a march so expeditious, that Anlaff and Godfrid, as well as Reginald, another Danish king residing at York, had scarce time to escape falling into his hands; and their hasty flight gave him the opportunity of becoming master of all Northumbria, except the castle of York.

Though he had taken care to secure his conquest, by placing strong garrisons in all the towns, he was uneasy at the escape of the three Danish princes. It was not known what had become of Reginald, and Anlaff was fled into Ireland, where he was very secure. Athelstan therefore was obliged to be satisfied with requiring Constantine, king of Scotland, to deliver up Godfrid, who had retired into his dominions; and Constantine, being sensible he was not in condition to deny anything to him while at the head of so powerful an army, promised to deliver the prince into his hands, and give him a meeting at Dacor; but whilst he was preparing for his journey, Godfrid made his escape, either through the negligence or connivance of Constantine, who, however, met Athelstan, accompanied by Eugenius, king of Cumberland. Athelstan admitted Constantine's excuses for the Danish prince's escape; but, if the English historians are to be credited, obliged both the kings to do homage for their kingdoms; this, however, the Scots positively deny, averring that England had never any right of sovereignty over Scotland until the twelfth century.

Before Athelstan quitted the north, Godfrid made an attempt upon York, by means of the castle, where he had still some friends; but failing in the attempt he put to sea, where for some time he exercised piracy; and when wearied with that way of life, surrendered himself to the king of England, who received him kindly, and allowed him a handsome pension. Some time after, upon some disgust, or ill-grounded suspicion, he withdrew again, and was never more heard of.

Anlaff, a prince of greater abilities than his brother, took better measures for his restoration. He had, as we have observed, retired into Ireland, where being informed that the king of Scotland was displeased with Athelstan, he believed he might make use of this opportunity to persuade him to espouse his cause. To that end, he passed over into Scotland and intimated to Constantine, that he had reason to fear the worst from the king of England; and represented to him that Athelstan, having by surprise seized upon Northumbria, without the least right, might proceed in the same manner with regard to Scotland, and therefore it was absolutely necessary to prevent him. To this he added the offer of a powerful aid from Ireland, assuring him, with that increase of strength he might easily drive Athelstan out of Northumbria, and free himself from a troublesome and dangerous neighbour, by restoring that kingdom to the Danes, who would serve as a barrier against England. Anlaff found no great difficulty to prevail with the king of Scotland, who, besides being secretly exasperated at the arrogant reception he had met with at the late interview, was grown uneasy at Athelstan's success, and was apprehensive of being invaded himself; and he resolved, therefore, to embark in Anlaff's enterprise.

Athelstan, meanwhile, having strengthened his garrisons, and taken all the precautions he deemed necessary to secure his late conquests, had returned into Wessex, where he remained in peace, ignorant of what his enemies were plotting against him. He was very soon engaged in a war with Howel, king of Wales; who had been incited to hostilities by Constantine, to keep him employed against the Welsh, whilst he and Anlaff should invade Northumbria. But Athelstan, by his expedition, defeated all the measures of the king of Scotland; and directly he was informed of the motions of the Welsh, and the aid sent them by Constantine, he marched into Wales, and giving Howel battle, obtained a complete victory. And in consequence of his victory, he augmented the tribute paid by that prince to England.

This war being thus happily concluded, Athelstan approached the borders of Scotland, to revenge himself on Constantine for assisting the Welsh. As soon as he passed over the borders he took some towns, and gave the Scots reason to dread more considerable losses. As Anlaff had not yet arrived with the promised supplies, Constantine durst not venture to engage alone in a war against a powerful enemy, who had already advanced so far in his dominions, and was in a condition to carry his conquests so much further. To gain time, therefore, until the Irish joined him, he sued for peace; and Athelstan readily granted his request, being extremely desirous to make that prince his friend, for fear he should countenance the insurrections of the Northumbrians. For this reason he restored to him all the places he had conquered in Scotland, in hopes of cementing, by this liberality, an alliance it was then so much his interest to cultivate. Some historians however affirm, Athelstan obliged Constantine to do him homage for Scotland; but the Scots peremptorily deny this, nor is there any good authority for the assertion.

Athelstan's generosity was not sufficient to prevent Constantine from pursuing the execution of his first projects. He rather hastened his preparations the more, being indignant that he was compelled to receive obligations from one whom he always considered as a most bitter enemy. Athelstan, meanwhile, had returned into Wessex, in the full hope of enjoying the repose which he expected his successes would have secured him. But he met with domestic calamities which gave him more anxiety than all the wars he had been engaged in.

A certain courtier, who was the enemy of Edwin, the king's brother, accused that young prince of being concerned in Alfred's conspiracy. Athelstan too readily gave ear to this accusation; and was easily induced to believe that a prince in whose favour the conspiracy was formed was not innocent. It is not improbable that he was glad to find him guilty, as it gave him an opportunity to get rid of one whose position made him dangerous. He would not put him to death publicly, but ordered him to be exposed to the fury of the waves in a vessel without sails or rudder. The young prince went on board protesting his innocence; but finding the king inexorable, he cast himself headlong into the sea. The moment Athelstan had gratified his passion, he was seized with remorse; and to quiet his conscience, founded the abbey of Middleton, in Dorsetshire, where prayers were offered to Heaven day and night, for him and his brother's soul. The Saxon historians add, that, not content with this, he submitted to a seven years' penance, but do not inform us of what it consisted. Edwin's accuser had not reason long to rejoice at the success of his malicious calumnies; for one day as he waited at table with the king's cup, one of his feet slipping, he would have fallen, had he not by the nimbleness of the other recovered himself. Whereupon he jokingly said, "See how one brother helps another;" which senseless jest cost him his life; as Athelstan, who overheard it, and considered it as a covert reproach, ordered him to be immediately executed; and thus, says the old chronicler, revenged his brother's death by that of his false accuser.

Whilst these things were passing at court, Constantine continued his preparations for the execution of the project concerted between him and Anlaff. The latter, whom some groundlessly style king of Ireland, had contrived to engage in the league, the Irish, Welsh, and Northumbrian Danes, who ardently desired to have a king of their own nation on the throne. Anlaff appeared as head of this league, though Constantine was no less concerned in it, the war being carried on chiefly at his expense. The project was managed so privately, that Anlaff entered the Humber with a fleet of six hundred sail, and invaded Northumbria before Athelstan had any intelligence of his motions; and with such forces, and the assistance of the Danes settled there, he easily became master of several small ill-guarded towns; but the fortified places that were well garrisoned by the English stopped his progress, and gave Athelstan time to draw his army together; who used such expedition, that he surprised the two confederate princes upon their march towards Bernicia. It had been agreed that this small kingdom, if conquered, should be apportioned to the king of Scotland; but the prompt measures of Athelstan by surprising the invaders, totally defeated their plans. The two armies met at Brunanburgh,* where a bloody battle was fought; in which victory finally declared for Athelstan; and the allies lost Constantine, king of Scotland, six other Irish or Welsh kings, and twelve earls and general officers. This victory was chiefly owing to the valour of Turketul, the king's cousin, who was afterwards abbot of Croyland.

Athelstan, after gaining this battle, easily extended his conquests further into Scotland, and chastised the Welsh by raising their tribute to twenty pounds weight of gold, three hundred of silver, and twenty-five thousand head of cattle; besides which, they were driven beyond the Wye, and lost all the country between that river and the Severn. As for the Northumbrian Danes, who had openly sided with the allies, Athelstan for a punishment increased their yoke, and kept for the future a stricter hand over them. After he had settled the affairs of the north, he marched against the Cornish Britons, who had likewise assisted the confederates;

* Supposed to be Bromford, near Bromridge, in Northumberland; though some think it was somewhere nearer the Humber. In the description of this battle, the historians and poets of that age are exceedingly full of bombast; and the Saxon annalist, who is usually wont to be sober and succinct, launches out strangely. Axminster, in the borders of Devonshire, is famous for the tombs of the Saxon princes slain in this battle of Brunanburgh; they being conveyed thither after the victory. Athelstan subsequently took Cumberland and Westmoreland from the Scots, and recovered Northumberland from the Danes.

and took Exeter, formerly destroyed by the Danes, and caused it to be carefully repaired and fortified. From that time the Britons were compelled to retreat beyond the Tamar, which served for a boundary to the two nations. They had previously been intermingled with the English in some of the western counties.

We shall conclude the reign of Athelstan with an incident which the best historians have thought worthy their notice, although it sounds like one of those romantic fictions with which rude historians deck their narrations. A few days before the battle of Brunanburgh, Anlaff wanting to know the posture of the enemy, went into the English camp disguised like a harper, as Alfred the Great was said formerly to have done; but notwithstanding his disguise, he was detected by a soldier, who suffered him to go away undiscovered. As soon as the soldier thought him safe, he told Athelstan what had happened, and advised him to remove his tent, judging Anlaff had some design upon that quarter; and excused himself for not having discovered this secret sooner, by saying he had formerly given his military oath to Anlaff, and therefore could not resolve to betray him. Athelstan generously forgave him, and followed his advice, which he soon found to be of great consequence; as the next night, the Danish prince, with a body of chosen troops, attacked the English camp, and penetrated to the very place where he had seen the king's tent; and a bishop who had arrived in the camp that night, and had accidentally pitched his tent in the same place, was slain with all his followers.

Athelstan out-lived the victory of Brunanburgh but three years; dying a natural death in 941, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and the sixteenth of his reign. Historians have dilated on the glory of his arms, but much more on the miracles Heaven wrought in his favour. His abilities caused him to be feared by his neighbours, beloved by his subjects, and respected by the greatest kings in Europe. The Emperor Otho, and Hugh the Great, his brothers-in-law, gave him frequent demonstrations of their esteem, by making him considerable presents; and the noble matches he made for those of his sisters who preferred the marriage-state to a cloister, are clear evidences of his great reputation in the world. His sister Ogina, widow of Charles the Simple, king of France, being obliged to fly for refuge into England with her son Lewis, who from thence had the surname of Outremer, he gave them an honourable reception, and furnished them with all things necessary during their exile; and it is affirmed, his application and countenance did not a little contribute to the restoring the king, his nephew, to the throne of his ancestors. Though he seemed to be entirely engrossed by military affairs, he found time to cause justice and civil government to flourish in his dominions; which is proved by the excellent laws he from time to time added to those of Alfred, his grandfather. From those of his laws which are still extant, it appears that his intent was to create an equality in civil and religious immunities, as he was exceedingly opposed to those privileges the clergy had so much increased, and which he found served only to authorize wickedness, and prove a sanctuary to criminals.

Amongst all the monuments of his piety, which for the most part consisted only in building and endowing monasteries, according to the custom of those days, the translation of the Scriptures into Saxon, the then vulgar tongue, is one, the usefulness of which appears to be least dubious. He took great pains to have it well done, employing those that were deemed the most learned persons in the kingdom. Hence it is evident how much the state of learning had been improved by the wise regulations of the Great Alfred, since in his time it would have been impossible to find any Englishman capable of undertaking a work of that nature.

The famous Dunstan, so often mentioned hereafter, was born in the first year of this reign.

Athelstan having no issue, Edmund, the eldest of the legitimate sons of Edward the Elder, was unanimously placed on the throne.

EDMUND I.

Athelstan left England in profound tranquillity. The Welsh paid their tribute regularly; and Anlaff, after his defeat, had retired into Ireland, where he seemed to lay aside all thoughts of any further projects; and the Danes remained in subjection. But as soon as Athelstan was laid in his grave, these last prepared for a revolt; Edmund's youth inducing them to hope they should at length be able to accomplish their long-projected design of having a king of their own nation, who would free them from the English yoke. Anlaff having intelligence of their wishes, resolved to make use of this juncture to recover the crown of Northumbria, but as he was sensible this undertaking could not be executed without a foreign aid, he found means to persuade Olaus, king of Norway, to espouse his cause, who promised to assist him to the utmost of his power. With the troops lent him by this prince, he once more entered Northumbria, and appearing before York, the gates were opened to him, by means of the understanding between him and the principal inhabitants. The example of the metropolis was followed by most of the other towns, whose garrisons were either expelled, or cut in pieces by the citizens, who were generally of Danish race. And Anlaff, not content with being master of Northumbria, marched into Mercia, where his countrymen received him with open arms, and assisted him in recovering several places which Edward the Elder had formerly taken from them.

Though Edmund was not above seventeen or eighteen years of age, the progress of the enemy was so far from daunting him, that it rather made him more eager to decide by a battle to whom a country, so often and so long contended for, should belong; and as soon as he had drawn all his forces together, he resolutely marched towards the north, though he well knew the superiority of his enemy. On the other hand, Anlaff hearing Edmund was advancing with long marches to give him battle, went to meet him with the same confidence; and the two armies meeting near Chester, came to an engagement, wherein victory held the balance so even, that when night came, neither could boast of the least advantage. Both sides prepared to renew the fight as soon as day should appear; but the archbishops of Canterbury and York, who were in the two armies, laboured so earnestly to make peace, that a treaty was begun that very evening, and concluded by break of day. This peace was the more easily made, as neither of the parties could insist upon any advantage gained in that day's action, since neither of them could know either their own or his adversary's loss. By this treaty, Edmund was obliged to deliver up to the Danes all the country lying north of the Roman highway, called Watling-street, which divided England into almost two equal parts, running from North Wales to the most southern parts of Kent, quite to the sea. Accordingly, Anlaf was put in possession of the kingdom of Northumbria, whose bounds by this treaty were enlarged with several counties which his father Sithric had never enjoyed.

The Northumbrian Danes had not reason long to rejoice at the restoration of Anlaf, which they had so ardently desired; for this prince having contracted a large debt with the king of Norway for the troops he had lent him, was anxious to pay it; and to this end he laid heavy taxes on the people, by which he forfeited their affection. The inhabitants of the ancient kingdom of Deira were the first that revolted, and having sent for Reginald, his brother Godfrid's son, crowned him king at York.

Reginald was no sooner on the throne, than he made preparations for the war against his uncle, who was also preparing to dispossess him. The quarrel between these two kings incited Edmund to march towards the north at the head of an army, as well to improve the present opportunity, if there was any appearance of success, as to appease the troubles there, being apprehensive they might give occasion to the foreign Danes to return into England. He arrived upon the borders of Northumbria, when the uncle and nephew, wholly intent upon their private quarrel, thought of nothing less than repulsing the English. He probably might with ease have made himself master of that kingdom; but he was satisfied with procuring peace between the two kings, in such a manner that Reginald was to keep the crown he had lately received; but at the same time, Edmund obliged them both to swear allegiance to him, and be baptized, himself standing godfather.

This forced peace did not last long, and Edmund had hardly returned into Wessex, when the two Danish princes took up arms to free themselves from his yoke, having engaged the Mercian Danes and the king of Cumberland to espouse their quarrel. Whereupon Edmund immediately marched into Mercia, and before the Danes there could be joined by the Northumbrians, took from them Leicester, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, and some other places of less note; and then advancing with the same expedition towards Northumbria, he surprised the two kings before they had drawn their forces together. This sudden attack threw the Northumbrians into such disorder, that the two kings fearing to fall into the hands of Edmund, believed it their only refuge to abandon the island, where they could not possibly remain in safety, so closely were they pursued; and their flight depriving the Danes of all hopes of withstanding Edmund, they threw down their arms, and gave him allegiance.

Before he returned to Wessex, Edmund resolved to punish the king of Cumberland, who, without cause, had taken part with the Danes; and he easily subdued that petty kingdom, whose forces bore no proportion to his own, and presented it to the king of Scotland, in order to attach him to his interest, and prevent him from again assisting the Northumbrians; reserving, however, the sovereignty of it, and obliging that king to do him homage, and appear at the court of England at the time of the solemn festivals, if summoned. This, perhaps, is what gave occasion to the assertion, subsequently made, that from thenceforward the kings of Scotland were vassals to the kings of England. They were certainly so with regard to Cumberland; but it does not appear that they ever did homage for the kingdom of Scotland.

Edmund was not wholly employed in military affairs; and there are some of his laws still in being which demonstrate how desirous he was of the people's welfare and happiness. Having observed pecuniary punishments were not sufficient to put a stop to robberies, which were generally committed by people who had nothing to lose, he ordered, that in gangs of robbers, the oldest of them should be condemned to be hung; which was the first law in England that made it death to rob or steal.

Probably this prince would have rendered his people happy, had his reign been longer; but a fatal accident robbed him of his life. One day, as he was solemnizing a festival at Pucklekirk, in Gloucestershire, Leolf, a notorious robber, though banished the kingdom for his crimes, had the effrontery to enter and seat himself at one of the tables in the hall where the king was at dinner. Edred, the king's brother, enraged at his insolence, commanded him to be apprehended; but perceiving he was drawing his dagger to defend himself, the king himself leaped up in great fury, and catching hold of him by the hair, dragged him out of the hall; and whilst he was wholly intent upon venting his furious passion, Leolf stabbed him in the breast with his dagger, so that he immediately expired upon the body of his murderer. Thus died King Edmund in 948, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, and the eighth of his reign. By Elgiva, his wife, he had two sons, Edwy and Edgar, who did not succeed him, on account of their minority; Edred, his brother, being placed on the throne by the unanimous consent of the clergy and nobility.

During this reign Dunstan began to distinguish himself; being in great favour with Edmund, who made him abbot of Glastonbury.

About this time William Long-Sword, second duke of Normandy, was assassinated by Arnold, earl of Flanders, in a little island of the Somme, opposite Pequigni. Richard I., his son, a minor, succeeded him. As the affairs of Normandy will hereafter be often intermingled with those of England, it will be necessary occasionally to give an account of the succession of the dukes.

EDRED.

Edred being very young when he ascended the throne, the Danes in Northumbria, ever ready to rise, made vigorous efforts to throw off their allegiance, but after a variety of contests they were subdued; and Northumbria was reduced to a province, and Earl Osulph, an Englishman, made governor. From thenceforward Northumbria, kept in awe by strong garrisons and the English earls or governors, gave England no further disturbance, till the foreign Danes again became possessed of it.

After the Northumbrians were thus quelled, Edred lived in profound peace. Absolute in England, and dreaded by the kings of Scotland and Wales, his neighbours, he governed his dominions in perfect tranquillity; and this unprecedented calm was the occasion of his turning his thoughts entirely to religious affairs, being guided by the advice of Dunstan, abbot of Glastonbury, who had great influence over him; and so bigoted was he, that not content with being advised by him in all things, and making him treasurer, he submitted even to receive chastisement from his hands. To gratify this favourite, he undertook the rebuilding of Glastonbury church and monastery, in a very sumptuous and magnificent manner; and he laid out immense sums upon this work, but had not, however, the satisfaction to see it finished.

The monks made use also of Dunstan, their protector's interest, to get into the ecclesiastical benefices, which they could not have done without his influence. Though Dunstan's proceedings in this affair raised the clamours of the secular clergy, he gave himself little anxiety about them so long as he was fortified by the favour of the crown; but his arrogant manner procured him many enemies, who in the following reign made him feel the effects of their hatred, which they were compelled to conceal during Edred's life. If Dunstan favoured the monks, they were no less zealous upon all occasions to promote his fame; they everywhere proclaiming that he was a great saint, that Heaven daily wrought miracles in his favour, and that he was frequently honoured with divine revelations; according to their account, neither the saints of the first rank, nor the apostles themselves, being partakers of so many graces as he.

Those historians who have made it their business to extol the merits and sanctity of Dunstan, tell us, that Edred's death was revealed to him by a voice from heaven, as he was coming to see him; to which they add, his horse fell down dead under him at the prodigious loudness of the voice.*

Edred reigned but ten years; and was buried in the old minster at Winchester. Elfrid and Bedfrid, his two sons, whom he left very young, did not succeed him; but his nephew, Edwy, son of Edmund, his eldest brother, was placed on the throne after him. This election seems equally to favour those who are of opinion, that in the Saxon times the succession to the crown depended entirely on the suffrages of the clergy and nobility, and those who maintain it belonged of right to the next heir; for on one hand, we find Edred's sons deprived by the great men of the king, their father's, inheritance, and at the same time, the crown given to the son of the elder brother, in prejudice of those of the younger.

We find in one of Edred's charters, that he took the title of Monarch of Albion; and in another, that he styled himself King of Great Britain,† in which he was followed by Edgar, his nephew. If these charters were not forged, it may be inferred from thence, that Edred subdued Scotland; but this is no proper place to examine this matter, which has caused such warm disputes between the English and Scots; and whatever the fact may be, the title Edred and Edgar affected to use, was neglected by their successors, till the time of James I., about the end of the sixteenth century.

EDWY.

Edwy, who was so exceedingly fair that he obtained the surname of Pancalus, or the Fair, came to the crown at fourteen years of age, with very different notions of Dunstan from those of his predecessor. Whether he was prepossessed by the enemies of that minister, or had some particular cause of complaint against him, is not known; but he was no sooner on the throne, than he demanded from him an account of the sums the late king had entrusted him with; to which Dunstan replied, the money that had passed through his hands having been laid out in pious uses, he was not accountable for an administration solely relating to religion; and as he urged the building of Glastonbury, which the late king had so much at heart, Edwy's council thought it not proper to push the affair any further, lest the people should espouse the abbot's cause. The founding and repairing of monasteries being in that age such sacred matters, that there was no speaking against them without being branded with the name of impious and profane. The king's council, therefore, finding they could not attack Dunstan on that head, without running some risk, took another course, which was to reverse whatever had been done in favour of the monks; who accordingly were turned out of their benefices, and the secular priests reinstated.

The persecutions of the most cruel tyrants against the church never extorted from the primitive Christians such bitter invectives as this pretended persecution did from the monks. As they represent the matter, religion was never in so great danger; and the most pernicious heresies were nothing in comparison of what was then perpetrated. The monks of Malmsbury made the greatest clamour, and for that reason were turned out of their monastery, which was given to the secular priests. William of Malmsbury, upon this occasion, says, that after it had been inhabited by monks two hundred and seventy years, it was made a stable of clerks. Whether Dunstan incited the monks to make these complaints, or the charging him with it was made a pretence to punish him, he was banished the kingdom. Some say he voluntarily went into exile, without any previous condemnation; but whatever was the cause, he certainly retired to a monastery in Flanders, where he lived in expectation of being recalled by some favourable turn of affairs.

Dunstan's enemies and the king were highly delighted with being freed from such a man; but the latter soon found, by fatal experience, there is no giving offence to ecclesiastics with impunity, and least of all to saints. The monks, enraged to the last degree for the loss of their benefices, opposed to the utmost of their power the administration of the young monarch, whom they looked upon as the principal author of their disgrace. By the calumnies which they everywhere spread, they at length persuaded their votaries he was the most impious of men; and consequently, great numbers of malcontents appeared in Mercia, of whom Edgar, the king's brother, was the declared leader and protector. Having secured Mercia, he went into Northumbria and East-Anglia, where he found the Danes ready to join him; and reduced Edwy to such extremities, that so far from endeavouring to recover what was thus suddenly lost, he was obliged to resign it all, and confine himself entirely to the kingdom of Wessex, which still continued faithful to him. Edgar was immediately elected king of Mercia, by which was meant all the country lying north of the Thames, except the ancient kingdom of Essex; and to exalt the authority of the new king, it was given out, that whilst the great men were deliberating on the choice of a king, a voice was heard from heaven, commanding them to elect Edgar. This base device of the monks was readily received by the credulous and ignorant people.

* Some think this was a contrivance of Dunstan's, to keep the treasure Edred had committed to his trust.

† Buchanan says, that by Great Britain is meant, that part of Britain lying on the south of Adrian's wall, which the Britons inhabited.

whose superstition was encouraged to the extreme by the ambitious and wily ecclesiastics.

EDWY in Essex. EDGAR in Mercia.

This partition of England did not continue long; Edwy falling into an excess of melancholy, which brought him to his grave, after he had reigned four years and some months.

If we believe the monkish writers, he was a very wicked prince. Indeed, how was it possible for a king that did not please them to be recorded as otherwise? However, when we examine all they say to blacken his reputation, we find but one thing which can have any foundation, and which, after all, has very much the air of a fiction, or, at least, is greatly exaggerated. They say, he kept the wife of one of his courtiers for his mistress, and on the very day of the coronation, whilst the chief men were debating the affairs of the kingdom, he abruptly withdrew to the apartment of this woman, from which he was brought back by Dunstan, who alone had the boldness to reprimand him for this infamous action. From that time, if we may believe them, the king and his mistress were so incensed against this holy man, that they would have proceeded to the taking away his life, had he not prevented their wicked design by voluntary exile. But to give a still more convincing proof of the dissoluteness of Edwy, and the holiness of Dunstan, they have invented a story which plainly shows what rancour they possessed. They say, after Edwy's death, his soul being dragged into hell by a legion of devils, one of them was dispatched with the good news to Dunstan; who, far from rejoicing at it, prayed so intensely for the soul that was going to be eternally miserable, that God, moved by his zeal, snatched it from the devils, and translated it into paradise. This last instance of the animosity of the monks against Edwy, renders their charge of adultery very suspicious, especially if we consider he was not above fourteen years of age when he ascended the throne.

Some of the old historians assert that Elgiva was within the canonical limits of kinship permitted by the church; and also assert that Odo, the archbishop, seconding Dunstan, in his illimitable and extraordinary domination over the king, placed Edwy under the lesser excommunication, and branded Elgiva on the forehead, in order to destroy her beauty, and banished her to Ireland. And that on her returning, and the mutual attachment between her and the young king continuing as ardent as ever, he had her ham-stringed, of which outrage she died at Gloucester. These atrocities betray the coarseness of the times, and the power which the ecclesiastics had acquired; but there have not been wanting modern historians who have endeavoured to dignify this arrogant abuse of the temporal power of the priests as the high-mindedness of ministers of heaven, who disregarding earthly grandeur and power, dared to rebuke and chastise vice even on a throne; but the generality of persons will be more inclined to feel disgusted at the tyrannical exercise of a usurped dominion by a set of abandoned hypocrites, totally at variance with the precepts and examples of the Master in whose name they impiously committed crimes, and indulged in vices which he most expressly forbade and deprecated.

EDGAR THE PEACEABLE.

Edwy dying without issue, his brother Edgar succeeded him, and united the two kingdoms, which had been for a short time divided; and though he was not above sixteen years of age, his genius and solid judgment rendered him more capable of governing than many others of a more advanced age.

One of the first acts of the young monarch, was to recall Dunstan from banishment, and promote him to the see of Worcester, then vacant. The suddenness with which this prelate was recalled, gives reason to suspect he was, though absent, concerned in the insurrection that placed Edgar on the throne of Mercia; and his great interest at court during the whole of this king's reign, strengthens the suspicion.

The reign of Edgar is chiefly remarkable for the long-continued tranquillity the kingdom enjoyed; from which he was surnamed the Peaceable. This unusual term of peace is attributable neither to his victories nor slothfulness, but to his extraordinary preparations for defence, in case he should ever be attacked. He always had a large standing army in the northern provinces, as a terror to the kings of Scotland and Wales, as well as to keep in awe his own subjects, particularly the Danes; and he is said to have fitted out four thousand ships, great and small; or according to some authors, four thousand eight hundred. It is probable this number has been considerably exaggerated, but it at all events proves the number of his ships was extraordinary. This numerous fleet, being distributed in all the ports of the kingdom, and cruising incessantly round the island, made the Danes cautious in making descents, and suffered no ship to come upon the coast unexamined. These precautions produced the effect intended by Edgar; for by the mere fear created by his armaments, without even drawing his sword, he obliged the kings of Wales, Ireland, and the Isle of Man, to swear allegiance to him, and acknowledge him for sovereign. The cotemporary historians, in order to heighten the idea of his superiority over the adjacent kings, tell us, that keeping his court at Chester, and going by water to the monastery of St. John the Baptist, he was rowed down the Dee in a barge by eight kings, himself sitting at the helm. But our ideas of this magnificence are very much altered, when it is discovered that these kings were most of them nothing more than petty chiefs, who exercised an uncontrolled dominion on their estates, and who claimed that lofty appellation with about as much propriety as any German baron of the present day might. These mighty crowned heads were the king of Cumberland, the lord of the Isles, and six Welsh kings. Sure kingship must have been as much below par in those days as in more modern.

Edgar, to free the country from the multitude of wolves, which came down in droves from the mountains in Wales, converted the tribute of gold, silver and cattle, paid him yearly by the Welsh, into three hundred wolves' heads, and proclaimed a general pardon for all past offences, on condition each criminal brought him by such a time a certain number of wolves' tongues, in proportion to his crimes. Upon the publishing of this act of grace, the wolves were hunted and destroyed in such a manner, that in three years there was not one left in the kingdom.

Edgar was indefatigable in his endeavours to procure a proper administration of justice, and personally, by progresses and investigation, promoted this desirable and rare advantage. Fines, the common punishment for all crimes at this period, were exacted for ignorantly illegal judgments, and perpetual degradation for wilful corruption. By these means he purified the sources of justice, which had been greatly corrupted by the turbulence and barbarism of the times.

If Edgar was a lover of peace, it was not for want of courage; a weakness never laid to his charge. There is, indeed, a story extant of him, which, though it has the air of a fiction, proves at least he had a character for the reverse. It is said, that being informed Keneth III., king of Scotland, had jested on the smallness of his stature, he sent for him to court, and walking with him in a certain place where he had ordered two swords to be deposited, he bade him take his choice, telling him, at the same time, he should see, if he pleased, what a little man could do; and Keneth, as the story goes, was so far from accepting the challenge, that he threw himself at his feet, and solicited his pardon. This relation appears, from every reason, to be very improbable. In the first place, it is generally referred to the beginning of Edgar's reign; whereas Keneth III. did not come to the crown of Scotland till five or six years before Edgar's death. In the second place, the character the Scotch historians give Keneth does not at all accord with the conduct attributed to him; and lastly, this adventure seems to have been confounded with one of the same nature, between a king of Scotland and one of the lords of his court, related by Buchanan.

Edgar's good qualities, and the tranquillity England enjoyed during his reign, leave no doubt that he was a wise and excellent king. But his bigotry to the monks, which at the time was extolled as the most sublime virtue, is the principal cause of the commendations given him by historians, and of his being honoured with the title of saint after his death. He is said to have founded forty monasteries, and repaired and beautified many more, particularly that of Glastonbury, built by his uncle Edred. He was extravagantly liberal to the monks; and Ingulphus, in his history of the abbey of Croyland, says, that in his reign, the treasure of that monastery amounted to ten thousand pounds, besides holy vessels, shrines, relics, &c. This was an immense sum, considering that house had been rebuilt but thirty years; and from its wealth, an idea may be gathered of the immense riches of the monasteries in those times.

Edgar, not content with being thus liberal to the monks, undertook to put them in possession again of the ecclesiastical benefices; no doubt at the instigation of Dunstan, whom he had made archbishop of Canterbury. This prelate was so much in his favour, that Edred's affection to him was trifling in comparison of Edgar's. As he holds a very prominent place in the history of this and the following reign, and was esteemed as a saint of the highest kind, it will not be irrelevant to give the following particulars of him.

He was the son of Herstan, and nephew of Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, and was born at Glastonbury in 925. He spent his youth with his uncle, the archbishop, who took care to have him instructed in all the sciences, as far as that age of ignorance would permit. He is said to have excelled particularly in music and painting, in which he took great delight all his life. By painting, we must understand that kind which was used in illuminating missals. As soon as he had finished his studies, the archbishop recommended him to King Athelstan, who sent for him to court, but, however, gave him no preferment. The author of his life pretends, the courtiers envying his virtue and learning, maliciously represented him to the king as a dissolute and scandalous liver: which the king believing, forbade him the court, without examining the truth. Some time after, the archbishop finding means to undeceive the king, Dunstan was restored to favour, and presented with some lands near Glastonbury; where he spent several years in retirement with certain devout men, whom he had drawn together, living with them a sort of monastic life. Glaston, or Glassenbury, was anciently a small church, founded, according to the vulgar opinion, by Joseph of Arimathea. This church having been destroyed, Devy, bishop of St. David's, built another in the same place; which being also gone to ruin, was repaired by twelve devout persons, who coming from Armorica, settled in this place. Ina, king of Wessex, having pulled it down to the ground, raised a stately church, and dedicated it to Christ, St. Peter, and St. Paul; and several persons famous for their piety, most of them Irish, retired thither, where they were maintained by Edgar's bounty. From that time there were always devout persons, who made choice of this place for their retreat.

After Dunstan had been some time at Glastonbury, Edmund, successor of Athelstan, having conceived an esteem for him, built there a monastery, and made him abbot; and as Dunstan was a person of great address and ability, he maintained a great authority over this prince, and was very much in favour all his reign; and his interest at court even increased under Edred, to whom he was prime-minister and confessor. Dunstan's extreme fondness for a monastic life made him use, without any caution, all his interest to restore the monks to the benefices, and eject the secular priests, whom he both despised and hated. This attachment to that class, added to his arrogance, procured him abundance of enemies, and drew upon him the displeasure of Edwy, successor of Edmund, as we have already seen. But the haste Edgar displayed to recall him from Flanders, is a clear evidence he was indebted to him for the crown of Mercia. Upon his return to England, Edgar promoted him, as already stated, to the see of Worcester; and some time after, the bishopric of London being vacant, he was entrusted with the management of it; which has led some writers into the mistake of imagining he was bishop of Worcester and London at the same time.

Edgar never ceased to give him fresh marks of his esteem, and his regard for him was strengthened by the miracles attributed to him. After the death of Athelm, who held the see of Canterbury, Odo, by birth a Dane, was made archbishop, but did not long survive his installation; and to him succeeded Elfin, who died, as he was going to Rome for his pall, in the beginning of Edgar's reign. Brithelm, bishop of Bath, was elected to the vacant see; but Edgar being desirous of making Dunstan archbishop, called a general council, where he represented Brithelm as unqualified for so great a station; whereupon he was ordered to return to his old diocese, and Dunstan was chosen in his room. This election not being perfectly canonical, it was deemed necessary Dunstan should go to Rome, on pretence of receiving his pall, where he might at the same time justify these proceedings. The pope, who was perfectly aware how extensive the influence of Dunstan was at the court of England, and who was gratified by the zeal with which he had espoused the interest of the church of Rome and of the monks, readily confirmed his election, constituting him in addition his legate for England, with a very extensive authority. At his return, Oswald, his relation, was through his means made bishop of Worcester, and Ethelwald, his intimate friend, bishop of Winchester; and these three prelates entirely governed the church during this reign, Edgar committing to them the management of all ecclesiastical affairs.

As soon as Dunstan found his credit firmly established, he returned to his grand project in favour of the monks, which he had been compelled to lay aside during the reign of Edwy. This affair was not without its difficulties, as the great men of the nation considered it as a wrong to them, that the guidance of the churches should be wrested out of the hands of the ancient and lawful governors. They were still less pleased with its being committed to the monks, who by the rules of their order, and according to the custom hitherto observed, were excluded from the pastoral functions, in order to employ themselves wholly in prayer within the walls of their monasteries. They were also of opinion, that instead of encouraging and enriching the monks, it would be much more politic to restrain the people's zeal, who were perpetually bequeathing to them considerable estates, which were passed away in mortmain, to the great prejudice of the nation. It was easy therefore to foresee that this project would meet with great opposition from the nobles. But on the other hand, the people, who did not reflect so deeply as to consequences, were entirely in the interest of the monks, and extremely offended at the scandalous lives of the secular clergy, who applied the revenues of the church to uses directly contrary to the intent of the donors. It must be confessed, the secular clergy at that time were very depraved in their morals, and that pride, avarice, gluttony, drunkenness, and luxury, reigned openly among them. Dunstan and his party of course exaggerated these irregularities, in order to irritate the people against their pastors; and succeeded so well in their design, that multitudes espoused the cause of the monks, merely from detestation of the vices of the opposite party. But the great support of the monks, was the king's power, and his inclination towards them; and his good opinion of them was always increased on comparing them with the seculars, who indeed observed no measures in their excesses; he therefore thought he was sincerely benefitting the church by putting it under the government of the monks, whom he considered as a body of saints; and being thus inclined, Dunstan found no difficulty to persuade him to countenance a reformation he represented as advantageous to the church.

Dunstan caused a council to be assembled, in which Edgar assisted in person, and made a speech, which plainly showed how greatly he was prejudiced in their favour. As this harangue gives a lively picture of the vices and corruption of the monks, and consequently, some slight glimpse of the manners of the time, it is inserted; although the translation gives too modern a tone to it, and subsequent historians have no doubt added to and altered it; but it is sufficiently true in its main details to be interesting.

"Almighty God having vouchsafed of his infinite mercy to show his goodness to us in a remarkable manner, it is most reasonable, reverend fathers, we should exert our endeavours to make a suitable return. That we are in possession of this plentiful country is not owing to any strength of our own but to the help of his all-powerful arm, who has been pleased to manifest his loving-kindness to wards us. It is but just, therefore, we should bring ourselves, our souls, and bodies, in subjection to him who has subdued all things for us, and should take care that all that are under us should be obedient to his laws. It is my office, reverend fathers, to administer justice without respect of persons; to suppress the rebellious; to punish the sacrilegious; to protect the poor and weak from the hand of the oppressor. It is my business also to take care that the church and her ministers, the holy fraternities of the religious, have all things necessary to their subsistence and well-being. But it is your duty to examine into the life and conversation of the clergy. To you it belongs to see that they live agreeably to their profession: that they are sober, temperate, chaste, hospitable to the poor and the stranger: that they are careful in the administration of their office, constant in their instructions to the people. In a word, that they are worthy of the glorious character of the ministers of Jesus Christ. With submission be it spoken, reverend fathers, had you taken due care of these things, I should not have had the dissatisfaction of hearing from all hands the enormous crimes daily committed by the clergy of this land. I insist not on the smallness of their tonsure, contrary to the canons of the church, nor their effeminacy in their habits, nor the arrogance in their gestures, nor on their immodest discourses, which plainly show all is not right within. I omit their negligence with regard to divine service: hardly will they vouchsafe their company at the public prayers, and when they come to church to celebrate the holy mysteries, one would think it was a mockery. But the chief subject of my complaint, I speak it with extreme regret, is what ministers occasion of grief to the good, and of joy to the profane, I mean the lewd and scandalous lives of the clergy. They spend their days in diversions, entertainments, drunkenness, and debauchery. Their houses may be said to be so many sinks of lewdness, public stages, and receptacles of libertines. There they have gaming, dancing, and obscene singing. There they pass the night in rioting and drunkenness. It is thus, reverend fathers, it is thus the bounty of my predecessors to the church, and their charities for the maintenance of the poor, and what is more, the adorable blood of our Saviour, are consumed. Was it for this that our ancestors exhausted their treasures? Was it for this they were so liberal of their estates? Was it to deck the concubines of their priests, to provide for them splendid entertainments, to furnish them with dogs and hawks, that our forefathers displayed their munificence to the church? these are the crimes which the people complain of in private, and the soldiers in public; which are sung in the streets, and acted undisguisedly; and yet they are forgiven, they are overlooked, they are connived at by you! Where is now the sword of Levi, and the zeal of Simeon? Where is the wrath of Moses against the worshippers of the golden calf? Where is the indignation of St. Peter against Simon the magician? Imitate, reverend fathers, imitate the zeal of these holy persons, and follow the way of righteousness, shown you by the Lord. It is high time for you to draw the sword of St. Peter, whilst I make use of the great Constantine's. Let us join our forces to expel the lepers out of the temple, to cleanse the sanctuary, and to cause the Lord to be served by the true sons of Levi, 'who said to his father, and to his mother, I know you not; and to his brethren, I know not who you are?' Let the disrespect to the relics of the saints, and the daily profaning of the holy altars, rouse you up. Be moved at the great abuse of the piety of our forefathers. One of my ancestors, you all know, dedicated to the church the tithes of the kingdom: the glorious Alfred, my great-grandfather, laid out his revenues in religious uses. You are not ignorant of the great benefactions of my father and uncle, which it would be highly dishonourable so soon to forget, seeing the altars are still adorned with them. You, O Dunstan, father of fathers, raise your imagination a little I pray you, and fancy you behold my father looking down from heaven, and expostulating with you in this manner: 'It was you that advised me to the building of so many churches and monasteries, it was you I made choice of for my spiritual guide, and the inspector of my behaviour. Did not I always obey your voice? Did I not always prefer your advice before wealth? How frankly did I lay out my treasures, when you commanded? My charities were always ready when you called for them. Whatever was desired for the churches was immediately granted. If you complained that the monks were straitened in their circumstances, their wants were forthwith supplied. You used to tell me, such liberalities brought forth immortal fruit, and were highly meritorious, since they were expended in supporting the servants of God, and maintaining the poor. And is it not an intolerable shame they should be laid out in adorning and decking a pack of prostitutes? Are these the fruits of my benefactions? Are these the effects of your glorious promises?' These, O Dunstan, are the complaints of the king my father. What can you answer to this charge? I am convinced that you have hitherto been unblameable, when 'you saw a thief you consented not to him, neither have you been partaker with the adulterer.' No, you have endeavoured to correct these abuses. You have argued, exhorted, threatened. But since these means have proved in vain, it is time to apply more effectual remedies. You have here ready to assist you the reverend father Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, and the venerable Oswald, bishop of Worcester. To you three I refer the management of this important affair. Exert the episcopal in conjunction with the regal authority, to expel from the church of God the disorderly clergy, and put in such as live regularly in their stead."

Shortly after, the secular priests were expelled from the monasteries, and the regulars put in their places. Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, leading the way in this extensive reform, was quickly followed by Dunstan and Oswald, and all the other bishops, who being monks, without much solicitation, imitated these three prelates. The monkish historians represent those days as the golden age of the church, and as the happiest England ever knew.

Perhaps it will seem strange that the secular clergy should at this time be more bitterly inveighed against than in the following centuries, when the lives of the priests were no less scandalous; but to account for this, it must be remembered, the popes had for some time prohibited the clergy from marrying, and were very severe to all who refused to comply with their decrees. This prohibition, which at present is a fundamental article in the church of Rome, met at first with great opposition, especially in England, which compelled the popes to exert every effort to bring the English priests to a compliance; in which Dunstan's interest, and his address in engaging Edgar in the project, were an extraordinary assistance. We must therefore retain in our minds this prohibition of the marriage of the clergy, in order to fully comprehend the occasion of the complaints of the monks and their favourers against the seculars, and to judge how far they are to be credited. Though it is but too true the priests at that time led very disorderly lives, yet that was not the thing that drew this storm upon them; their marriage was the great cause of offence, and was that which their enemies were desirous should be thought a more heinous crime than fornication, or any other actual sin which they could lay to their charge. Their wives were always called concubines, or by a more opprobrious name; and notwithstanding all the endeavours of the court of Rome, this pretended abuse could not be reformed till the end of the twelfth century, when the celibacy of the clergy was established after a struggle of three hundred years.

The monks were bound in gratitude to make a suitable return for the service Edgar had done them; and accordingly, their historians have endeavoured by their excessive commendations to make him pass for a real saint. But whether for want of attention, or some other reason, they have related some particulars of his life, which certainly do not tend to sustain that idea of him. If, indeed, his political actions are only considered, it must be confessed he was a great prince; but a great king and a great saint are two very different characters. For instance, it would be very difficult to justify, by the Gospel, a massacre perpetrated by his order in the Isle of Thanet, upon a very slight occasion, as historians allow; and what might not these said historians have said of his vicious inclination to women, who published to the world that the soul of his brother Edwy was about to be dragged into hell for having had a single mistress.

It is in fact very palpable that if Edgar had not purchased the good opinion of the monks by his excessive complaisance, they would have given him no better a character than his predecessor, who was much less faulty in his morals. To conclude the reign of Edgar, which was disturbed neither by foreign nor domestic wars, it remains only to give an account of his amours, which will prove that his good qualities were not without a great mixture of failings.

His first mistress was a nun, whom he took by force out of a convent, and could not be prevailed on to send back, even by the solicitations of Dunstan. He had a daughter by her named Editha, who was greatly celebrated for her sanctity. It is true, he atoned for his crime by not wearing his crown during the space of seven years. A severe penance indeed for a fault his confessor under other circumstances would have denounced as a sacrilege! By his second mistress, whom some however call his lawful wife, was Elfeda, surnamed the Fair, from her complexion; he had a son called Edward, who succeeded him. An extraordinary adventure is said to have gained him a third mistress. Travelling by Andover, he stopped at a chief's house, who had a very beautiful daughter; whom he commanded to be brought to his bed, without even asking her consent. The mother of the young lady, dreading by her denial to draw down his displeasure upon herself and family, prevailed upon one of her waiting-women to substitute herself, which she did; and although the king subsequently discovered the imposition, he took the waiting-woman as his mistress. The coolness with which these atrocious exercises of a vicious and despotic power are narrated by contemporary chroniclers, is as great a proof of the brutality of the period as the crimes themselves.

Edgar's marriage was attended with some peculiar circumstances. Being informed that Olgar, earl of Devonshire, had a daughter of great beauty, he resolved to marry her, if she answered the description report gave of her. He communicated his design to Earl Ethelwold, a peculiar favourite, and ordered him to ascertain whether the lady's beauty was really as great as it was said to be. Ethelwold no sooner saw Elfrida, the earl of Devonshire's daughter, than he fell desperately in love with her, and demanded her for himself; and his request being complied with, he was married as privately as possible, informing his father-in-law that he had important reasons for not divulging his marriage. Returning to court, he informed the king there was nothing extraordinary in Elfrida; and suggested, that probably the fame of her beauty was owing more to her father's riches than anything else. This report had the effect Ethelwold expected; and perceiving the king was grown perfectly cool upon the matter, he represented to him, that though the fortune of the earl of Devonshire's daughter was nothing to a king, yet it would be the making of a subject; and therefore humbly desired his leave to make his addresses to her, as being the greatest heiress in the kingdom. Edgar granted his favourite's request, and Ethelwold returned to his wife, and publicly solemnized his wedding; but still fearing she should appear too beautiful in the king's eyes, he did not suffer her to approach the court.

Notwithstanding Ethelwold's caution, Edgar was at length informed of the truth; and suddenly told Ethelwold he wished to visit his lady, of whom he had formerly heard so much. The latter did all he could to divert the king from his purpose; but his artifices were in vain, and served only to confirm the king in his resolution; and the utmost favour he could obtain, was leave to go before, on pretence of preparing for the king's reception. When he arrived at home, he threw himself at his lady's feet, and confessing what he had done for the sake of possessing her, conjured her to use all her endeavours to conceal her charms from the amorous king. Elfrida promised him whatever he desired, but she was determined to break her word; and no sooner was he gone to meet the king, than she set off her natural beauty with all the art she was mistress of. The event answered her expectation; the moment Edgar cast his eyes on her, he fell desperately in love with her, and from that instant was resolved to possess her. He pretended to see nothing extraordinary in Elfrida's beauty; at which the husband was overjoyed; but he shortly after commanded Ethelwold to go into Northumbria, on pretence of some urgent affairs. The unfortunate earl was found dead in a wood, where it was pretended he had been murdered by robbers; but on the king's immediately marrying the widow, other conjectures were formed, which were fully warranted by Edgar's character, and the ferocious conduct of the age. The king, instead of making inquiry after the murderers, indulged his lust. Some historians say, that Edgar slew Ethelwold with his own hand at a hunting match.

There was a great mixture of good and bad qualities in this prince; and the commendations given him are in many respects so grossly exaggerated, by the partiality of the monks, that it is extremely difficult to form a proper judgment of him. Judicious historians have taken him from among the saints, where his flatterers placed him, and have not scrupled to rank him in the number of the vilest princes; a notion of him which may be grounded on what is related of Canute the Great, who upon mention of the sanctity of Editha, Edgar's daughter, is reported to have said, "He could never believe it possible for the daughter of so wicked a father to be a saint;"—a speech which leaves great reason to suspect that the monkish historians have suppressed several of Edgar's worst actions.

Edgar died in 975, in the thirty-second year of his age, leaving two sons and a daughter, having reigned sixteen years from the death of his brother Edwy. Edward, his eldest son, was born of a mistress, or at least of a very doubtful marriage. Ethelred, his youngest, was the son of the beautiful Elfrida. Editha, his daughter by his first mistress, passed her days in a nunnery, and after her death was honoured with the title of saint.

Edgar had too well deserved of those who looked upon themselves as authorized to reward their votaries with a saintship, not to have a place in the calendar: but as there are no other proofs of his sanctity during his life but his affection to the monks, and his founding monasteries,* it is pretended, he gave more substantial ones after his death; and it is pretended, that when his body was taken out of the coffin to be put into a stately shrine, it was as fresh as when he resigned his last breath. It was further affirmed, that the shrine being made too short, though he was of very small stature,† and somebody daring to sever his head from his body, the blood gushed out in great abundance. After such convincing proofs as these of the sanctity of this prince, his body was placed near the high altar of Glastonbury church, where it was afterwards said to work several miracles.

EDWARD II. THE MARTYR.

Upon Edgar's decease, those who had with impatience borne the great power of the monks, thought it a fair opportunity to reduce them to their primitive state; and Elfer, duke of Mercia, their sworn enemy, turned them out of all the benefices they possessed in that province, and replaced the seculars in their room. But the duke of East-Anglia, and several other great men, firmly adhered to Dunstan and his party; and this diversity of opinion, on account of the monks, caused a considerable dissension among the nobles, when they came to choose a successor to the deceased king. Edgar had left two sons, who had both their adherents, though their age would not permit either

* It has been observed that his building so many monasteries (forty-eight, says Ingulphus) proved one great occasion of the Danes conquering England; for by so doing he exhausted the treasury, and gave great portions of lands for the maintenance of the monks, who refused his son Ethelred assistance in his necessity.

† Though Edgar as to his person was both low and slender, yet was he so well proportioned, that he is said to have contended often with such as were thought strongest in his court; and disliked nothing more than that they should spare him out of respect, or fear of hurting him.

of them to prosecute their respective titles to the crown. Many believed it had devolved to Ethelred, pretending there was a legal obstacle in Edward's birth, and that his mother was never lawfully married to Edgar. But Dunstan and all the bishops who were for Edward, pleaded his being named successor by Edgar in his last will and testament; to sustain which, they were incited by the powerful motive of governing the kingdom under this young prince, which they could not hope for if they placed his brother on the throne, because his mother Elfrida was not inclined to be guided by their counsels.

In the mean time, Ethelred's party being most numerous, Edward was in danger of being excluded if Dunstan, his supporter, had not hit upon the following daring resolution to support him. As he knew himself to have great influence with the people from their high idea of his sanctity, he, in the midst of the public debates as to which of the princes should succeed, suddenly rose up, and taking Prince Edward by the hand, led him towards the church, attended by the other bishops and a great crowd of people, and anointed the young prince king, without regarding the opposition of the contrary party. The nobles deplored their falling once more under the government of that imperious prelate; but as they saw the people ready to support him, they were compelled to submit.

Edward was but fourteen years old when he began to reign under the guardianship of Dunstan, who immediately took all the power into his hands; and as soon as he was fixed in the regency, exerted every possible means to maintain the monks in possession of the benefices they had acquired in the last reign, and made use of the king's authority to that end. But he met with greater opposition than he contemplated, for as the king was but a minor, the orders given in his name were not so readily complied with. Dunstan assembled several councils about this affair; but most probably all his endeavours would have proved ineffectual, if by means of several miracles, which were never wanting when requisite, he had not brought the people to believe that Heaven interposed in the affair.

In one of these councils held at Winchester, the majority being against the monks, they would have infallibly lost their cause, if, on a sudden, a crucifix that hung aloft in the room had not pronounced these words with an audible voice: "It shall not be done, it shall not be done: You have decided the matter well hitherto, and would be to blame to change." Astonished at this oracle, the most obstinate immediately voted for the monks.

At another assembly in the same place, Dunstan had used all his endeavours to have one Elphegus, a monk, chosen dean of that church; but the people were desirous that the dignity should be conferred on a secular priest; and the contest ran so high, that there was likely to have been a struggle, which might have been of dangerous consequence. But St. Andrew, the apostle, on a sudden revealing to St. Dunstan in the audience of all the people, that the monk ought to be elected, he was immediately installed. These and several other miracles, too many to be inserted, were not, however, sufficient to unite all men in favour of the monks; but one at last occurred that converted their most strenuous opponents.

Dunstan had called a council at Calne, in Wiltshire, to decree that the monks should keep possession of their benefices. It was one of those mixed councils, where the king and all the nobility were to be present, as well as the bishops and abbots; and probably the affair would have been decided against the monks, considering the great number of their opponents in the assembly; but whilst they were warmly disputing on both sides, the floor of the room happened to break under the company, and crashed several to death. The beam on which Dunstan's chair was placed, was the only one that did not give way, so that he remained unhurt, whilst scarce a man besides himself in this numerous assembly escaped being either killed or bruised. This was sufficient to convince the people the monks were the favourites of Heaven, since their head and protector was so wonderfully preserved; but there were some malicious people, however, who insinuated that Dunstan prevented the king, contrary to custom, from being in the council that day. After this seasonable accident the monks were left unmolested; either the miraculous preservation of Dunstan had made an impression upon the minds of his enemies, or their most potent opposers perished in their fall.

Besides these ecclesiastical matters, we find nothing remarkable in the reign of Edward but his death in 979, four years after he ascended the throne. The story is thus related by the greatest part of historians. Edward, passing one day, as he was returning from hunting, near Corfe-castle, where his mother-in-law Elfrida resided with her son Ethelred, separated from his company in order to pay her a visit. Elfrida being told the king was at the gate, ran to receive him, and urged him very earnestly to alight, and come in to refresh himself; but as the king's design was only to pay his respects to his mother-in-law as he passed her castle, he only desired a cup of wine to drink her health. Whether Elfrida had already formed a design of destroying the king to make way for her son to the crown, or that favourable opportunity suggested the thought to her, the young king had no sooner lifted the cup to his mouth, but a ruffian stabbed him in the back with a dagger.* Perceiving himself wounded, he set spurs to his horse, which soon carried him out of sight; but not being able to keep his saddle from the loss of blood, he fell off his horse, and his foot hanging in the stirrup, he was dragged some distance before his horse stopped, just by a poor blind woman's house that stood in the road; where the people sent after him by Elfrida, tracing him by his blood, found him dead, and his body miserably mangled. Elfrida imagining she could conceal this horrid deed, known only to her domestics, ordered the corpse to be thrown into a well; but it was found there a few days after, and carried to Warham,† whence it was removed to Shaftesbury, and laid in a monastery founded by King Alfred. It is pretended to have worked many miracles there; and that a blind man was restored to his sight, and a cripple to his limbs, by only touching the body. The poor woman also, in whose house his body lay one night, was said to be cured by his intercession; and the well into which he was thrown, endued with the virtue of healing several sorts of distempers. In fine, it is reported that Elfrida, curious to know herself the truth of these miracles, resolved to go to the place, but her horse, in spite of all her endeavours, would not stir one step forward. Elfrida, anxious to atone for her crime, founded two nunneries, one at Ambresbury,* and another at Whorwell, near Andover; in the last of which she secluded herself, in order to do penance the residue of her days. She is said to have frequently covered her body all over with little crosses to keep off the devil.

It does not appear upon what foundation Edward was canonized both as a saint and a martyr, unless it was pretended he was murdered out of revenge for his great affection to Dunstan and the monks; which would have been sufficient then to procure him these titles. We have certainly sufficient evidence that in those days all the favourers of the monks passed for so many saints, and their enemies for the objects of God's wrath. But however that may be, this young monarch is generally known by the name of Edward the Martyr.

The State of the Church from Egbert to Edward the Martyr.

The continual wars were no less fatal to the church than the state. They produced an extreme corruption of manners, and a profound ignorance all over the kingdom. The destruction of the churches and monasteries, the plundering what was designed for their subsistence, and the necessity of defending themselves against the Danes, and being wholly employed in the exercise of arms, turned multitudes from the study of religion.

Ethelwulph's reign is rendered important by the grant of the tithes. The charter runs thus:—

"I, Ethelwulph, by the grace of God, king of the West-Saxons, &c. with the advice of the bishops, earls, and all other persons of distinction in my dominions, have, for the health of my soul, the good of my people, and the prosperity of my kingdom, taken the prudent and serviceable resolution of granting the tenth part of the lands throughout my whole kingdom, to the church and ministers of religion, to be enjoyed by them, with all the privileges of a free tenure, and discharged from all services due to the crown, and all other incumbrances incident to lay-fees. The grant has been made by us to the church, in honour of Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and All Saints, and out of regard to the Paschal Solemnity, and that Almighty God might vouchsafe his blessing to us and our posterity."

Dated at the palace of Wilton, in the year 854, indiction the second, at the feast of Easter.

The terms, date, and subscriptions, of this charter, have induced several learned men to believe it spurious. Long before this charter, the clergy of England claimed a right to the tithes, if they were not already in actual possession of them; which is evident from the seventeenth canon of the council of Calcuith, held in 785, where we find they urged the payment of tithes from the law of Moses. It is true, King Ethelwulph might confirm the rights of the clergy, by granting them a charter for the same; but in that case, it is something strange he should pass over in silence the divine right of tithes, on which the clergy chiefly insisted; and if this charter, therefore, is not to be considered as a forgery, it seems at least to be of very doubtful authority. Add to this, that by the tenth part of the lands must necessarily be meant the tenth part of the profits; which must be owned to be a very forced interpretation, especially in a primordial act, such as this.

* In Wiltshire, so called from Ambrosius, who built here a monastery for three hundred monks, to pray for the souls of the British noblemen slain by Hengist. The tomb of Quinever, Arthur's wife, was found here with this inscription on the wall in massy gold letters. R. G. A. C. 600; the antiquity of which is very suspicious, since she must have outlived Arthur fifty years; and besides, she is said by historians of credit to have been buried at Glastonbury. Queen Elfrida's nunnery is famous for Queen Eleanor's being a nun there; and Mary, daughter to Edward I. and thirteen noble-men's daughters were veiled here on Assumption Day.

The monkish writers furnish us with no particulars relating to ecclesiastical affairs during the reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert, and Ethelred I.; excepting an account of the destruction of the monasteries by the Danes; on which subject they are naturally very pathetic, and describe with great lamentations the ruin of the three celebrated monasteries of Croyland, Ely, and Medeshamsted; whose monks were massacred; and the libraries of which were burnt.

From the conversion of the English to Dunstan's time, the clergy of England were not obliged to celibacy, and Dunstan undertook an unprecedented thing when he attempted to bind them to it, in pursuance of the papal decrees. It has been observed in the reign of Edgar, how Dunstan, countenanced by that prince, gained his point so far, as, not indeed to oblige them to put away their wives, but to expel them their benefices for keeping them. But notwithstanding his great interest and affection to the monks, he could never reinstate them in the northern monasteries; and for above two hundred years the abbeys in those parts were uninhabited, and the very name of a monk was scarce heard of.

The councils of these ages were properly mixed assemblies, consisting of the clergy and nobility, and termed in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, that is, an assembly of wise men, or rather Micel-Synod, which signifies in the same language, the great, or general assembly. Both which names were rendered in Latin by the word Concilium; but because in these assemblies laws and ordinances relating to the church, as well as the state, were enacted, several of them are reckoned among the councils or synods. As for councils purely ecclesiastical, it does not appear there were any, from Egbert to Edward the Martyr.

Next to the assembly at Winchester, where Ethelwulph is said to have given a grant of the tithes, the most considerable with regard to religious affairs was the synod of Greatly, in the reign of Athelstan; the nine canons or laws of which were to the following purport.

The 1st enjoins the payment of tithes.

The 2nd commands the magistrates to put the laws in execution against those that were convicted by all the circumstances of an ordeal trial.

The 3rd is against witchcraft and highwaymen.

The 4th relates to the towns where the money was to be coined. At Canterbury there were to be seven mints, four for the king, two for the archbishop, and one for the abbot of St. Augustine's. Rochester was to have three, two for the king, and one for the bishop.*

* London was to have eight. Winchester six, Lewis, Southampton, Exeter, Shaftesbury, Wareham, two each, and every other great town was to have one. If any person belonging to these mints was found guilty of debasing the coin (which was to be all of one sort), his right hand was to be cut off,

The 5th regulates the circumstances and formalities of the ordeal trial, to know whether the person accused were guilty or not. And here we have two things worth remarking. The first is, that the priests are spoken of as fixed or settled in certain places; whence it is plain, that in those days they did not live together in common; but each had his particular church. The second is, that the accused person was to receive the consecrated bread; whence it may be inferred, that since the eucharist was called bread after the consecration, the church of England was far from believing transubstantiation.

The 6th forbids buying and selling on Sunday.

The 7th is against perjuries and false witnesses.*

The 8th orders the bishops to assist the judges in the execution of the laws, and to sit upon the bench with them.†

The 9th lays a fine upon remiss and negligent magistrates, which was to be paid to the bishop.‡

We find another synod, or mixed assembly, in the reign of Edmund, wherein the ceremonies of marriage, and preliminary securities the parties were to give one another, are settled.

To the ecclesiastical laws passed at these general assemblies or councils, may be aptly subjoined certain constitutions made in those days. The ten following are Odo's, archbishop of Canterbury.

The 1st threatens all those who injure the church in her property with excommunication.

The 2nd exhorts princes (and other great men) to be governed by the directions of the bishops, because God has entrusted them with the keys of the kingdom of heaven.

The 3rd admonishes bishops to discharge their duty,§ without any mercenary views, or respect of persons.

The 4th and 5th give good advice to the clergy.

The 6th does the same with regard to the monks.

The 7th prohibits unlawful marriages upon the score of nearness of relation: but the degrees of consanguinity and affinity are not recited.

The 8th recommends unity and charity among Christians.

The 9th urges fasting on Wednesdays, Fridays, and the four ember weeks.

The 10th enjoins the punctual payment of tithes, from reasons taken out of the Old Testament, without any mention of Ethelwulph's charter.

There are other constitutions, published under and nailed upon the outside of the mint. The same appointment was made by Athelstan, only he ordered that (besides the places here mentioned) Canterbury should have seven, Rochester three, and Hastings and Chichester one each.

* The penalty is, not to be believed afterwards, and to be debarred of Christian burial.

† In this same council were some remarkable civil laws enacted, particularly one against thieves, requiring, that if a thief be taken in the fact no man shall spare him, if he be above twenty years old, and had stolen anything above the value of eight-pence. If any one do contrary thereto, he shall pay the value of the thief's head, and make amends for the fault, and yet the thief himself shall not be spared; who if he contumaciously make resistance, or fly for it, shall find no favour. A thief cast into prison shall there stay forty days, and then after the payment of one hundred and twenty shillings, be discharged; but his kindred must give security for his good behaviour; after which, if he steal again, they must either pay the value of his head, or bring him back to prison; and in case one resist, he shall pay to the king, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own head; and if any defend him, he shall pay to the king one hundred and twenty shillings.

‡ Namely, of the diocese where the magistrate lived.

§ That is, to go and preach about their diocess every year, &c.

King Edgar, but the author of them is unknown. The principal are,

The 1st, which confirms the civil privileges and immunities of the church, and orders the payment of tithes.*

And the 5th, by which the solemnity of Sunday is to begin at three o'clock on Saturday in the afternoon.†

In this reign were published a body of canons,‡ of which the following are particularly remarkable.

By the 5th, if a priest received any injury, the complaint was to be preferred to the synod, who were to treat the case as if the injury had actually been done to the whole body of the clergy, and take care that satisfaction be made at the discretion of the bishop of the diocese.

The 11th enjoins the priests to learn some employment, in order to get their livelihood in case of misfortune.

The 17th orders parents to teach their children, the Lord's-prayer, and the Apostle's-creed, without which they were neither to be admitted to the eucharist, nor buried in consecrated ground.

The 29th forbids the burying in churches all those that were not of known and approved probity.

The 32d prohibits the priests from officiating without the service-book before them, for fear the trusting to their memories might make them mistake.

By the 36th, no person was to eat or drink before the receiving the communion.

The 38th enjoins the priest to have the holy eucharist§ always ready by him: but in case it grew so stale that it could not be eaten without disgusting the palate, it was to be burnt in a clear fire, and the ashes laid under the altar. Hence it is easy to see what the church's opinion was then of the eucharist, since it was believed it could grow stale, and was to be burnt after it was spoiled.||

The 43rd forbids the eating of blood.¶

After these canons, there follows a very particular form of confession, with what penances the confessor is to enjoin. We find here that the penitent was ordered to say the Lord's-prayer threescore times a day, but not so much as one Ave Maria; a clear evidence, that the praying to the Virgin Mary was not yet introduced into the church.

Nothing more remains relating to the church of those days, but to give a brief account of the most noted persons for piety and learning.

The first saint is Swithin, or Swithun, who having been preceptor to King Ethelwulph, was promoted to the see of Winchester; and it is said, that it was by his advice that Ethelwulph granted the charter of the tithes to the church. This alone was suffi-

* The 3rd orders the payment of the tithe of cattle before Whitsuntide, of the fruits of the earth before the equinox, and of seeds at the feast of St. Martin.

† And to continue until break of day on Monday. Edgar made several other constitutions for the regulation of religious houses. In those in the book belonging to Winchester-cathedral, Edgar makes himself general of the monks, and queen of the nuns.

‡ These canons were translated by Sjr H. Spelman, from a Saxon manuscript in Bennet-college in Cambridge. It is not known where or by what authority they were drawn up.

§ That is, the consecrated bread. Had they thought them that our Saviour's flesh and bones, as the Trent catechism words it, had been present under the appearance of bread, they would never have burnt the eucharist in this manner.

|| The 52d orders priests to preach every Sunday.

¶ The 64th declares hunting and hawking are improper diversions for a priest, who is to make books his entertainment.

cient to gain him a saintship, though he had been distinguished upon no other account; but in addition to this, he is affirmed to have wrought abundance of miracles, with an account of which it is not necessary to burthen this history.

Alfred the Great, independently of his political superiority, was one of the most considerable men of his age, on account of his piety and learning.*

Johannes Scotus, surnamed Erigena, or Irishman (Ireland being then called Erin), also flourished at this time. He had acquired an extensive reputation in France, where Charles the Bald entertained him at his court, and used to converse with him with great familiarity, when Alfred invited him into England. He was at first the king's preceptor in languages and other sciences; but he afterwards taught at Oxford, whence, in all probability, he was removed to Malmsbury, since it was in this monastery he is said to have been stabbed to death by his scholars with penknives. Before he left France, he was engaged by the emperor's order in the dispute concerning the nature of the eucharist; and in his treatise upon this subject, he strongly argued against Pascasius's doctrine, who maintained the body of Christ in the eucharist to be the same that was born of the Blessed Virgin. It must therefore necessarily be, that the contrary opinion defended by Scotus was not looked upon then as heretical, since it prevented not Alfred from inviting him into England, from having a very great esteem for him, and entrusting him with the education of youth; and, indeed, it is certain he was honoured as a saint and a martyr after his death. Roger de Hoveden says, Scotus at first had an obscure burial; but afterwards a miraculous light shining over his grave for several nights together, the monks of St. Lawrence's removed his body into their church, and buried it close by the altar. His epitaph also, the antiquity of which, according to Malmsbury, appears from the structure and diction of the verses, indisputably says he was considered a saint when that was erected. All these circumstances raise at least a strong presumption that transubstantiation was not at that time the doctrine of the church of England. For had it been so, how was it possible the English should honour as a saint one that had so openly combated their opinions? And this inference has much perplexed the Roman Catholics. One of their historians does not scruple to own that the name of Scot is registered in the supplement of the Gallican Martyrology, and commemorated among the saints on the fourth of the Ides of November; and moreover adds, that his name had been inserted even in the Roman Martyrology, and remained there until expunged by Cardinal Baronius. This historian, indeed, pretends Scotus retracted his former errors:

* He was twelve years of age before he could read, which he first began to learn, as it is said, from the following occurrence. His mother seeing him one day exceedingly delighted with a little book, which was illuminated with gold and other colours, said, in his and his brother's hearing, she would give that book to him that should first get it by heart. Alfred, who did not then know even his letters, though twelve years old, applied himself so diligently, that he very soon could read and repeat the book to his mother; and from this time he had a great relish for books, and studied hard. Of his works relating to history, there are extant a paraphractical translation of Bede's Ecclesiastical History, and a short genealogy of the kings of the West-Saxons. Immediate posterity had so great a veneration for his memory, that he had the title of Saint even bestowed upon him, and his name stands in the calendar of the English martyrology, printed in 1608, and in two Saxon calendars cited by the annotator on the Saxon translation of the New Testament. The day of his death is registered on the 26th of October.

but gives us no authority for what he says; and only alleges, that without a recantation it is not probable that the church would have honoured his memory. But this is supposing that transubstantiation was the doctrine of the church at that time, which must first be proved, before this argument can be of any force.

Grimbald, who lived also in the same century, was very eminent for his learning, and had a great reputation. He was invited into England by Alfred the Great (who was acquainted with him at Rheims), and who preferred him to the government of the new abbey at Winchester.

Among the Englishmen, eminent for their learning, Asserius was one of the most considerable. He wrote the life of Alfred the Great in 893, and died bishop of St. David's, in Wales.* He must not be confounded with another of the same name, bishop of Sherbourne, who died in 883.

Werefrid, bishop of Worcester in Mercia, lived in the reign of King Buthred. When the Danes became masters of Mercia, he retired into France, from whence he was recalled by King Alfred. He translated the dialogues of Gregory the Great into Saxon; and having acquired a great reputation when living, he was registered as a saint after his death.

Plegmund, who was archbishop of Canterbury, was considered a very learned prelate, and was particularly eminent for his skill in divinity.

Dunulf had been a herdsman; and is affirmed by some to be the same who sheltered Alfred whilst the Danes possessed the kingdom. However this may be, he had the good fortune to be known to this prince; who finding him a person of a genius superior to his birth and employment, had him instructed in learning, and used his advice in affairs of the greatest moment. He subsequently promoted him to the see of Winchester, which was then the metropolis of Wessex, and the place where Alfred usually resided.

Wulfig, bishop of London, had also a great share in Alfred's esteem, as appears by his letter to this prelate prefixed to his translation of Gregory's pastoral.

Neots was an abbot distinguished for his birth, learning, regularity, and zeal for promoting the interest of the true religion. Some say, he was nearly related to King Alfred, and others, that he was descended from the blood-royal of East-Anglia. He died in 890, in Cornwall, where he left his name to the town of Neotstow, or St. Neots.†

Odo, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of

* He was bred a monk of Menevia, or St David's, whom the king prevailed upon, with much difficulty, to come to court, on condition he should stay there six months, and at his abbey six months, by turns. He wrote the life of Alfred to the 45th year of his age; i.e. to the year 893, according to his computation. It was continued to Alfred's death by some later hand. He shows through the whole a great deal of modesty; and mentions nothing of the visionary dialogue betwixt Alfred and St. Cuthbert, which other historians largely insist on. He is copied by Florence of Worcester, and others. This treatise was first published by Archbishop Parker in the old Saxon character; and there is an edition by Mr. Wise, fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, with a vindication of the contested clause about the antiquity of Oxford. Leland calls it the chronicle of St. Neots, because he found it in that monastery.

† Where he was buried, and when Earl Elric's seat in Huntingdonshire was turned into a monastery upon his account, his body was removed thither, and the town before called Ainulphsbury, was from him named St. Neots. From whence his bones were a third time removed to Croyland minster in 1217.

an East-Anglian Dane. Though he was born of Pagan parents, he had the good fortune to know and profess the Christian religion, and for that reason was expelled his father's house. In this extremity, he put himself into the service of an English nobleman, who had him baptized, and sent him to school. When he became capable he entered into orders, in the reign of Edward the Elder. His zeal, virtue, and capacity, gained him so great a character, that Athelstan made him bishop of Sherbourne. Some ascribe to the efficacy of his prayers, the glorious victory obtained by that prince over the Danes at Brunanburgh. Odo had no less interest with King Edmund, who resolved to promote him to the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury: but Odo modestly excused himself, telling the king his abilities were too slender for so high a post. The king not admitting his excuse, he further alleged, that translations were not warrantable by the canons. This scruple being removed, by the examples of Justus and Mellitus, who were translated from Rochester and London to Canterbury, he started another objection, and alleged, that the archbishops from Augustin downwards having been all monks, he looked upon himself as unqualified for that station, since he had not been educated under any religious rule. This new difficulty was also got over by sending to the abbot of Fleury, in France, and entreating him to admit Odo into his society. Thus the prelate having nothing more to object, accepted at length, though with great reluctance, the see of Canterbury. As he became afterwards a vigorous champion for the monks, it may be presumed this was one of the chief reasons of placing him among the most illustrious ecclesiastics of his time. He is said also to have had the gift of miracles, which the favourers of the monks seldom failed to be honoured with.

Dunstan has been already sufficiently mentioned. There are modern historians, even among the Protestants themselves, who, carried away by the testimonies of the ancient writers, have given great commendations to this pretended saint, without considering upon what doubtful authorities they proceed. It is highly probable that Dunstan's firm adherence to the monks was the ground of those excessive praises bestowed on him, of which, perhaps, he would otherwise have been deemed unworthy.*

The same may be said of Ethelwald, bishop of Winchester, and Oswald, bishop of Worcester first, and afterwards archbishop of York. Their great zeal in the cause of the monks, is doubtless that which contributed most to their reputation. The monks, being almost the only historians in those days, have drawn the characters of persons according to their prejudices or interests.

Turketul, King Edmund's near relation and chancellor, became famous in this age, for preferring a cloister to a court, where he lived in great reputation. But what raised his merit most with the historians, was his rebuilding and restoring to its former splendour the abbey of Croyland,* demolished by the Danes.

CHAPTER V.

Containing the Reigns of the Kings of England, from Ethelred II. to the Norman Conquest, being the space of about eighty-eight years.

ETHELRED II.

AFTER the murder of Edward, there was no pretence to refuse the crown to his brother Ethelred, who was the only prince of the royal family, and too young to be accused of partaking in his mother's crime. Accordingly, Dunstan could not help crowning him, being then but twelve years of age, though he plainly foresaw it would prove fatal to his whole party. The people flattered themselves they were about to enjoy a state of tranquillity, under a prince who had already given an instance of his good nature, in bitterly lamenting the death of the king, his brother, though it procured him the crown. An old historian says, his tears appeared so unseasonable to his mother, that catching up a wax-taper in a passion, she beat him so unmercifully with it, that he could not endure the sight of a wax-light ever after.

The first thing Ethelred did after his coronation, was to remove the body of the late king to Shaftesbury church; and hardly had he performed this office, but he found himself attacked by the Danes, who suffered him to enjoy little repose during the residue of his life. If this prince had followed the steps of his predecessors, perhaps he would have caused the old invaders to lay aside all thoughts of any new attempts upon England. But his natural cowardice, joined to an extreme sluggishness, and insatiable avarice, and many other failings, soon enabled them to perceive he was not likely to prove a very formidable enemy. For sixty years past they seemed to have forgot England, and the English on their side, to have lost all remembrance of the calamities they had suffered from the hands of those terrible invaders. However, after so long an interval, during which the Danes settled in England seemed to have entertained the same affection for their second country as the natives themselves, the foreign Danes determined to renew their invasions; and they no sooner appeared, than the others, resuming their old inclinations, joined their countrymen, in order to free themselves from the dominion of the English.

These Danish invaders made their first attempt on Southampton, where they arrived with seven ships, and after plundering the town and the adjacent country, they carried the same devastations into Cornwall.

* The famous story of St. Dunstan and the devil is thus related by the monkish historians. As St. Dunstan was one day busied in his cell near Glastonbury, in making a gold cup of a curious workmanship, the devil appeared to him in a beautiful form, tempting him to sin. Dunstan perceiving in spirit who he was, took up a red-hot pair of tongs, and catching hold of the devil by the nose, made him howl in such a terrible manner, that he was heard all over the neighbourhood.

* Turketul left the monastery at his death in possession of many curious relics; among the rest, Ingulphus mentions the thumb of St. Bartholomew, the apostle, given him when chancellor, by the emperor; for which he had so great a veneration, that he always carried it about him, and when in any danger, crossed himself with it. The naming of bells, together with the benediction, as a defensive against thunder and lightning, being introduced in this age by Pope John XIV., Turketul cast a great bell, which he called Guthlat. His successor following his example, added some more to it, and thus formed the first tuneable ring of bells in England.

This year also another band landed at Portland, and after ravaging the country round about, proceeded elsewhere to increase their spoils.

These frequent descents were so much the more injurious to the English, as having so many coasts to guard, they knew not where to assemble and expect the enemy. If at any time they happened to have it in their power to give them battle, all the advantage they could gain, in case fortune favoured them, was to recover the plunder; but when they themselves were defeated, the country was sure to be exposed to all imaginable cruelties before another army could be drawn together. Very often, whilst the English troops were upon the march, to oppose one of these bands, they were compelled to change their route, and march where the danger seemed more pressing; and thus, whatever care might be taken, one part of the kingdom was always exposed, since there was no foreseeing where the marauders would land. There was but one way to remedy this inconvenience, which was to keep a fleet at sea strong enough to engage the Danes, before they disembarked their troops; but a time of minority was not likely to take such a precaution.

In this manner passed the first ten years of this reign; and it would be needless to describe at length the ravages committed by the Danes during that time. It is easy to imagine the whole kingdom as a scene of murders, conflagrations, plunderings, and other devastations, which, with some short intermissions, were continually proceeding.

During these miseries, Elfric, duke of Mercia, one of the best guardians of his country, died in 983; and to his opposition of the monks after Edgar's death, is most probably owing the report circulated among their votaries, that he was consumed with lice. Alfric his son succeeded him.

The next year, Ethelwold, bishop of Winchester, one of Dunstan's confidants, and a great friend of the monks, died; he is said to have founded a dozen monasteries; and if that be true, he was, no doubt, assisted by the liberality of the two former kings, with whom he was in great favour.

The credit of the monks declined very much in the reign of Ethelred, as much on account of the frequent invasions of the Danes, as because the people, full of their misfortunes, were regardless of everything else; and began to mistrust the sanctity of the monks, wondering that men who had obtained from heaven so many miracles on their own private account, could not by their merits and prayers secure the kingdom from the calamities it was incessantly exposed to. Ethelred, whose thoughts were not occupied by religion, placed the monks and other ecclesiastics upon a level with the rest of his subjects; and gave a convincing proof how little he regarded the clergy, in a difference between him and the bishop of Rochester. The bishop having haughtily refused to comply with some demand of the king's, he ordered the soldiers to lay waste the lands belonging to the cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew; and in vain did the bishop threaten him with vengeance from the apostle, and cause Archbishop Dunstan to interpose in his quarrel; Ethelred disregarded both, nor could he be appeased but by money. Dunstan, displeased to the highest degree at this behaviour, threatened the king and council with the judgments of God, as ready to fall on their heads, for presuming to lay sacrilegious hands on the church's property; but he was not attended to; and so low had his reputation sank, that he was hardly known to be alive, so successful were the new ministers in depressing him. He died shortly after, in the year 988; not so much of age, it is said, as of mortification at the neglect shown him.

Oswald, archbishop of York, who was his particular friend, and one of the three prelates that governed the church during the reign of Edgar, soon followed him to the grave. The death of these patrons of the monks, a contagious distemper which swept away multitudes, and above all, the continual invasions of the Danes, put an end to the quarrel between the secular and regular clergy, in such manner, that it was never after heard of.

After the Danes had pillaged the coasts of England ten years together, they relaxed their ravages for about two years; but in 991, Justin and Guthmund, two Danish captains, landed with a large body of troops at Ipswich; and whilst they were engaged in plundering, Brithnoth, duke of East-Anglia, advanced towards them, in expectation to surprise them; but finding them too well prepared, he was overcome, and his defeat exposed the adjacent country to greater devastations. The victorious Danes having nothing more to fear, penetrated still further into the country, where they committed terrible ravages; and Ethelred, being without an army, and unable to stop their progress, was persuaded by Syric, archbishop of Canterbury, to give them a large sum of money to depart.

Two years after, another of their fleets sailing up the Humber, the pirates landed on the north side, and ravaged in a merciless manner all that belonged to the English in those quarters. Ethelred sent an army against them, under the command of the three earls, Fræna, Frithegist, and Goodwin; but those generals, having led their forces in sight of the enemies, were the first to retreat, and by their shameful cowardice occasioned the loss of the army. These three chiefs, being of Danish extraction, were suspected of treachery.

Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaüs, king of Norway, allured by the great success of their subjects in England, fitted out a numerous fleet, and entering the Thames, landed their troops near London. They made several attempts to become masters of the city, but meeting with a braver resistance than they expected, retired. To make themselves amends for the time spent in vain before London, they successively plundered Kent, Hampshire, and Sussex, and threatened to lay waste the whole kingdom. Ethelred, who had no more conduct than courage, not knowing how to put a stop to these ravages, had recourse to the means usually resorted to in such circumstances; and bound himself by treaty to pay a sum of money within a certain time, on condition they left his subjects unmolested, and departed the kingdom. Upon which the two foreign kings caused all hostilities to cease, and retired to Southampton. Shortly after, the king of Norway paid a visit to Ethelred, who persuaded him to be baptized, and stood himself godfather; and at his departure, Olaüs obliged himself by oath never to infest England more, and kept his promise.

It would have been happy for the English, if Sweyn, who departed at the same time, would have followed his example. For they would have escaped all those calamities that monarch afterwards brought on the country. When he sailed for Denmark, he left a fleet at Southampton, to keep the English in awe, and oblige them to perform the articles of the treaty; and after his departure, his admiral very earnestly pressed the payment of the money. But as there was no haste made to comply with these demands, he took their delay for a refusal, and resolved to renew the war; and in order to elude the vigilance of the English, he set sail, as if proceeding to Denmark, but on a sudden, he unexpectedly entered the Severn, and after destroying the country of the Welsh with fire and sword, crossed the river and penetrated into Dorsetshire, where he committed the same ravages. All the forces that could be levied against the Danes were as soon defeated as levied. They sacked whole counties, it being impossible to oppose them; till at last, finding nothing more to plunder in that part, they put to sea again, and landed in Kent. The inhabitants, by endeavouring to make some resistance, only increased the fury of their enemies, who treated them with the utmost barbarity; and to complete their misfortunes, a fleet equipped by Ethelred to engage them at sea, was rendered useless by the dissensions and unskilfulness of the commanders. In this melancholy situation, England would have irretrievably perished, if the Danes by a lucky and unexpected accident had not been called to the assistance of Richard II., duke of Normandy, whom the king of France would have dispossessed of his dominions. Ethelred took this opportunity to go and ravage Cumberland, but for what reason is unknown. After that, he returned to London, where he kept his usual residence.

The quiet Ethelred enjoyed was not of long continuance; the Danes staying in Normandy no longer than was necessary to put the young duke out of danger, returned into England. Cornwall felt the first effects of their fury; and then entering Wessex, they became masters of Exeter. The consternation of the English was so great that they made but a faint resistance. Whether Ethelred was betrayed by his generals, or the long peace enjoyed by the English during the foregoing reigns had enervated their courage, they were constantly vanquished, and the king himself durst not venture to be present in the battles for fear of falling into the hands of the Danes. The Danes, ever victorious, got possession of the Isle of Wight, Hampshire, and Dorsetshire, where they had their magazines; and from hence they made continual incursions into the neighbouring counties, without any one daring to oppose them.

England was now in a deplorable condition. The southern counties were perpetually ravaged by the foreign Danes, and the northern people by the Danish settlers, whom the English could not but look upon as their enemies. In this extremity, Ethelred, who had no resolution, agreed at last to pay the Danes thirty thousand pounds; and this sum, which in those days was very considerable, was levied by a tax called Danegeld, that is, Danish money, or money for the Danes.* This was the

* For the payment of this money every hide of land was taxed yearly at twelve-pence. A hide of land is such a quantity of land as may be ploughed with one plough in a year. Bede reckons it as much as will maintain a family. Some say it was a hundred acres, others, that it contained no certain number of acres. The distribution of England by original of that notorious tax which afterwards became so extremely burdensome to the nation, even long after the Danes had quitted England. But the clergy and monks always found means to be exempted.

The Danes, satisfied with this agreement, ceased their ravages; and some returned to Denmark, but many remained, preferring the more genial climate and soil of England. Although they were much dispersed, the whole kingdom stood in such fear of them, that they had always the appellation of Lord-Danes. The word itself, as well as the meaning, was altered a little after; but at this day, in some parts of England, a rich idle man who is arrogant, is by way of derision called a Lurdane. But notwithstanding this alteration, the traces of its original signification are still visible in the word.

Elgiva, Ethelred's queen, dying, whilst the Danes were thus subduing England, the king married Emma, sister of Richard II., duke of Normandy, who was called, from her extraordinary beauty, the Pearl of Normandy. Ethelred, wearied with his unsuccessful contests with the Danes, had resort to the savage and useless expedient of attempting to massacre them. It is asserted by old historians, that on the 13th of November 1002, in one day all the Danes were slain with implacable fury and cruelty.† Sweyn's sister,‡ who was married to an English chief, having at first been spared, Ethelred was so barbarous as to cause her children to be murdered in her presence, and then had her beheaded. By all the Danes, most probably are meant those settled in England, and dispersed in Wessex and Mercia.

Sweyn received the news of this massacre by some Danes, who escaped by getting on board a vessel ready to sail for Denmark. Their relation of the cruelties of the English to those of his nation would have been sufficient to arouse him; but when informed of his sister's barbarous murder, he was seized with all the rage that might be supposed to excite a warlike savage. He solemnly swore he would never rest till he had revenged the atrocious outrage. It was not therefore with intent to plunder, that he made a second expedition into England, but to destroy the whole country with fire and sword. However, as he did not doubt but Ethelred would take precautions to oppose his entrance, he would not sail without securing a place where he might safely land his hides of land is very ancient, mention being made of it in the laws of Ina. Danegeld was the first land-tax in England. It was afterwards called Hidagium, which name remained afterwards upon all taxes and subsidies imposed on lands. The Normans called these, sometimes taxes, sometimes tallages, and auxilia and subsidia. The Saxon kings before this had their levies of money and personal services, towards the building and repairing cities, castles, bridges, military expeditions, &c., which from the word bote, that is, repair, were termed burghbote, brigbote, heregeld, &c. Danegeld was released by Edward the Confessor, but levied again by William I. and II. Then it was released again by Henry I., and finally, by King Stephen. This ancient tax probably might be a precedent for our land-tax for three or four shillings in the pound, when first granted.

† Among other cruelties, the Danish women were placed in holes in the earth, as deep as their waists, and then had their breasts torn off by mastiff dogs. M. West lays the odium of this whole scene of barbarity on Huna, general of the king's forces, one of his evil counsellors.

‡ Her name was Gunilda; she is said to have been married to a noble Dane of great power and wealth, who had been settled for some time in England; his name was Paleng. She was a Christian, and had been a great instrument in making peace between the English and Danes.

troops. Cornwall was then governed by Earl Hugh, a Norman, whom the queen had placed in that post as a man the king might perfectly confide in, and to him Sweyn dispatched a trusty messenger, to endeavour to gain him to his interest, by the offer of a great reward; and Hugh, yielding to the temptation, promised to admit the Danish fleet into his ports, and suffer the troops to land without molestation.

Upon this, Sweyn, having equipped a fleet of three hundred sail, landed in Cornwall with a numerous army, and meeting with no opposition, marched directly to Exeter; and as that city was in no apprehension of an attack, he easily became master of it, and putting the inhabitants to the sword, reduced it to ashes. This first exploit was followed by several others, no less fatal to England; for wherever Sweyn carried his arms, revenge and not conquest being his chief aim, he destroyed all with fire and sword. Towards the end of the summer, being informed that Alfric, duke of Mercia, was advancing with a powerful army to give him battle, he resolved to meet him. Ethelred acted very unadvisedly in giving the command of his army to one whom he had formerly banished the kingdom on mere suspicion, and whose son's eyes he had ordered to be put out. The remembrance of this injury being still fresh in the duke's mind, he was pleased with having so fair an opportunity to revenge it; and as soon as he was in sight of the enemy, he feigned himself suddenly sick, and pretending he was unable to fight in his present condition, ordered a retreat, which he took care to make with so much confusion, that the Danes very easily routed his army. After this easy success, Sweyn took several towns, with an immense booty; but as he had no design to retain, he set them on fire, and returned and passed the winter in Denmark.

In the following spring he landed in East-Anglia, and taking Norwich, burnt the whole town to the ground; and Ulfkettel, governor of East-Anglia, unable to resist him, gave him a great sum of money, to prevent his doing any further mischief. But upon receipt of the money, Sweyn, with the usual treachery, disregarded the treaty, and took Thetford by surprise, a town then of great note, and destroyed it. Incensed at this breach of faith, Ulfkettel levied some troops with great expedition, and posted himself between the Danish army and fleet; and Sweyn perceiving he intended to cut off his retreat to his ships, marched back to give him battle, before he should be reinforced with more troops. He found the English very advantageously encamped, expecting him with a resolution to maintain their ground; but the Danes obtained a signal victory, though not without great loss; and they even owned they were never in more danger of being defeated. Ulfkettel, though of Danish race, was the faithfullest as well as bravest of all Ethelred's subjects, and did him the most service; but the other chiefs were of a very different nature, and all the historians agree that Ethelred was betrayed by all who surrounded him. Sweyn had his spies, not only in his court, but in his very council; and the great chieftains, for the most part, were bribed, or at least there was scarce one that served the king faithfully. Whatever councils were held to consider of means to resist the Danes, the dissensions between the nobles prevented their coming to any resolution, or putting what was resolved in execution; and the avarice of the clergy, and particularly of the monks, very much helped to increase the disorder. Notwithstanding their great riches, they refused to contribute their portion in defence of the kingdom, pleading their privileges and immunities, as if they had no share at all in the danger. And when all these circumstances are considered, it no longer seems extraordinary that the Danes obtained so many victories. The famine that happened soon after, would have completed the misfortunes of the English, had it not accidentally proved the occasion of Sweyn's returning to Denmark for want of subsistence in England.

Upon the ceasing of the famine, another Danish fleet arrived at Sandwich, in Kent; and Ethelred immediately levied an army to give the new invaders battle; but after committing some ravages, they retired to the Isle of Thanet, where it was not possible to attack them. They knew the English army, consisting of volunteers who served at their own expense, would soon disband themselves, as it actually happened; for the winter coming on, the English returned to their homes, it not being in the power of the king to keep them any longer together. Then the Danes, issuing from their retreat, renewed their ravages in Kent and the neighbouring counties, well assured they should meet with no opposition; and Ethelred saw no other course to stop the progress of a mischief that threatened the whole kingdom, but to give them the sum of thirty-six thousand pounds.

The king, being for awhile freed from their attacks, celebrated the wedding of one of his daughters with Edric, surnamed Streon, a very powerful thane, whom he had just made duke of Mercia, a traitor leagued with the Danes, who never failed on all occasions to betray the king and kingdom.

Scarcely had a year passed since the last treaty with the Danes, when they demanded the same sum again, pretending it to be a yearly tribute due by contract from Ethelred; which demand was accompanied with threats of destroying the whole kingdom with fire and sword, if the money was not immediately paid. This new pretension of the Danes convincing the king and his council there was no possibility of ever contenting their insatiable avarice, it was judged the money would be better employed in equipping a fleet capable of defending the kingdom from their incursions. Necessity made them put this resolution so speedily in practice, that quickly after, the king had a fleet well manned and victualled, the command of which was given to Brithric, brother of Edric Streon, duke of Mercia. And these measures obliged the Danes to retire for fear of being forced to a sea engagement, which their ships were not so fit for as those of the English.

The first thing Brithric did after his being made admiral, was to use all his interest to ruin Ulnoth, a thane of distinguished quality, who was his enemy. He consequently accused him to the king of crimes, which Ulnoth did not think fit to disprove by a public trial, being sensible his condemnation was preconcerted; and he resolved, therefore, upon a voluntary exile, to screen himself from this persecution; and persuaded nine captains to follow him with their ships; and they subsequently infested the English coasts, and did as much mischief as the Danes. Brithric, enraged at his enemy's escape, and his daring to brave him thus, put to sea with eighty sail to give him chase, and endeavour to seize him; but he was caught in so violent a storm, that the greatest part of his ships were lost or fell into the hands of Ulnoth. Thus this great fleet, which had been fitted out with a great expense, was rendered unserviceable by Brithric's misconduct. The loss became still more irretrievable by the dissension among the sea officers; several of whom deserted and joined Ulnoth.

In the mean time, the Danes took advantage of these disorders; and the next spring two of their fleets arrived in England, one in East-Anglia, under Turkil, and another in the Isle of Thanet, under Heming and Anlaff. These leaders joining their forces in Kent, plundered the country, and then laid siege to Canterbury; which would have infallibly fallen into their hands, if the inhabitants had not purchased a peace with a large sum of money.

Whilst the Danes were pillaging Kent, Ethelred drew an army together to oppose their ravages; and as soon as he was ready, he posted himself between them and their ships to prevent their embarking and carrying off their booty. Probably, he would have executed his project, and perhaps gained some further considerable advantage, considering the superiority of his forces, if Edric had not found means to relieve the Danes. The traitor perceiving their danger, represented to the king, his father-in-law, that it would be more advantageous to let them retire than hazard a battle, which might prove fatal to him; and this pernicious advice made such impression on the king, that he suffered them to march by, with all their plunder, unmolested. But instead of sailing for Denmark, as it was expected, they threw themselves into the Isle of Thanet; from which, during the whole winter, they made incursions into the neighbouring counties; and even made several attempts upon London; in which, however, they were always repulsed. During this period, Ulfketel, duke of East-Anglia, willing once more to try the fortune of a battle in defence of his territory, had the misfortune to be overthrown.

Hitherto the Danes wanted cavalry, on account of the difficulty of transporting horses from Denmark; but as soon as they were in possession of East Anglia, a country abounding with horses, they mounted part of their troops, and by that means extended their conquests. Shortly after, they subdued Essex, Middlesex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire,* Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Hampshire, Wiltshire, and Devonshire, whilst Ethelred, who had scarce anything left, kept himself shut up in London, without daring to take the field and stop their progress. In all the above-named counties, London and Canterbury were the only places in the king's power. But at length they attacked the last so vigorously, that they took, plundered, and reduced it to ashes; and Elphegus, the archbishop, being taken prisoner, was afterwards murdered by these barbarians.† They proceeded with the same cruelty towards the monks of St.

England being reduced to this deplorable state, all the chief men of the kingdom assembled at London with the king, to consult upon a remedy for such violent evils; and the only expedient they could find, was, as usual, to bribe the Danes with money to leave the kingdom. The sum agreed upon amounted to 48,000*l.*, which the marauders having received, departed with their booty.†

But scarcely had they ratified this treaty, when Sweyn‡ entered the Humber with a powerful fleet, and threatened the whole kingdom with desolation and ruin. As this prince found the country unprovided with troops, and unable to defend itself, he quickly became master of Northumbria and East-Anglia, that is, of all the counties lying north of the Roman Watling-street. But these conquests not satisfying his ambition, he took hostages of all the principal towns; and leaving his son Canute to command the newly-conquered counties, he advanced southward, and on a sudden laid siege to London, where Ethelred was shut up. Though he was but ill provided with necessaries to besiege in form a place of such importance, he imagined the citizens would be terrified at his menaces; but finding they were not moved by them, he desisted from his enterprise, and passed on and ravaged the western parts of Wessex, where he found no opposition to his arms. However, as he could not be satisfied whilst London was out of his power, he resolved to besiege it once more; but whilst he was preparing for the siege with greater precaution than before, he had information of Ethelred's departure from thence. This unfortunate prince ever dreading to fall into the hands of an enemy he had so heinously injured, and perceiving himself unsafe in England, retired into Normandy with all his family; upon which, the Londoners resolved to submit to the king of Denmark, to whom all the rest of the kingdom was now subject; and shortly after this, Sweyn was proclaimed king of England without any opposition, no one in the kingdom daring to dispute his title.

SWEYN, KING OF DENMARK, AND FIRST OF THE DANISH KINGS IN ENGLAND.

The first act of sovereignty exercised by the new king, was the imposing an immense tax on the kingdom for payment of the Danish troops who assisted him in his conquests. No historian mentions the coronation of this prince; and perhaps he neglected this solemnity, believing it unnecessary; or matters of greater importance afforded him no time to think of it, during his short reign, which did not last a year.

Some historians say he died a natural death, being choked by a rheum; but others assert that he was poisoned; but whatever was the cause, he died suddenly, which gave occasion to the legend writers to say he was killed with a club or lance by St. Edmund, formerly king of East-Anglia; who it is pretended did it to save the town, where his body lay buried, from being

† He was killed at Greenwich, to which place, the station of their ships, they had brought him prisoner. And therefore, in the old church of Greenwich, on the top of the partition wall, between the nave of the church and the chancel, was this inscription:—"This church was erected and dedicated to the glory of God, and the memory of St. Alphage, archbishop of Canterbury, here slain by the Danes; because he would not ransom his life by an unreasonable sum of money. An. 1012." He was first buried at St. Paul's, in London, and afterwards removed to Canterbury. He was honoured as a martyr, and stands in the Roman Martyrology on the 19th of April.

* Florence, of Worcester, says, the burghers were served in the same manner: so that only four monks and about eight hundred laymen were left alive. Lambard supposes there were about forty-three thousand two hundred persons massacred.

† Forty-five of their ships submitted to Ethelred, and promised to defend the kingdom, provided he would allow them victualling and clothes.

plundered for refusing to pay the tax imposed by the new king. The shortness of Sweyn's reign, and perhaps, his not being crowned, are the reasons that but few historians have reckoned him in the number of the kings of England.

ETHELRED RESTORED.

Upon the death of Sweyn, his son Canute was proclaimed king of England by the Danes; but the English recalled Ethelred, promising to support him on the throne, against all the attempts of the Danes, whose government was become insupportable. Ethelred at first was unwilling to trust to their promises, being apprehensive of a design to deliver him into the hands of his enemies; but being encouraged by the reception his son met with, whom he had sent before to sound the people's inclinations, he returned to England; and was received with great demonstrations of joy; and his subjects swore allegiance to him again, as if he had begun a new reign, his flight being considered as a sort of abdication of the crown. He, on his part, promised to reform whatever was amiss; and the eagerness of the English to throw off a foreign yoke, made them flock to the king with such zeal and haste, that he soon found himself at the head of a powerful army. His first expedition plainly showed his misfortunes had made no great alteration in him; for instead of marching against the Danes, he made use of his forces to be revenged on the men of Lindsey,* who had some way displeased him. After he had gratified his passion by the chastisement of these people, he prepared to march and fight the Danes, who little expected so sudden a revolution; and although Canute had the same forces his father Sweyn had conquered England with, he did not think fit to hazard a battle; but on the contrary, before Ethelred was advanced near enough to oblige him to fight, he led his troops to the sea-side, and embarking them, set sail for Denmark. Before his departure, he ordered the hands and feet of the hostages he had in his power to be cut off, leaving them thus mangled on the shore.

The retreat of Canute appears strange, as he had never been worsted, and besides, had many strong places still in his hands; and the only clue that can be obtained as to the cause of this conduct is the account given by the Danish writers, who say that Canute had a younger brother, named Harold, who being regent in the absence of his father Sweyn, seized upon Denmark for himself; which obliged Canute to leave England, with a precipitation that seemed to be an effect of fear rather than sound policy.

As soon as Ethelred found himself freed from the Danes, he took no heed of his promise to his subjects; but on the contrary, resumed his old maxims, and imposed, on several pretences, excessive taxes, which raised great murmurings among the nobles and people.

To these causes for public discontent, he added others of a more private nature, which destroyed all the hopes entertained of his amendment. Morcard and Sifforth, lords of Danish extraction, who had all along firmly adhered to the interest of the king and their new country, were sacrificed to his avarice. To draw these two earls into his power, the king convened a great council at Oxford, where he caused them to be murdered, and then seized their estates, as if they had been condemned by the common forms of justice.* Alghitha, widow of Sifforth, was shut up in a monastery, to which confinement she was indebted for her after-greatness; for Edmund, the king's eldest son, passing that way some time after, was desirous to see one so renowned for her beauty, and fell so desperately in love with her, that he married her, even against his father's consent.

The calm England enjoyed after the retreat of the Danes lasted but one year. Canute having got possession of the throne of Denmark, immediately re-embarked for England, and when least expected, landed a numerous army at Sandwich. Ethelred, being then unwell, Edmund his son, with Streon, duke of Mercia, his son-in-law, had the command of the army against the Danes; and Edmund soon perceived his brother-in-law was a friend to Canute. This discovery obliged him to invent some pretence to divide the army into two bodies, that he might be separated from him, not daring to punish the traitor, for fear of exciting a revolt in Mercia, where Streon's power was exceedingly great. He also dreaded his father's displeasure, who, he knew, could never be convinced that Streon held intelligence with the Danes. Canute taking advantage of this division of the English forces, made large conquests immediately; and the treacherous Edric, who had joined Edmund with no other view but to betray him, finding he had lost his aim, openly declared for Canute; and this would have been rather an advantage than a detriment to the king's affairs, if the traitor had not carried with him a considerable body of troops, with forty ships of war. This desertion, which proved very serviceable to Canute, was a mortal wound to Ethelred; and the people went over in crowds to the Danes, in proportion as the king's affairs fell to decay; so that even Wessex itself was not very secure.

Canute's expectations daily increasing by these successes, he turned his arms against those of the Mercians who continued in their alliance to the king, and at length, with the assistance of Streon, entirely subdued them. After which he formed a design to attack Ethelred in Wessex itself; where he had the more reason to expect success, as Edric had artfully instilled into the Mercians who were in the English army, a notion that it was a sin to bear arms against a prince in possession of their country; and consequently, all that Edmund could obtain of these troops, was, that they would follow the king when he commanded the army in person,

* Florence of Worcester and Matthew Westminster relate, that these two earls were privately accused by Edric, who desired their estates, of treasonable practices against Ethelred, by whose order Edric invited them to a feast, where he caused them to be treacherously murdered. Their dependents, who intended to revenge their deaths, were forced to fly into St. Frideswide's church in Oxford, which being set on fire, they perished in the flames; but the king repenting of his cruelty, caused the church to be rebuilt. In this, and several other particulars, it is plain, that Ethelred was urged on by the treacherous Edric, to make him odious to the people; and that he was not so bad as is represented, appears from the good laws he made, which are still extant. He was particularly careful of the due execution of justice; and having found one Walgeatas, a judge, whom he loved, guilty of injustice, he deposed him from his office.

* One of the three divisions of Lincolnshire, viz. Holland, Kesteven, and Lindsey. The Saxon annals tell us, the men of Lindsey had provided the Danes with horses, and designed to join with them in their ravages.

refusing to fight under any other general. In this extremity, Edmund used all possible endeavours to persuade his father, who feigned himself sick at London, to take the command of the army. But the more Ethelred was pressed, the more he was confirmed in his suspicion of a design to deliver him to the Danes, imagining the English had no other way to make a peace with them; and as he durst not quit London, where he thought himself safe, he refused to go to the army; and the prince his son had the mortification to see his troops disperse, without being able to bring them to a battle. In the mean time, Canute taking advantage of these disorders, enlarged his conquests with great rapidity.

In these wretched circumstances, Edmund saw no remedy but to repair himself to London, and try to persuade the king to head the army; in which he prevailed at last with great difficulty; and then by his extraordinary assiduity, raised another army more numerous than the former; with which he designed to give Canute battle, persuaded as he was, that nothing but a signal victory could retrieve the affairs of the English. Ethelred visited the army according to his promise, but upon his arrival was seized by his old fears. Whether he had any ground for his suspicion, or it was instilled into him by the traitors about his person, does not appear; he, however, made but a very brief stay, returning to London with all imaginable speed. After his departure, the army being much weakened by the retreat of the Mercians, who obstinately refused to fight without the king at their head, Edmund was obliged to keep at a distance from the Danes, for fear of engaging at a great disadvantage; and Canute finding no further opposition, became master of several counties in Wessex, and soon found himself in a condition to complete the conquest of the whole kingdom.

Edmund perceiving he was unable to stop the progress of the enemy, resolved to march and join Uthred, earl of Northumberland, who had levied some troops in the north. They ravaged together those parts of the country that sided with the Danes, whilst Canute and the duke of Mercia laid waste the southern counties that persisted in their obedience to Ethelred. But Canute did not long suffer his friends to be exposed to the ravages of the English; for directly he was informed of what passed in the north, he marched thither with the utmost expedition, and compelled Edmund and Uthred to retire into Lancashire, where the latter despairing of any success, traitorously submitted to Canute; who upon some understanding, the particulars of which have not come down to us, continued him for a short time in his government; but being convinced that the earl had changed sides purely by compulsion, and having reason to fear he would not remain faithful, he caused him to be put to death, and put Eric, a Danish lord, in his place.

Edmund being exceedingly perplexed, retired again to his father at London, and earnestly pressed him to exert himself on the present occasion; but to no purpose; and Ethelred, who till then had feigned himself sick, became really ill, and died soon after in the fiftieth year of his age, and the thirty-seventh of his reign.

Never was England in a more deplorable state than during the reign of this inefficient monarch. He had by his first wife Elgiva, Edmund, who succeeded him; Athelstan, who died in his childhood; Edwy (afterwards murdered by Canute), and three daughters. Edgiva, the eldest of whom was married to an English earl, who was slain in battle. Edgith, the second, was united to the traitor Edric, duke of Mercia; and Edgina, the youngest, was wife of Uthred, earl of Northumberland. By Emma of Normandy, his second wife, he had Alfred and Edward, and a daughter named Goda, who was first married to Walter, earl of Mantes, and afterwards to Eustachius, earl of Boulogne.

The old chroniclers very characteristically give the name of the Unready to this feeble king, who was always surprised by the Danes, and was never ready in any emergency; and who on his ascension of the crown, found the kingdom in a rich and flourishing condition, but left it at his death in the extremest poverty and desolation.

EDMUND II. SURNAMED IRONSIDE.

On the death of Ethelred, the city of London and all the chiefs there present proclaimed his son Edmund king of England, who had already given signal proofs of his courage and conduct; but the Danes, and all the counties in their possession, declared for Canute.* However, as the English obeyed him from constraint, numbers of them came and offered their service to Edmund, whom they looked upon as their lawful prince, though they were constrained to swear to his rival; and by this means the two kings were placed upon an equality, that occasioned many engagements with various success, which served only to prolong the war, but not to decide the contest. London being the chief support of the Saxons, Canute was exceedingly desirous to gain it; being convinced that the possession of it would secure him an easy and entire dominion of the whole kingdom; and with this view, whilst Edmund was elsewhere employed, he approached London, and forming the siege, carried it on vigorously; but the brave resistance of the citizens giving Edmund time to throw in succours from the other side of the Thames, he was obliged to raise the siege. Having thus lost his aim, he used many stratagems to surprise the enemy, or draw him off from London; and succeeding in the last project he returned and laid siege a second time to the city; but again met with the same difficulties; the inhabitants, by a very obstinate defence, giving Edmund a second opportunity of coming to their defence.

Canute, exasperated at being thus foiled in his attempt, suddenly raised the siege, and determined to offer Edmund battle,† who no less desirous of deciding the contest by one single action, instead of retreating, marched towards him. Consequently a battle was fought, which was very bloody, and in which both gave signal proofs of their conduct and courage; but without either being able to make victory incline to his side; and after a long fight, the two armies were obliged to part with almost an equal loss. The English army, however, had nearly been defeated by the artifice of Edric Streon, who fought on the side of the Danes. Perceiving that the English troops, contrary to his expectation, fought in such manner, as made the victory dubious, he cut off the head of one Osmer, a soldier, who very much resembled Edmund, and fixing it on the top of his lance, advanced to the foremost ranks, and exposing it to the view of the English, cried out aloud, "Fly, fly, villains, behold the head of your king, in whom you trust." The English were shaken at this sight, and the stratagem would have occasioned their defeat, had not the king shown himself with his helmet off, and by that means revived their courage. The battle lasting till night, without any visible advantage on either side, Edmund prepared to renew the fight on the morrow; but Canute, who had other designs, retired, during the night,* to his fleet, which waited for him, and embarking his troops, cruised along the coast for some time, to amuse the enemy, who could not fathom his intention; and when he conceived he had deceived Edmund, he landed his forces, and besieged London a third time; but succeeded no better than formerly; and consequently was compelled to retire.

* Simeon of Durham, and others say, that the bishops, abbots, and many of the English nobles, coming to Southampton, abjured the race of Ethelred, at the same time they chose Canute for their king, and swore fealty to him; who also swore to them in matters ecclesiastical and civil, to be their faithful lord.

The particulars of this war would no doubt be very interesting, if it were possible to get a clear account of them. But the extremest confusion in this part of the English history prevails; and all that can be gathered from the old historians for certainty is, that the two contending princes fought five pitched battles within the space of a year. One of these battles, fought in Essex, would have infallibly proved fatal to Canute, had it not been for the pernicious advice of Edric Streon, who continually changing sides, was then in the English army. And although Edmund had been so confiding as to pardon him, and so easy as to give credit to his oaths of being entirely devoted to his service for the future, this traitor, who was a mere tool of the king of Denmark, let no opportunity pass of serving him; and as he saw the Danes, who were hard pressed by the English, retreating in great disorder, he artfully persuaded Edmund to stop the pursuit of the fugitives, by making him apprehensive their despair might cause them to rally, and the victory, by some unforeseen accident, be snatched out of his hands. This artifice, which had formerly taken effect with Ethelred, wrought likewise with Edmund, who suffered himself to be guided by this fatal advice.

This arch-traitor ultimately threw away the mask in the last battle near Assandun;† and whilst the two armies were engaged, suddenly deserted his countrymen and joined the Danes, who received him as their cordial ally. This treachery caused such consternation among the English, that throwing down their arms, they thought of nothing but saving themselves by flight; and Edmund's loss upon this occasion was immense, the flower of the English nobility being slain; amongst whom were the earls Alfrie, Ulfketel, Ethelward, and others of distinguished valour and loyalty, who fell bravely with their swords in their hands in defence of their unhappy country.

After this important victory, Canute considered himself as irresistible; conceiving that Edmund would not be able to bring any army into the field that would dare to contend with his victorious troops. But as the English were in extreme danger, they made extraordinary efforts for their deliverance; and as Edmund had the hearts of his subjects, and particularly of the Londoners, who were always ready to give him effectual proofs of their affection and loyalty, he was, so far from being depressed by this unfortunate defeat, that he rallied his dispersed troops, and drawing together a more powerful army than that which had been destroyed, he went in quest of the enemy, who were marching towards Gloucester. Canute, unwilling to give him time to augment his forces, hastened to meet him with intent to attack him; but the two kings stood in sight of each other for some time, at the head of their respective armies, without either giving the signal of battle; Edmund being sensible he should be irretrievably ruined if he lost the day; and Canute foreseeing a general defection of the English, in case he were vanquished; and thus it appeared to both, that the gain or loss of the kingdom depended on the success of that important conflict. At last, Edmund, who was strong and robust of body, and on that account surnamed Ironside, sent Canute word, that to prevent the great effusion of blood that must be shed in their quarrel, he deemed it would be better for them to decide it by a single combat. To which Canute replied, that though he did not consider himself inferior to his antagonist in courage, yet being of a weak constitution and small stature, he should be careful how he engaged in so unequal a combat; adding, if Edmund was desirous to prevent any further effusion of blood, he was ready to refer the decision of their contest to the principal officers of the two armies. This proposal was received with joy by the nobles of Edmund's party, who desired to find some expedient to put an end to so fatal a war; but Edmund himself, on the contrary, was desirous to decide the quarrel by arms, but durst not oppose the nobility, for fear of estranging them. Plenipotentiaries, therefore, were nominated on both sides, who met in a little isle in the Severn, called Alney, opposite Gloucester, to consult upon the pretensions of the two princes; and after a short conference, a peace was concluded by the partition of the kingdom. Wessex, that is all the country south of the Thames, with the city of London, and part of the ancient kingdom of Essex, being assigned to Edmund; and to Canute, the kingdom of Mercia, including Northumbria and East-Anglia. Peace being thus concluded, the two kings met in the Isle of Alney, and mutually swore to preserve the peace; and Edmund then retired into Wessex.

Edmund's challenging Canute has given occasion to some historians to assert that the two kings actually fought a duel in the Isle of Alney; to make which appear the more probable, they have taken care to be very particular in the circumstances of the combat; telling us, that after it had lasted some time without any advantage on either side, Canute finding his strength fail him, lifted up the visor of his helmet, and proposed the division of the kingdom which Edmund consented to immediately;

* This battle was fought at Scoerstan, which Camden supposes to be Sherston, in Wiltshire; others think it to be the place where four stones, called Shire-stones, part the counties of Oxford, Gloucester, Worcester, and Warwick. Milton makes the battle to have lasted two whole days, and Canute to have retreated the second night: so also does Matt. Westminster, and he relates Edric's stratagem as occurring on the second day.

† Ashdon, in Essex, near Walden. Canute built a church here in memory of this battle to pray for the souls of the slain; and caused four hillocks to be thrown up, as monuments of those that were killed in the battle. Two of these monuments being opened and searched into, there were found three stone coffins, with abundance of pieces of bones in them, and many chains of iron, like those on horses' bits. These hills are commonly called Bartlow-hills, though they lie in Ashdon parish. Some think it was Bartlow church that was built by Canute.

and it is further added, that, at the same instant, they ran to embrace one another, to the astonishment of the two armies, who were spectators. But as the best historians do not mention this combat, and it is not probable that they would have neglected to embellish their histories with so romantic an event, had there been any foundation for it :* it probably is a mere fiction of a subsequent period.

Edmund did not long enjoy the peace which cost him so much exertion; for Edric Streon, his determined enemy, fearing that the union of the kings might prove fatal to him, bribed two of the king's chamberlains, or according to some accounts, employed his own son to assassinate him; and thus perished that heroic prince.

Edmund had not occupied the throne a complete year; but even in that short time he had given frequent proofs of an undaunted courage, a consummate prudence, and a generous nature. He was buried next his grandfather Edgar, at Glastonbury; and with him fell the glory of the English Saxons; for by his death the Danes prevailed, and the Saxon monarchy in reality ended, after it had lasted one hundred and ninety years from the establishment by Egbert, four hundred and thirty-two from the founding of the heptarchy, or octarchy, and five hundred and sixty-eight from the arrival of the Saxons under Hengist.

He left, by Alghitha, his wife, two sons, Edmund and Edward; and he had also a natural son, named Edwy, who was afterwards put to death by Canute.

The infamous Streon, who prided himself with doing Canute so signal a service, hastened to carry him the first news of it; but Canute detested the barbarous deed, as afterwards appeared. He however concealed his sentiments at the time, feeling he should have further occasion for him, and consequently promised to advance him above all the nobles of the realm; a promise which he kept in a very different manner from that which the traitor expected.

CANUTE THE GREAT, THE SECOND DANISH KING OF ENGLAND.

The death of Edmund furnished Canute with an opportunity and excuse to possess himself of Wessex, which the heirs of Edmund were little able to dispute with him. For this purpose he did not intend to resort to force of arms, but determined to carry his point by extorting the consent of the nobles; and however much averse the English might be to the Danish government, he was in hopes the dread of plunging the kingdom into fresh calamities would make such an impression on them, as would constrain them to comply with his desires. He therefore required a general assembly to be called in Wessex, in order to set forth his claim, determining to appeal to force if he met with too strong an opposition. Edmund having left two sons and two brothers, Canute could scarcely feign any pretence to the crown; but he maintained, that in the treaty of the Isle of Alney, it was agreed that the survivor of the two kings should succeed the other; and he at the same time broadly intimated he should not abide by the determination of the assembly, if the matter were decided against him.

Edmund's two sons were very young, and his brothers were in Normandy, where they did not trouble themselves about obtaining the crown of Wessex; Canute, on the other hand, was in great power; and besides possessing half the kingdom, had many friends among the West-Saxons themselves, without reckoning those who were persuaded any expedient was preferable to the renewing of the war. It was therefore scarcely possible for the friends of the English princes to surmount such great obstacles; and had they been obstinately bent to continue the succession in the family of Edmund, they would have probably rekindled in the kingdom a war, which must have ended in its destruction. Consequently in this perplexity, they were contented with proposing that Canute should be declared protector of Edmund's children, till the eldest was of age to govern; by which means they hoped, if they did not place these princes on the throne, at least to preserve their rights entire. But Canute was not satisfied with a limited power, and was determined to succeed Edmund in his own right, by virtue of his interpretation of the treaty of Alney; a right which, though all did not acknowledge, yet none durst openly contest. He maintained, that although the treaty did not expressly say what he asserted, it could not be otherwise understood without infringement of its spirit; and to prove this to be the true intent of the parties concerned in the treaty, he called as witnesses all those who were present at the conclusion of the peace, and demanded of them, whether there was anything stipulated in favour of Edmund's sons? And upon their replying that there was even no mention at all of the princes, he argued they had no right to succeed their father. This reasoning, weak as it was, being supported by the votes of his party, and moreover by the fears of the English in general, was sufficient to determine the assembly to comply with his will; and his reasons were thought, or feigned to be thought, very solid; and without a closer examination, he was acknowledged and proclaimed king of all England, and all the nobility, both English and Danish, swore allegiance to him. He was then crowned, and immediately after, he divided the kingdom into the four governments of Mercia, Northumbria, East-Anglia, and Wessex. The first he gave to Edric Streon, the second to Eric, and the third to Turketul, reserving Wessex to himself, without appointing any deputy to its governance.

Canute was too politic not to be aware of the motive which induced the English to acknowledge him their sovereign; and although all the English that approached him took care to dissemble their sentiments, he was sensible an enmity of near two hundred years' standing, and fomented by continual wars, could not be extinguished in so short a space. For this reason, he resolved to use all possible precautions to hinder their revolt; and he was aware, that to this end two things were equally necessary, namely, the gaining the affection of his new subjects, and the getting rid of those who could give him any uneasiness. Though these two projects seemed inconsistent, he despaired not of accomplishing them, and accordingly spent the beginning of his reign to that purpose; and as he well knew, the most effectual means of becoming popular, was to cause justice to be administered fairly and impartially,

* Ethelred, abbot of Rievall, gives a very particular account of what passed before, at, and after this famous duel; and with him agree Huntingdon, and Mathew of Westminster. Malmsbury says, Edmund challenged Canute, but he declined the combat, and offered to divide the kingdom. Simeon of Durham, and Hoveden, mention nothing of the challenge or duel, but only speak of the division of the kingdom by the persuasion of Edric, in the same manner as the Saxon Annals. So great is the uncertainty of this fact.

he publicly declared there should be, for the future, no distinction between the English and Danes; and consequently, published an edict,* that every county should be governed by the same laws as in the time of the Saxon kings. He excepted, however, the northern counties, because they were peopled with scarce any other than Danes, who had introduced particular laws of their own, which there was no occasion to alter. The same edict denounced the severest punishments against malefactors, either Danes or English, his aim being to let the English perceive they might rely on the impartial execution of the laws. These wise precautions produced the intended effect; and the people were never weary of testifying their satisfaction to find themselves governed by their ancient laws, under the protection of an equitable prince, who seemed to have no other view, but the happiness of his subjects.

As soon as Canute saw the progress he had made in the hearts of the English, he believed he might venture without danger upon the second part of his project, the freeing himself from those that gave him most uneasiness, and particularly the Saxon princes. Alfred and Edward, brothers of the late king, had retired into Normandy, with their mother Emma, plainly foreseeing it would not be in the power of the West-Saxons to do justice to the royal family. Edmund's two sons, who remained in England, notwithstanding their youth, made the new king somewhat uneasy, on account of the people's affection for them; and he was only restrained, by his fear of outraging the English, from putting them to death. As some relief to his fears he had them conveyed to Denmark,† under colour of sending them abroad to travel; and the person intrusted with the princes, being suspicious of the king's design, was touched with compassion for them, and instead of carrying them to Denmark, conducted them to the king of Sweden, who gave them his protection, but being unwilling to quarrel with Canute, sent them to the court of Solomon, king of Hungary, his relation, who willingly undertook to take care of and educate them. Subsequently, Solomon gave one of his daughters in marriage to Edmund; and to Edward, his sister-in-law Agatha, daughter of the Emperor Henry II. Edmund died soon after his marriage; but Edward had five children, of whom two died in Hungary: and the others were, Edgar Atheling, Margaret, and Christian.

There were still in England two sons of Ethelred II., both named Edwy, of whom one was born in wedlock, and the other a natural child. The last was called, but for what reason does not appear, the king of the clowns. Canute was no less jealous of these than the other princes, and he therefore banished them the realm; but some time after, recalling the legitimate one, under pretence of being reconciled to him, he found means to have him dispatched. The other, after enduring many hardships in exile, returned into England, where he kept himself concealed, being privately supplied by his friends with necessaries for his subsistence.‡

Canute was exceedingly desirous to be freed from the anxiety occasioned by Alfred and Edward, the brothers of King Edmund, who were in Normandy with their mother; but he knew not how to get them out of the hands of Duke Richard II., their uncle. He was also apprehensive, that the duke, whose forces were formidable, would one day espouse their cause; and to prevent this danger, he determined to secure the duke of Normandy to his interests, by demanding in marriage his sister Emma, widow of Ethelred II., and by offering him at the same time, Estritha, one of his sisters; which proposals both being accepted, the two marriages were celebrated in a magnificent manner. If Emma was pleased with being once more queen of England, it was not so with Alfred and Edward her sons, who openly betrayed their dislike; and Edward especially, never forgave her for thus scandalously espousing the mortal foe of her first husband. Both of them were also additionally incensed against her for consenting, that the succession to the crown of England, should be settled, by the marriage-articles, on the heirs of her body by Canute; which was depriving, as far as lay in her power, the family of Ethelred of all hopes of ever mounting the throne.

After Canute had thus secured himself from the Saxon princes, he determined to get rid of those chiefs whose fidelity he suspected, or whose power made him uneasy. The three whom he most dreaded were, the duke of Mercia, the duke of East-Anglia, and the earl of Northumberland; all of whom had done him signal services; which he only considered rendered them more formidable to him. He knew Edric Streon to be a villain, and as he could not rely on his fidelity, since he had so often betrayed the two former kings, notwithstanding the obligations that ought to have attached him to their interests, he resolved to begin with him; and he was not long in finding a plausible opportunity, which even made his destruction appear an act of justice. Streon having one day the impudence to upbraid him publicly, for not rewarding him for his past services,* and particularly for freeing him from so formidable a rival as Edmund; Canute instantly took the rash declaration; and Edric had no sooner uttered the words, but the king answered in a rage, since he was so audacious as openly to avow so black a treason, of which he had hitherto been only suspected, he should instantly receive his due punishment; and at the same moment, without giving him time to reply, he commanded him to be immediately beheaded, and his body thrown into the Thames.† Some chroniclers add that he ordered his head to be fixed on the highest part of the Tower of London,‡ that he might perform his promise to the traitor, to raise him above all the nobles of the realm.

Eric, earl of Northumberland, was banished the kingdom shortly after, under some pretence; and Edwiadelinge, and the second Edwicheorleging. Malmsbury says, Edwy-adelinge was buried at Tavistock in Devonshire.

* He upbraided him for having deprived him of the earldom of Mercia.

† He was beheaded in the king's palace, and his body flung out of a window, into the Thames. So that the king's palace stood close to the Thames. Other historians say, that the body was cast upon the wall of the city, and left there unburied.

‡ That could not be, since the Tower of London was not built till the reign of William I. Huntingdon says, he ordered it to be fixed on the highest tower in London; and Brompton, on the highest gate in London.

* This was done by a Wittena-Gemot at Oxford.

† All the English historians affirm, that Walgar (for that was the domestic's name) had orders to carry them to the king of Sweden, Swanorun, or Suevorum.

‡ These two Edwys are confounded by several historians; but they are plainly distinguished in the Saxon annals, and in the genealogy at the end of the History of Alfred, written by Speiman. As also in H. Huntingdon, who calls the first Turketul, duke of East-Anglia, frightened by these examples, and perhaps by the king's emissaries, voluntarily absented himself.* Several other persons of less note falling in like manner a sacrifice to the king's jealousy or suspicions, their posts were filled with those in whom he placed greater confidence; and from this time the English began to enjoy a state of tranquillity; but were still compelled to pay a tax of eighty thousand pounds for the arrears due to the Danish army, great part of whom were sent back to Denmark.

Canute finding the whole kingdom in profound tranquillity, and having no reason to fear a revolt, resolved upon a voyage to Denmark; where his presence was absolutely necessary, on account of the war which raged between the Danes and Vandals. He took with him such of the English chiefs as he suspected, lest his absence should encourage them to raise disturbances in the kingdom; and for this reason also, he carried with him the flower of the English troops, under the command of Earl Godwin, son of Ulnoth, mentioned in the reign of Ethelred II. Godwin, who possessed considerable military experience, signalized himself in this war, by a very bold though successful action. The two armies of the Danes and Vandals being near one another, Canute designed to attack the enemies early the next morning; but whilst his troops were refreshing themselves in expectation of the battle, Godwin privately withdrawing from the camp, with the troops under his command, fell upon the Vandals in the night, and putting them in disorder by this sudden attack, made a great slaughter of them, and routed the whole army. As a reward for this important service, Canute created him earl of Kent.

The war being ended, Canute returned into England, where immediately after his arrival he convened the great council to confirm the Danish laws, which for some time had been observed in part of the kingdom, and particularly in Northumbria. We may here observe, that at this time there were in England three sorts of laws, namely, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish laws; but the last of which had not the sanction of public authority, until Canute, at his return from Denmark, put them upon a level with the ancient laws of England.

Canute some time after was obliged to take a second voyage to Denmark, then invaded by the Swedes; which expedition was not very prosperous; and the English troops he carried with him were great sufferers.

Two years after this he resolved to revive some ancient pretensions to Norway; as Oalaüs, who then sat on the throne of that country, was a weak and unwarlike prince. He began the execution of this design by privately forming a strong party among the Norwegian chieftains; and as soon as matters were ripe, he sailed for Denmark with a considerable body of English troops, and suddenly landed them in Norway; and Oalaüs, who had no intelligence of his intentions, surprised at the attack, abandoned his kingdom. Upon his retreat, Canute was crowned king of Norway, utterly regardless of all right but such as conquest could bestow. Two years after, the dispossessed monarch attempting to recover his dominions, was slain by his own subjects, and Canute remained peaceable possessor of the kingdom. Oalaüs, after his death, was ranked among the saints, and honoured with the title of martyr.

* He went to Denmark, where as soon as he landed, he was taken, and put to death.

The conquest of Norway appears to have satisfied Canute's ambition; for from that time he devoted himself to religion; that is to say, he made it his principal business to enrich the churches and monasteries; as if the usurpation of two kingdoms, and all the consequent evils, could be repaired by so slight a satisfaction. Among other things he took particular care to give public marks of his respect to St. Edmund, formerly king of East-Anglia, slain by the Danes; and built a stately church over the grave of that prince, and very much enlarged the town, which from him had the name of St. Edmund's-bury. The monastery, in the same place, called Bredicworth, which had been endowed by Edward the Elder, was also considerably enlarged by Canute, who augmented the revenues, and it consequently became one of the richest religious houses in the kingdom.*

After he had shown, as he thought, visible marks of his devotion, he resolved upon a journey to Rome, which he performed in the year 1032; and whilst there, he made many rich presents to the churches, and confirmed all the grants of his predecessors to the church of Rome, and the English college; for which he obtained in return, certain privileges for the English churches, and some advantages for those who came to visit the tombs of the apostles; of which the most material, was an exemption to all Englishmen from the payment of any toll as they passed through Italy. The Emperor Conrad, of Germany, who was then at Rome, and with whom he had contracted a strict friendship, granted him the same privilege; as did also the king of France; and by this means the English pilgrims and travellers were eased of a great expense, and freed from a thousand insults and oppressions to which they had been liable in France, Italy, and Germany. We have an elaborate account of these matters in a letter written by Canute himself from Rome, to the assembly-general of the English nation, informing them what he had done in favour of his subjects: in which letter he also professes to feel great piety, and a fixed resolution to govern his kingdom after the most exact rules of justice, and desires his nobles to assist him in that laudable design.

Mackintosh says, "In his journey from Rome to Denmark (a wonderful enterprise for that age), he obtained the cession of the margraviate of Sleswick, and the acknowledgment of the Eyder, as the frontier of Denmark, which it still is, from the Emperor Conrad II., who obtained the station of temporal chief of Christendom."

As soon as he returned to England, he applied himself to the dedication of the church of St. Edmund, which he had begun before his journey to Rome; and having spent some years longer in continual acts of devotion, he died in 1036, in the nineteenth year of his reign.

Historians have not failed to give Canute the

* Leland, who was an eye-witness of this town and monastery in their splendour, gives this description of them:—"A city more neatly seated the sun never saw, hanging upon a gentle descent, with a little river on its east side; nor a monastery more great and stately, whether we consider the endowments, largeness, and unparalleled magnificence. The monastery itself looks like a city, so many gates it has (some whereof are brass), so many towers, and a church, than which nothing can be more stately, to which as appendages, there are three more of admirable beauty and workmanship in the same churchyard." There are two still entire; viz. St. Mary's and St. James's; the third, which lies in ruins, was the great church of the monastery. Besides the immense value of the gifts at St. Edmund's tomb, the revenues at the dissolution amounted to one thousand five hundred and sixty pounds a year; a large sum in those days surname of Great, a title which seems peculiar to conquerors, as if true greatness consisted in invading the rights and properties of others. But if we do not confine this title within such narrow limits, Canute may still be said to merit that title, particularly as regards the latter part of his reign; the close of his life being very different from the beginning. If there is no exaggeration in the character which historians give him, from the time he was completely settled on the throne of England, he displayed a continual wisdom, justice, and moderation, that gained him the affection of his subjects, and a universal esteem among foreigners.

The following story, among others, is instanced as an example of his wisdom. One day, as he was walking by the sea-side, his attendants extolled him exceedingly, and even proceeded to compare him to God himself. Offended at these extravagant praises, and willing to convince them of their folly and impiety, he ordered a chair to be brought, and seating himself in a place where the tide was about to flow, turned to the sea, and said: "O sea, thou art under my dominion, and the land I sit on is mine: I charge thee not to presume to approach any further, nor to dare to wet the feet of thy sovereign." And having said this, he sat still for some time, as if expecting the sea would obey his commands; but the tide advancing as usual, he took occasion to admonish his flatterers, and told them, "that the titles of Lord and Master of all belonged only to Him whom the land and the sea obey:" and he is said, from that moment, never to have worn his crown again, but ordered it to be placed on the head of the crucifix at Winchester.

He left three sons, all arrived at manhood, to whom he bequeathed his three kingdoms by will. Sweyn, the eldest, a natural son, but according to some historians, a child imposed upon him for such by the mother, had Norway. To Harold, his second son, by the same woman, he gave England; and to Canute, or Hardicanute, whom he had by Emma of Normandy, the kingdom of Denmark. Gunilda, his daughter by the same princess, was married to the Emperor Henry IV.

As the affairs of Normandy are henceforward intimately mingled with those of England, it will not be improper to give some account of the Normans.

Richard II., duke of Normandy, dying in 1026, Richard III., his son, succeeded him, who reigned but one year, and by his death left the dukedom to Robert, his brother; who was no sooner in possession, than he espoused the interest of Alfred and Edward, his cousins, sons of his aunt Emma and Ethelred II.; and as soon as he heard of the death of Edmund's son, he sent ambassadors to Canute, to entreat him to give the two princes some part of the kingdom of their ancestors; but this embassy arrived in England, when Canute found himself so firmly seated in his throne, that he thought he might safely disregard the solicitations of the duke of Normandy. Robert was so incensed at his refusal, that he resolved to compel him to do justice to the English princes; and fitted out a powerful fleet, and embarking with a numerous army, resolved to make a descent upon England, where he did not question but the English would readily join him; but meeting with a violent storm, he had the misfortune to behold the greatest part of his fleet perish; a loss which could not be easily retrieved. In the mean time, these preparations satisfying Canute, that the duke of Normandy really intended to attempt the restoration of his cousins, he endeavoured to amuse him with offering them part of the kingdom of Wessex. But Robert would not have been imposed upon by this offer, had not his unfortunate naval expedition constrained him to suspend the execution of his design, as it had also induced Canute to depart from his word. Some time after, Robert went on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, deferring, till his return, his intended invasion of England; but he died in his way home, leaving a natural son, called William, on whom, before his departure, he had settled the succession.

HAROLD I., SURNAMED HAREFOOT, THE THIRD DANISH KING OF ENGLAND.

When Canute espoused the princess of Normandy, it was agreed that the children by this marriage should succeed to the crown of England; but notwithstanding this agreement, Canute left England to his son Harold, born in Denmark, and gave Denmark to Hardicanute, his son by Emma of Normandy. Apparently, he did not think the English had been sufficiently inured to the Danish yoke, to venture to place on their throne his youngest son, who was not above fifteen or sixteen years of age, and of no great genius. But the English considered Hardicanute, born in England, of a lawful wife, widow of one of their kings, as the only person entitled to succeed; and regarded Harold as a foreigner and bastard. The Danes, on the contrary, were firmly bent to perform Canute's last will and testament; and this difference might have been productive of a fierce civil war, if Harold had not with the utmost expedition, seized the treasure laid up by the king, his father, at Winchester; by which means he gained over several of his opponents, and consequently, in a general assembly in Mercia, secured a majority, and was proclaimed king of England. The Danes were unanimously for him, and of course, the English Mercians, or the inhabitants on the north of the Thames, who were under the dominion of the Danes, durst not openly oppose them.

Meantime, the West-Saxons, who did not deem themselves conquered, convened an assembly of the states of Wessex, and by the management of Earl Godwin, Hardicanute was elected and proclaimed king of Wessex, the West-Saxons leaving the Mercians free to acknowledge Harold for their king. It must be remembered, that although at this period there were Danes, or people of Danish extraction, dispersed all over England, their chief settlements were in Mercia, East-Anglia, and Northumbria; and consequently, in all the country north of the Thames, called then by the general name of Mercia, there were more Danes than English. On the contrary, in Wessex, that is, south of the Thames, the English were the most numerous, having admitted among them such of their countrymen, who, to avoid living under the dominion of the Danes, had quitted the northern parts; by which means Wessex was exceedingly populous, and more powerful than ever, being capable of bringing into the field as large armies as the rest of England. Harold, upon this account, and not being possessed of his father's qualities, imagined he was not strong enough to undertake the conquest of Wessex. Nor did Hardicanute, who was in Denmark, hasten to take possession of the crown of Wessex; whether that he was detained by other affairs, or on this, as well as on all other occasions, gave way to his natural sluggishness; and during his absence Earl Godwin held the reins of the government in an absolute manner, independent of Emma, the queen-mother, who was unpopular with the West-Saxons.

Meanwhile, Harold was contriving to gain, by political intrigue, a kingdom which he found himself unable to subdue by arms; and as he had been deprived of it by the sole influence of Earl Godwin, he believed there was no readier way to ascend the throne, than by gaining the earl to his interest. He took advantage, therefore, of his brother's absence, to win Godwin to his interest, by means, which, though not expressly declared in history, may be easily conjectured; as he is known not to have been very scrupulous. The whole affair was so dexterously managed, that suddenly, on pretence that Hardicanute neglected to come into England, Harold was acknowledged king of Wessex. But this change was not made with the unanimous consent of the West-Saxons, but by the promptness and intrigues of Godwin's party, who managed so well, that it was done before any measures could be taken to obstruct it.

Emma, mother of Hardicanute, and her party, were extremely surprised at this revolution, which not only deprived her son of the crown of Wessex, but herself also of the hopes of ever having any share in the government. She perceived there was no possibility of recovering the crown for her son Hardicanute; and therefore formed a project to place one of her sons by Ethelred on the throne; calculating that the English would countenance, with all their power, an enterprise tending to set the crown on the head of a prince of the race of their ancient kings. It appears, that the desire of revenging herself on Godwin influenced her as much as her son's advancement. To succeed in her design, it was necessary to find some pretence, without raising the king's jealousy, to send for the two princes, her sons, who were in Normandy, that they might form a party for themselves; and with this view, she feigned to disregard the expulsion of Hardicanute, confining herself to Winchester, where she daily frequented the churches, and seemed to be wholly occupied with religious duties. When she imagined the king was sufficiently convinced of her disregard of state-affairs, she entreated permission to send for the two princes, her sons, to Winchester, whom she had not seen since her second marriage; and her request being granted, Alfred and Edward arrived soon after in England, without discovering any other intention but to visit their mother. They were caressed by great numbers of people, who, having English predilections, firmly adhered to the ancient royal family.

Godwin immediately perceived the queen's design, and employed numerous spies, by whose means he discovered the whole of her intentions; and consequently advised the instant destruction of the two Saxon princes, as the only effectual method of stopping the conspiracy. Harold approved of his advice, and as if he were ignorant of the queen's designs, invited them to come to his court before they returned into Normandy, where he pretended to believe they intended to go very shortly. This conduct was exceedingly perplexing to Emma, as she was very sensible it would be difficult for her sons to gain a powerful party among the nobility, without appearing at court; and on the other hand, if they did go there, they were placed in the power of Harold. She at last determined on sending Alfred, her eldest son, to the king, and detaining Edward under some pretence; imagining, very judiciously, that if Harold had any evil design, he would defer the execution of it until he had both the brothers in his power, since the death of one would not destroy the competition for the throne. Godwin was sent to meet Alfred, seemingly to do him honour; and Alfred's little train, consisting of Normans, were at first charmed with the respect he paid to the prince; but their satisfaction was quickly turned into consternation, when the prince and all his attendants were stopped at Guildford-castle, where they had been carried under colour of refreshing themselves. Alfred was immediately after conducted to Ely, and, after having had his eyes put out, was shut up in the monastery; where he died a few days after, either from grief, or by some more violent means. Godwin was afterwards charged with his murder, but whether justly or no cannot be decided.

As soon as Edward was informed of his brother's death, he fled into Normandy; and shortly after, Emma receiving a command to depart the kingdom, she retired to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who assigned her the city of Bruges to reside in. It seems somewhat strange she should not have gone to Normandy to Duke William, her nephew; but probably, those who had the administration of the government there during the duke's minority, did not think proper to receive her; and, indeed, it was exceedingly probable that so intriguing a person would have increased the dissensions of that dukedom, in which William was far from being firmly established.

Whilst these things were transacting in England, Hardicanute waking at length from his lethargy, formed a design of recovering by arms the kingdom of Wessex, and for that purpose repaired to Bruges, to consult with the queen-mother; and most probably he would have found it very difficult to execute his design, had not the death of Harold, which happened very fortunately for him, removed all difficulties.

This prince died in 1039, without issue, at Oxford, in the fourth year of his reign, and was buried at Westminster. He was a coarse licentious ruffian, of too strong or too brutal a mind to be bigoted; as appears from his contempt of the monks, and open disregard of the observances of religion. He laid a tax of eight marks on every port, towards fitting out sixteen ships, and enacted a law, according to Selden, that if any Welshman, coming into England without leave, was taken on this side Offa's ditch, he should have his right hand cut off by the king's officer. He was surnamed Harefoot, because he was light and swift of foot; and his death happened in one of the hardest winters that had ever been known in England; when, according to the Saxon annals, a horse-load of wheat was sold for fifty-five pence and more.

CANUTE II., OR HARDICANUTE, THE FOURTH DANISH KING OF ENGLAND.

After the death of Harold, the chiefs of both nations unanimously made an offer of the crown to Canute, surnamed the Hardy, not to denote his courage, but his strong constitution. He was then at Bruges, concerting measures with the queen, his mother, for the recovery of the kingdom of Wessex, by means of a powerful aid promised him by the earl of Flanders; but the news of Harold's death putting an end to their consultations, he came to England with forty ships, which he had brought from Denmark. He was received with great demonstrations of joy, both by the English and Danes; and Earl Godwin himself, though he had no reason to rejoice at his arrival, after the part he had taken against him, was the foremost to do him homage.

The new king began his reign with an act of disgusting barbarism. The ceremony of his coronation was scarcely over, when impatient to be revenged on his brother, though dead, he commanded his body to be dug up and thrown into the Thames; where some fishermen finding it floating, delivered it to the Danes, who interred it in the burial-place of their nation in London.* It is further added, the king being informed of it, ordered the body to be thrown once more into the river; but, being found again, it was privately buried at Westminster.

Shortly after, Hardicanute imposed an exorbitant tax on the kingdom,† for the payment of the fleet sent back to Denmark; and although the English had often paid the Danegeld, they were dissatisfied at its being renewed, when there appeared no necessity for it. The inhabitants of Worcester openly opposed the levying this tax with the greatest vigour; and proceeded so far as to kill two of the collectors. Upon which the king desired Godwin, duke of Wessex, Leofric, duke of Mercia, and Siward, earl of Northumberland, to draw their forces together, and to march to Worcester, and destroy the city with fire and sword; who so far executed these commands, that the city was burnt, after having been plundered four days together; but the inhabitants had leave to retire into a small island in the Severn, named Beverly, till the king was appeased.

Not long after Prince Edward, son of Ethelred II., and brother of the king by the same mother, came over to England and demanded justice against Godwin, charging him with the murder of his brother Alfred. Hardicanute was not displeased at having an opportunity to punish the earl, not for the death of Alfred, but for his powerful support of the late king; and Godwin was cited to answer to the charge. But knowing the avaricious disposition of the king, he diverted the storm by a magnificent present, before his trial, of a galley, manned with fourscore soldiers, each of whom had a gold bracelet weighing sixteen ounces on his arm, gilded helmets and swords, a Danish battle-axe adorned with gold and silver hanging on the left shoulder, and a lance of the same in his right hand. The galley itself was equipped with suitable magnificence; and by means of this extravagant bribe, the earl was acquitted, upon taking an oath, that he had no share in the death of Alfred.

Hardicanute died suddenly in the third year of his reign, at the nuptial feast of a Danish lord at Lambeth,‡ where he fell senseless after an inordinate draught, and never spoke more. He was riotous and dissolute in his conduct, and addicted to the pleasures of the table, which some historians have dignified as a proof of a generous and hospitable disposition, whilst others have adduced it as the sign of a low and brutal taste. One monk writes, with great enthusiasm, that he nobly introduced four meals a day; but another says, his cruelty and gluttony rendered him odious.

EDWARD III. THE CONFESSOR.

Hardicanute leaving no issue, Edward, the son of Ethelred II., and Emma of Normandy, was the only prince then in England who had any pretensions to the crown; and it was but reasonable that the race of the Saxon kings should be restored to the throne of which they had been so unjustly dispossessed. But if strict justice had been followed, it would have been necessary to have recalled from Hungary, Edward, the son of Edmund Ironside, and to have given him the crown in preference to his uncle, who was one degree further removed. On the other hand, the uninterrupted succession of four Danish kings, who had possessed the throne for the space of twenty-eight years, with the consent of the English, gave a claim to Sweyn, son of Canute the Great, who was still alive. He was stigmatized by some as a bastard; but besides that the king his father had not treated him as such in the partition of his dominions, it might be said in his favour, he had a right to the same privilege as his brother Harold; whose being born of the same mother was no obstacle to his mounting the throne.

Amongst all these claims it was difficult to settle the succession to the satisfaction of all parties; and it was to be apprehended that, on this occasion, the old animosities between the two nations would be revived, and the kingdom plunged into its former calamities. Edward, son of Ethelred II., having spent most of his life in Normandy, was little known in England; but he had procured the support of Earl Godwin, whom he had previously prosecuted as the murderer of his brother.

Godwin, as we have already seen, was distinguished by his talent and rank, when Canute the Great intrusted him with the command of the English troops, in the war against the Vandals; and after that expedition, in which he signalized himself, Canute created him earl of Kent, Sussex, and Surrey, and gave him in marriage Thyra, sister of Earl Ulphon, to whom Canute had given his own sister Estrith, widow of the late duke of Normandy; by which wife Godwin had a son, who was drowned in the Thames by an unruly horse. His second wife was Gith, sister of Sweyn, king of Denmark, and successor of Hardicanute in that kingdom. By this wife he had seven sons, Harold, Tostig, Swane, Ulnoth, Gurth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter named Editha. His influence with Canute the Great; the superiority of his genius; his noble alliances; his dignities of earl of Kent, duke of Wessex, and high-treasurer, conferred on him by King Harold; and lastly, the government of the counties of Oxford and Hereford, in the hands of his eldest son, had raised his fortune to such a degree, that it would hardly admit of any addition; and although his power was somewhat restrained in the reign of Hardicanute; he had the address to divert the danger which the jealousy of that monarch threatened him with. This potent and ambitious chieftain, before pledging himself to Edward's cause, stipulated for certain conditions, the chief of which was, the marriage of the future king to his daughter Editha; but it was not without some reluctance, that even the placid Edward consented to wed the daughter of his brother's murderer, and his own former persecutor. When Godwin had received from Edward all the assurances he demanded, he convened a general-assenbly, where, by his intrigues that prince was acknowledged, and with unanimous consent, proclaimed king.

In this general-assembly, to which, in all probability, the Danes being then without a leader, were not called, Godwin strenuously urged, that a favourable opportunity now offered to the English to free themselves from the oppressions under which they had groaned for so many years. He described with his natural eloquence, the calamities their country was overwhelmed with, whilst in subjection to foreigners; and expatiated on the extreme arrogance of the Danes, who, not content with sharing the kingdom with the English, treated them like slaves. He called to their remembrance the sad times, when an Englishman and a Dane meeting on a bridge, the former durst not stir till the latter had passed over; and reminded them of the base homage which the Danes enforced from them. And to all these degradations, he added that of the excessive taxes they had been obliged to pay, particularly Dane-geld, which was imposed for no other end but to satisfy the insatiable avarice of their oppressors; and in fact he omitted nothing that could arouse the indignation of his audience.

Edward was a prince of a weak constitution, and a narrow genius, and possessed none of the qualities requisite for his station. His unsteadiness on important occasions, his inability in public affairs, and his continual attachment to trifles, gave the nobles the opportunity of assuming an almost sovereign power; who soon perceiving his inefficiency, became so arbitrary in their governments, that they almost totally disregarded the government. Earl Godwin, especially, by degrees usurped so great an authority, that he had almost the same deference paid him as the king himself; and it is probable that the meanness of Edward's genius was the principal motive for procuring him the crown, that he might thus use his authority to further his ambitious views. The king secretly hated him and his whole family, and deferred his marriage with Editha as long as he could, and after staying two years on several pretences, he espoused her according to his promise; but then never consummated the marriage, so great was his aversion to Godwin and his family. The queen appears to have had a strict regard to virtue, and to have been endowed with a considerable loftiness of spirit. She bore his neglect with great patience; and finding it was not in her power to gain his affections, she devoted herself to study and religion. The author of the life of Edward pretends, that he made a vow of chastity long before his marriage, and persuaded the queen to do the same; but Malmsbury is very doubtful of this circumstance, and shows a strong inclination to believe Edward's hatred to Godwin was the real cause of his abstaining from his daughter. Edward durst not venture to divorce her, for fear the earl, by whose interest alone he had mounted the throne, might have it equally in his power to depose him; and for this reason he continued to conceal, in all other respects, his aversion to him, and even to heap favours on him, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to show his resentment. But he did not consider that this dissimulation increased the earl's credit with the people, who imagining he was really in favour with the king, more firmly adhered to him; and Godwin artfully improved these advantages, and became every day more formidable from the great number of his adherents. He, however, met with some slight counterpoise in Siward, earl of Northumberland, and Leofric, duke of Mercia, the former of whom had the reputation of being the bravest and best noble in the kingdom; and his excellent qualities gave him great authority at court, as well as among the Northumbrians, who were under his government. Leofric was also universally esteemed; and his power was so great in Mercia, that he had more influence there than Edward himself. These two chiefs united in an opposition to Godwin, and firmly adhered to the person of the king, and supported his authority.

Edward, to whom were given the titles of saint and confessor, mounted the throne with dispositions very repugnant to true sanctity; for besides his hatred to Godwin and his own wife, he cherished in his breast against his mother a desire of revenge, which agreed little better with the maxims of the Gospel. It must, however, be remembered that his mother, who had never any great affection for him, had done enough to exasperate her son in marrying Canute the Great, the mortal enemy of her first husband; and had moreover given her consent, that the children of her second marriage should succeed to the crown of England, which showed but little regard for those of the first. All which made so deep an impression on Edward's mind, that all her endeavours afterwards to procure him the throne, were not able to efface it; and as soon as he found it in his power to make her feel the effects of his resentment, he delayed not to gratify his revenge. And for this purpose when she least expected it, he visited Winchester, where her treasures were, and without showing the least regard for her, deprived her of them, leaving her, however, a moderate portion for her subsistence; and thus this princess, the widow of two kings, the mother of two more, and the daughter of a duke of Normandy, little inferior to a king, found herself at the close of her life, reduced to comparative poverty by the rigour of her own son.

But Edward was not content with showing, by this act of violence, the little respect and affection he had for his mother; and several historians assert that he caused her to be accused of incontinence, with Alwin, bishop of Winchester; and regardless of her quality, compelled her to undergo the ordeal trial, which consisted in obliging her to walk bare-foot and hood-winked over nine red-hot plough-shares. It has been said that Emma escaped unhurt, and gave in memory of this deliverance nine manors to the next monastery; but as has just been related, she had none left to give; and she passed ten years in the condition she was reduced to by the king her son, living in Winchester in a kind of imprisonment, from which she was delivered by her death in 1052.

Whilst Edward was thus venting his resentment upon his mother, he received advice, that a great storm was gathering in the north; and that Sweyn, king of Norway, son of Canute the Great, designing to prosecute his claim to the crown of England, was preparing for an invasion of England. Edward was no less alarmed than his subjects, and proceeded to make some preparations; and Gunilda, niece of Canute the Great, fell a sacrifice to his fears; and was constrained to abandon the kingdom and her family, lest she should intrigue in favour of the Danes. But owing to an unexpected war, which suddenly arose between the kings of Denmark and Norway, the invasion was not completed; and some time after Sweyn was deposed by Magnus, son of Oalaüs the Martyr, whom Canute the Great had dispossessed of Norway. Magnus was no sooner master of that kingdom, but he carried the war into Denmark; with intent to dethrone the king (also named Sweyn), who demanded assistance of England; and Godwin was of opinion, that to keep up the war between these two princes, an aid of fifty sail should be sent him. But Siward and Leofric, for reasons which have not reached us, prevented the council from coming to this resolution; and for want of this assistance, Sweyn was dethroned, but restored to his kingdom after the death of his enemy.

The dissensions in Denmark hindered not the Danish marauders from putting to sea, and ravaging the English coasts. In the year 1046, twenty-five sail of Danes arrived unexpectedly at Sandwich, whence they carried off a great booty; and then sailing for Essex, they carried away great numbers of slaves of both sexes, and all conditions. The English were extremely alarmed; but Godwin, Siward, and Leofric, took such complete measures, that the Danes, terrified in their turn, hastily retired, and prosecuted their ravages elsewhere.

The retreat of these Danes did not entirely restore peace to the kingdom, the coasts being in the same year infested by a new enemy. Swane, a son of Godwin, having violated an abbess, and not daring to stay in England after such an act, retired into Denmark, where he in vain expected his pardon, by the mediation of the earl, his father; but whether Godwin was willing he should be chastised, or found the king inexorable, he was not able to procure a pardon so soon as he expected; which when Swane found, he manned eight ships, and made open war upon the English, plundering the merchants, and committing such barbarities on the inhabitants of the sea-coasts, as exceeded those of the most barbarous enemies. His rebelliousness gave Godwin's enemies a great advantage, who took occasion from thence to exasperate the king more against the earl and his family; and the earl himself was in great perplexity. He was not willing to appear openly for his son, lest he should be charged with abetting his rebellion; and on the other hand, he was extremely concerned at Swane's being considered as a public enemy. To free himself from this situation, he induced Earl Beorn, son of Ulphon and Fistrith, sister of Canute the Great, to use his interest with the king in behalf of his rebellious son; and although Beorn had openly declared an animosity towards Swane, he prevailed with by Godwin to intercede with the king, who complied with his request upon certain conditions; which Beorn went to convey to Swane, and to persuade him to submit to the king's mercy, but was ill rewarded for his pains; for Swane imagining the earl had come to betray him, slew him with his own hand, and ordered his body to be thrown into the sea. This brutal action prevented a reconciliation at that time; but the king afterwards granted him a pardon, notwithstanding the complication of his crimes: so much did this weak monarch dread Godwin's power and connexions; and thus that powerful chief, though hated by the king, obtained as many favours as if he had been really beloved by him; all which, however, instead of producing a mutual affection, served only to foment their disunion.

Besides the private resentment of the king towards Godwin, the earl had also to contend with his other enemies, the Normans, who were very numerous at court, and in great credit there; and who considered Godwin as their professed enemy, because he loudly complained of the great regard the king had for them, and did not scruple to promulgate, that they would soon prove as troublesome as the Danes; and his complaints were not altogether groundless, for Edward, who was educated among the Normans, inclined to their manners, and expressed such an affection for them, as raised the jealousy of the English. The Norman language was more generally spoken at court than the Saxon; and the king's favour rendered them exceedingly insolent. Robert, archbishop of Canterbury, of all the Normans, was in the greatest favour at court. The king had taken him from a monastery in Normandy, to promote him to the bishopric of London, and afterwards to the archbishopric of Canterbury, to the great discontent of several English bishops, who aspired to that dignity. This prelate, who was naturally arrogant, and whom the royal favour made still more so, kept no measures with Godwin, who also showed the utmost contempt for him. The archbishop, incensed to find himself thus treated, made use of all his power to misinterpret and misrepresent all the earl's actions, and to inflame the king's hatred to him to a still higher degree.

Matters standing thus at court, an incident occurred very unexpectedly, which brought Earl Godwin to the brink of destruction, and gave the king an opportunity to discover his enmity towards him. Eustace, earl of Boulogne,* being come to visit the king, his brother-in-law, was honourably and kindly received, Edward having a particular affection for him. Some time after, as he was on the road, in his return to France, one of his people, who was sent before to provide at Dover, insisted upon having lodgings in the house of a man there against his consent, and wounded him in the struggle; upon which some townsmen killed the other upon the spot. This occurrence exciting the inhabitants, they rose generally and ran to arms, to seize the murderer, who stood upon his defence, with some of the earl's domestics that were with him. Eustace, entering the town in the midst of this tumult, and seeing his people attacked, was obliged to take their part, without having time to inquire into the occasion of the quarrel; but being overpowered with numbers, twenty of his retinue were killed on the spot, and he himself narrowly escaped with his life. Enraged at this affront, he returned to the king at Gloucester, where the court then resided, and loudly demanded satisfaction; and Edward, willing to do him justice, ordered Godwin to march immediately with some forces, and chastise the rioters that were under his government. But instead of obeying the king's order, the earl warmly replied, "It was not the custom in England to punish people unheard, and the rights and privileges of the subjects ought not to be violated; that the accused should be summoned, and make satisfaction with their bodies or estates if guilty, or if innocent, should be discharged. Adding, in a very resolute manner, that being earl of Kent, it was his business to protect those who were under his government against the insults of foreigners." Some historians say, he even desired the king to deliver up the earl of Boulogne into his hands, that he might be punished upon the place, if found guilty of this riot. Edward was extremely provoked with this bold answer, which was not only a refusal to obey his commands, but also a reproach for his partiality to foreigners; and the archbishop and the rest of the Normans eagerly improved this occasion to exasperate him against the earl.

* He was father to the famous Godfrey of Boulogne, who won Jerusalem from the Saracens.

However angry the king might be, he was compelled to conceal it. Siward and Leofric being absent, there was little prospect of succeeding, should he attempt anything against Godwin, without being first assured of their concurrence. But as he was in the utmost impatience to be revenged, he dispatched trusty messengers to these two chieftains, to inform them of his resolution to humble Godwin, and to request, or rather desire them, to repair to him immediately. Godwin obtained notice of his design, and made preparations accordingly; and as he was very sensible he should be infallibly ruined, was he not beforehand with his enemies, he drew together some troops, which were soon reinforced with others from his son's government. An opportune incursion of the Welsh at the same time into Herefordshire, furnished him with a pretence to levy this army; and he pretended these forces were designed to drive the enemy out of the kingdom, though he had received no orders to that purpose. In the mean time, the king causing him to be summoned before a general assembly convened at Gloucester, he came with his sons, but so well attended, that he had nothing to fear; and guarded as he was, it would have been dangerous to call him to an account, and a peace was ratified, which was not, however, of long continuance. A general assembly was in consequence again convened, where Godwin and his sons were summoned to appear; but they refused to attend, without a safe conduct, and hostages for their security; and on their refusal, they were banished the kingdom, and the combination against them was so strong, that they found themselves suddenly abandoned by their principal adherents, and were compelled to submit to the sentence imposed on them. Godwin retired to the earl of Flanders, father-in-law of his son Tostig, and Harold sailed for Ireland, where he hoped to meet with assistance; and to completely deprive them of all hopes of ever returning, the king disposed of all their posts, the chief of which was conferred on Alfgar, son of Leofric. Edward was not contented with being freed from Godwin, but also confined the queen in the nunnery of Wharwel, in Hampshire, of which his sister was abbess.

Godwin, who considered himself oppressed, was not long without endeavouring to reinstate himself; and the earl of Flanders furnishing him with some ships, he infested the eastern coasts of England, whilst Harold, his eldest son, harassed the western. But these feeble attempts were to little purpose; and he was obliged to return to Flanders, where, for two years together, he endeavoured to persuade the earl to lend him a powerful assistance. Baldwin being at length prevailed on, granted him an aid capable of making a formidable attack; and Harold also equipped a large number of ships in Ireland. Edward having intelligence of these proceedings, fitted out a fleet with great expedition, the command of which was given to Randolph of Mantes, his nephew, and a chieftain named Odda; but whether they were deficient in duty or conduct, or were disgraced through intrigues, which history has not discovered, Edward on a sudden removed them from the command of the fleet; and this alteration, and the reducing some of the inferior officers, raised such discontent among the sailors, that they deserted in crowds; and the royal ships not being in a condition to keep the sea, were brought up the Thames in order to be newly manned. Godwin having information of this disorder, put to sea immediately, and made a descent on the Isle of Wight, where he extorted great sums from the inhabitants, whilst he waited for his son Harold to join him; and after their junction, they sailed up the Thames, and advanced towards London, where the king's fleet lay. Edward was desirous to go himself with such ships as were ready, and try the fortune of a battle; but his council opposed it; and the earl, who was informed of the disposition of the council, behaved in a very submissive manner to the king, who was prevailed on by the principal lords, and especially Stigand, bishop of Winchester, a friend of Godwin's, to receive him into favour again; and he agreed that he should be acquitted by the general assembly of the kingdom, of the murder of Prince Alfred, which he was charged with again, on condition he should give hostages for his good behaviour for the future. Godwin submitting to the king's terms, put into his hands his son Ulnoth, and his grandson Hacune, who were immediately sent into Normandy, Edward not thinking he could secure them in England; and the earl and his sons were restored to their estates and dignities, and the king released and received the queen. Godwin's disgrace seemed only to have served to render him more powerful and formidable.

On the ratification of this agreement between the king and the earl, the archbishop of Canterbury retired to the monastery of Jumiege, in Normandy; and shortly after his departure, was outlawed by a general assembly. Stigand was made archbishop in his place, on supposition that the see was become vacant by his banishment; but the court of Rome would not sanction this arrangement.

The court of England enjoying a profound quiet after Godwin's return, William the Bastard, duke of Normandy, visited Edward; and according to some historians, it was during this visit that Edward made the will on which the Norman duke afterwards founded his claim to the throne of England; but it is most probable that he did not actually make a will, but contented himself with giving the duke some verbal promise.

About this period Godwin died suddenly, as he sat at table with the king; and Harold, his eldest son, succeeded him in all his powers and honours.

The death of Godwin did not afford much relief to the weak and placid king. Harold had the same friends, the same creatures, and the same interest as the earl his father; and the only difference between the father and the son was, that the latter was of a more polished and easy nature, less arrogant, and more submissive to the king. His abilities were equal, if not superior, to his father's.

The cessation of hostilities with foreign potentates which had lasted during this reign, was a little disturbed by a short war with Macbeth, king of Scotland, who had usurped the throne from Malcolm, having first murdered Duncan. Edward espoused the cause of Malcolm, and commissioned Siward, earl of Northumberland, to restore him to his kingdom, who in one decisive battle routed and slew Macbeth. From such meagre narrations, on which the historian can scarcely state the bare circumstances of the war, the genius of Shakespeare has furnished a drama so vivid in its details, and so powerful in its effect, that the actions and character of Macbeth are as familiar to us as those of Cromwell or Napoleon. Siward had scarcely concluded this war, when he was seized with a fatal distemper; and when he found he was dying, the old warrior rose, and causing his armour to be put on, expired in that posture, declaring it dishonourable for a brave man to expire in his bed.

After the death of Siward, the government of Northumberland was conferred on Tostig, brother of Harold, Edward not having resolution enough to refuse him that favour, though he had every reason to dread the advancement of that turbulent and ambitious family.

The personal merit and popular manners of Harold daily procured him multitudes of adherents. He had married the duke of Mercia's daughter, but Algar his brother-in-law behaved very coldly towards him. The latter, who was of a restless and violent character, had entered into a dangerous conspiracy with Griffin, king of Wales, which being discovered, he was accused of treason, and condemned to banishment; and he retired to his friend Griffin, who received him with cordiality, and cherished his discontent. Some time after they made an inroad together into Herefordshire, and defeated Randolph of Mantes, earl of that county, who had attempted to drive them thence; and encouraged by this success, they began to make further advances, when they were met by Harold, who stopped their career. A peace being the consequence of this victory, Harold made use of all his interest to obtain a pardon for Algar, and got him at length restored to his estate and honours; by which unusual act of generosity, he gained his friendship, and exceedingly increased the esteem which the people already entertained towards him. The reputation acquired by Harold in his last expedition, his generosity to Algar, his courteous manner, his beneficent temper, gained him the hearts of the people; and it began to be the public discourse, that as the king had no heirs, Harold had the most claim worthy to succeed him. The affection of the English for the earl, very naturally mortified Edward; who seems originally to have intended to leave the crown to the duke of Normandy, as he never thought of recalling home his nephew, in Hungary, until he found Harold aspired to the crown, and that his popularity as an Englishman would prevent any foreigner from successfully attempting the throne. Immediately he became convinced of this, he sent for his nephew Edward, son of Edmund Ironside, out of Hungary; who arrived in England in 1057, bringing with him his young son Edgar, and Margaret and Christiana his daughters, who were all three born in Hungary. His arrival diffused great joy through the nation, and he was universally considered as the king's presumptive heir; esteem for Harold giving place to affection for the royal family. There was no contesting his right to succeed his uncle, since, had he not been absent when it was debated who should sit on the throne after Hardicanute, he would have been unquestionably preferred even to King Edward himself; but this prince, who seemed designed by all parties for the crown, died soon after his arrival in England, leaving his just, though empty title to Edgar his son, surnamed Atheling.*

Leofric, duke of Mercia, died in the same year; of whom historians have given a high character; but more especially of Godiva his wife; of whom it is related, that in order to free the inhabitants of Coventry from a heavy tax laid on them by her husband, she readily consented to a very extraordinary condition, on which the earl promised to ease them of their burden, namely, that she should ride naked from one end of the town to the other. This condition gave the burghers little hopes of being relieved; but Godiva performed it, covering her body with her hair, and commanding all persons to keep within doors, and from their windows, on pain of death. Notwithstanding this severe penalty, it is said, there was one who could not forbear peeping, but his curiosity cost him his life; and in memory of this event, there was long a statue of a man looking out of a window, always kept in a certain house at Coventry. Algar succeeded to his father's earldom, by Harold's interest, who earnestly interceded for him.

* Truly noble, to denote his being of royal blood. His father, Prince Edward, surnamed the Outlaw, was buried at St. Paul's, London.

Harold about this time visited the duke of Normandy, but for what particular purpose or what circumstances actually took place between these two powerful chieftains, are matters of great dispute; and no subject in the whole of our early history is more involved in obscurity than this. Some historians say Harold visited Normandy to regain his two brothers, who had been placed as hostages for the good behaviour of their father the Earl Godwin; others, that he was dispatched on some mission by Edward the king, who desired that William of Normandy should find some means of detaining him, and thus rid him of such a powerful and dangerous subject; and others again say, that Harold was driven by a storm on the coast of Picardy, and was imprisoned by the Count Ponthieu, and released by the intercession of William, whom he therefore visited. But whatever was the cause of his visiting Normandy, it appears that William revealed to him his design on the crown of England on the death of Edward, and engaged him by the most sacred vows to assist him in this project; and it is said Harold swore in the most solemn manner at the altar to comply with his desires: and in order to render the compact more binding, historians add that, William had conveyed some most precious relics under the altar whereon Harold pledged his word, which he afterwards produced to him. These transactions are most curiously and ingeniously displayed in the famous Bayeux tapestry; which was embroidered by Queen Matilda and her workwomen on white linen cloth, or canvass; it is two hundred and twelve feet in length, and one foot eleven inches in breadth. The figures are in their proper colours, worked in the manner of samplers in worsted, and in a style not unlike what we see on china and japan ware: those of the men, more particularly, being without the least symmetry or proportion.

It appears strange that two powerful and talented competitors, who, in other respects, were cautious and politic in the extreme, should thus have betrayed their most secret and important designs to each other; and it is therefore very evident many important details of this transaction are lost to us. Perhaps William hoped to secure Harold's aid, and prevent his competition by promise of an extraordinary share in the advantages of the sovereignty of the country, and Harold, while in his power, dissimulated and acceded to his views. Perhaps this interview was the effect of some weak endeavour of the king to unite these two ambitious nobles, so opposed by interest and temper to each other.

But whatever the motives for this compact were Harold, on his return to England, pursued his own, interest regardless of it; and finding his popularity greater than ever, pursued every possible mode to secure the crown on its demise. The feeble king in his supineness perceived not these intrigues; Prince Edward, the rightful heir, was too young and too unprotected to offer any effective opposition; and his great competitor, William of Normandy, too distant to be able to counteract his deep and widelaid schemes: and Harold therefore had ample opportunity to pursue his ambitious projects.

The Welsh renewing their incursions under the conduct of Griffin their king, Harold and his brother Tostig joined their forces to repulse them; and were so fortunate in their expedition, that after several advantages gained upon the Welsh, they compelled them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. Griffin being afterwards restored, and renewing the war with the English, Harold marched to the frontiers, and struck such a terror into the Welsh, that they sent him the head of their king; and this event, which proved how formidable Harold was to the enemies of the state, confirmed the English in their opinion, that he, who knew so well how to defend it, deserved to wear the crown.

Tostig, his brother, who had been appointed earl of Northumbria, so alienated the people by exactions and atrocities that they revolted and expelled him; and Morcar, the son of Algar, was chosen by them for their earl; who led them southward and was joined by armed insurgents from Wales and other counties. Harold was ordered to chastise them, and restore his brother; but as soon as he approached the borders, the Northumbrians sent deputies to inform him of the reasons of their insurrection; and finding this affair related chiefly to Tostig, and that the king was not directly concerned in it, he sent an impartial account to the court, and not only obtained a pardon for the Northumbrians, but interceded so that Morcar was confirmed in his earldom; by which politic proceeding, he gained the affection of the northern people, and contracted a friendship with Morcar, which was necessary for the execution of his projects. Tostig fled with his wife and friends into Flanders to Earl Baldwin his father-in-law.

Whilst Harold was thus preparing his way to the crown, Edward was wholly employed about the structure of the church and monastery of Westminster, on which he expended the money that he had vowed to appropriate to a journey to Rome, which was dispensed with by the pope upon that condition. There had formerly been in the same place, called Thorney by the Saxons, a famous pagan temple, sacred to Apollo, which Sebert, king of Essex, on embracing the Gospel, converted into a Christian church, which was destroyed by the Danes. This church having been long buried in its ruins, Edward undertook to rebuild it, with an adjoining monastery, which, from its lying west of London, was called Westminster;* and a city was built round it by degrees, which now forms one of the most splendid portions of the metropolis, and retains the name of the monastery. The church and monastery being finished about the latter end of the year 1065, Edward was desirous the dedication should be performed in a very solemn manner; and for this purpose he summoned a general assembly to meet at London, at which were present all the bishops and chieftains of the kingdom; but at this very time he was seized with a sudden and fatal illness; and when he found that his dissolution was approaching, his only care was to finish the ceremony for which the chief men were assembled; and he avoided making any regulation as to the succession; the right of which was manifestly in Prince Edgar his nephew.

Harold, who was exceedingly popular, was not idle; and as almost all the nobles of the kingdom, both spiritual and temporal, were then assembled at London, he found means to induce them to decide in his favour, and come to a resolution of sending deputies to the dying king to entreat him to name a successor; which deputies had orders to insinuate, that in case he nominated any but Harold, he would infallibly involve the kingdom in endless troubles; a measure inconsistent with his wisdom, and the affection he had ever expressed for his people. Edward, not being then in a condition to examine a proposal of this nature, replied, that since they were met in a body, he left it to them to choose the person they judged most worthy to rule over them, and dying a few moments after, on the eve of the Epiphany, left the succession as unsettled at his death as it was during his life.

Edward, who was born at Gislip, near Oxford, reigned twenty-four years, without ever suffering any misfortune from foreign enemies; but he cannot, however, be said to have reigned happily, since he lived in continual apprehension of the overgrown power of Godwin and his family. His mild and peaceable temper procured him some tranquillity; and had he attempted to humble Godwin and lessen Harold's power, he would certainly have been involved in dissensions, from whence he would have found it difficult to extricate himself. He was remarkable neither for his virtues nor vices; and his natural capacity was exceedingly feeble. His piety has been very much extolled, and acquired him the title of Confessor; but we do not find he was any sufferer on account of religion, unless we consider as a sort of martyrdom, the mortifications he voluntarily imposed upon himself from a religious motive. It is certain he was very charitable, and expended in alms the sums usually lavished by other princes upon their pleasures; which joined to his easy good nature, of which he gave from time to time uncommon instances, made him pass for a saint among the people, and particularly among the monks, who reaped great advantages from his liberal disposition. The latter have not been satisfied with extolling his virtues, but have also canonized his faults of which we need no other proof than that of his own historian, or rather panegyrist, who attributes his voluntary chastity to a vow made before his marriage. This writer assures us, Edward espoused Editha, daughter of Godwin, purely to exercise his virtue by a continual temptation; but it is easily perceived that he acted from a very different motive, since he parted with his wife the moment he thought he could do it with safety. However, the opinion of his sanctity taking by degrees deep root in the minds of the people, he was canonized by Pope Alexander III.,

* It was dedicated to St. Peter. This fabric of Edward's was demolished by Henry III., about one hundred and sixty years after, who erected a new one, which was fifty years in building. The abbots very much enlarged it on the west side, and Henry VII. added to the east a chapel, which Leland calls the miracle of the world. Edward was buried on the day after his death, in his newly-dedicated church.

under the name of Edward the Confessor, about two hundred years after his death.

We are told he was favoured with several revelations, with the gift of prophecy, and many other miraculous powers; amongst which was the power of curing the king's-evil, which is the most extraordinary of all miracles, it having been supposed to be an hereditary one; and successive sovereigns, until George I., have, with the exception of William III., laid claim to it.

King Edward was good-natured to a weakness; and many instances are recorded of his easy and placid nature; but the two following stories are the greatest favourites of his historians. One day, having lain down upon his bed, a domestic, who did not know he was in the room, stole some money out of a chest he found open, which the king let him carry off without saying a word; but on the boy's quickly returning to make a second attempt, the king called to him without the least anger, "Sirrah, you had best be satisfied with what you have got, for if my chamberlain comes and catches you, he will not only take away all you have stolen, but whip you severely." Another time, when he was hunting, a countryman maliciously spoiling his sport, he galloped up to him, and said to him in anger, "By our Lady, I would be revenged on thee if it was in my power."

Edward was the last king of Egbert's race, though not the last Saxon king; and had he not preposterously abstained from conversing with his queen, he might perhaps have had children, and thereby prevented a revolution, which involved the English in slavery. In person, he was tall and well made; his hair and skin were white, and his complexion rosy.

Before his reign, the West-Saxon, Mercian, and Danish laws were observed in England, namely, the first in Wessex, the second in Mercia, and the last in Northumbria; but he reduced them all into one body; and from that time they became common to all England, under the name of the laws of Edward, to distinguish them from those of the Normans, introduced afterwards.

HAROLD II.

If the chieftains assembled to appoint a successor to Edward had been swayed only by justice, equity, and the ancient customs of the kingdom, they would not have long debated to know to whom the crown had devolved. Edgar Atheling was the only prince of the family of their ancient kings, and consequently, the only person who had a right to lay claim to the crown; but Harold had so well contrived his measures, that he was unanimously elected, without any regard to the right of the lawful heir. The duke of Normandy's pretensions, grounded on the late king's promise, do not seem to have been considered at all; and it is certain he had never openly declared his design of aspiring to the crown of England; and accordingly, the English lords might be ignorant of the matter, or at least pretend to be so; but even supposing they had been informed of his pretensions, it would have served only to furnish them with an additional motive to place on the throne a king more capable than Edgar Atheling, of defending the kingdom against the attacks of a foreign prince.

The manner of Harold's succeeding to the crown is variously related by historians: several affirm, he was elected with one common voice, and without any constraint, by the Wittena-Gemot then assembled, and crowned the day after his election by the archbishop of York; but others say, he usurped the crown by compelling the great council to elect him, after extorting his nomination from the late king just as he was dying; and there are even some who look upon this election as a fiction, affirming, Harold, without troubling himself about the consent of the nobles or people, put the crown on his head himself without any formality. The reason of this diversity of statement among the historians, proceeds from their espousing either the right of Harold, or of the duke of Normandy, as if Prince Edgar's claim was to be reckoned as nothing; whereas, in truth, he alone had a right to succeed to the crown. But as among this variety of opinions there is considerable danger of being swayed by the passions and prejudices of the historians, rather than by justice and equity, it will not be amiss to explain the matter, by laying before the reader what might be alleged on the claims of each of the three competitors.

Of Prince Edgar, it suffices to say, that he was the sole prince of the royal race. It is true, his being born out of the kingdom might be objected against him; but as Prince Edward, his father, was not legally banished, his being compelled by Canute to live in exile ought not to have prejudiced his son's right.

The duke of Normandy can hardly be imagined to have aspired to the crown of England without some foundation, and yet it cannot be conceived upon what title he supported his pretension; so great is the diversity of opinions upon this subject. Some historians tell us, he was invited over by the English to free them from the tyranny of Harold; others, that Edward, when in Normandy, promised him, if ever he came to the crown, to make him his heir; and several even affirm, that Edward appointed him his successor by his last will; and some even assure us, this will was confirmed in Edward's lifetime by the general assembly of the nation; but this document was never produced. Neither does it appear that William ever founded his claim upon any such thing, as if it were known, or he had it in his hands. In all probability, therefore, the foundation he rested on, was some verbal promise made him by Edward when he was in England; and most probably it was in consequence of this promise, that he required Harold not to enter into any competition with him. Had the English done Edgar justice, and placed him on the throne, Duke William would not, perhaps, have attempted upon so trifling a pretension, to wrest the crown from a prince to whom of right it belonged; but he had only to contend with Harold, who, although a private individual, had procured himself the crown by indirect practices, and without any shadow of right; and accordingly, setting aside Prince Edgar, he compared his right only with that of the usurping monarch. His interest also induced him to consider, that Edward's promise was equivalent to an election, since it was thought proper to exclude the lawful heir; to all which may be added, that he looked upon the crown of England as what he could not fail of acquiring, especially after binding Harold by an oath; and therefore, the indignation at being deceived, the desire of revenge, and chiefly his ambition, the root of the quarrel, all concurred to inspire him with a resolution to make an attempt upon the English crown, in spite of all opposition. Persuaded as he was, that he had no less right than Harold, he thought he might use force to wrest the crown from a usurper, without any fear of meeting that violent opposition which would have arisen in favour of an hereditary claimant to the throne.

Harold's right ought also to be considered under a double view; first, with regard to the duke of Normandy, and then with regard to Prince Edgar. If we examine the election of this king, in opposition to the duke, we find nothing but what was regular and according to established form, and against which the duke could not have any just reason to object; and it is certain, supposing Edward had nominated William his successor, either by will or otherwise, the nomination would have been of no force, unless confirmed by the assembly of states; and the election therefore of Harold was perfectly legal, at least with regard to the duke of Normandy, since it was made by the assembly-general, whose power William himself must have had resort to.

After Harold was crowned, he was universally acknowledged as king by the English, but he was surrounded by many foreign enemies; and his brother Tostig, who was not ignorant of the duke of Normandy's intentions, with whom he had contracted a strict friendship, on account of their marrying two sisters, daughters of the earl of Flanders, went to him to concert measures with him against Harold. There is no doubt but William encouraged him to execute his designs; but it does not appear that he furnished him with any money, troops, or ships; all which he himself required for his intended invasion. Probably, therefore, it was the earl of Flanders, his father-in-law, who supplied Tostig with ships, by means of which he infested the English coasts, and plundered the Isle of Wight, and afterwards landed some troops at Sandwich; when being informed the king was marching towards him, he set sail for the north, entered the Humber with his little fleet, and made a descent on Yorkshire, and committed ravages as if he had been in an enemy's country. Harold, not thinking it advisable to leave the southern parts, commissioned Earl Morcar to go against his brother; who, having been made governor of Northumbria in the place of Tostig, was particularly interested in putting a stop to his incursions.

Harold remained at London, that he might control Edgar's party, and prevent them from exciting any dissensions upon account of that young prince; who seemed to him, at that time, to be his most dangerous competitor. He was sensible the injustice done Edgar sat heavy upon the minds of those who were well affected to the ancient royal family; and accordingly, to prevent their discontent from breaking out into action, he caressed the prince as well as those of his party; and even insinuated from time to time, that he had accepted the crown merely on account of Edgar's youth, as if he meant to restore it to the prince when he was of age to govern; and with this view, he created him earl of Oxford, and seemed to take a very particular care of his education, as it were to qualify him for the government of the kingdom.

Morcar, meanwhile, accompanied by his brother Edwin, earl of Chester, marched with all expedition against Tostig, who was now on the south side of the Humber; where he came upon him unexpectedly in Lincolnshire, and put his little army to flight, compelling him to fly to his ships. Tostig, finding he could do nothing considerable with so small a number of forces, steered towards Scotland, in expectation of assistance from thence; but perceiving the king of Scotland was not disposed to support him, he put to sea again, with design to make another descent on England; but being prevented by contrary winds, he was driven on the coast of Norway, where he found the assistance he so eagerly sought.

Harold Harfager, king of Norway, had lately taken some of the Orcades,* which belonged to Scotland, and was fitting out a more numerous fleet in order to carry on his conquests. Tostig being informed of this prince's designs, represented to him, that a favourable opportunity offered to conquer England, if he would but turn his arms that way; and Harfager wanted not much solicitation to engage in this project; and he immediately resolved to employ all his forces in making the attempt.

Whilst the king of Norway was making his preparations, the duke of Normandy was no less seriously taking means to wrest from Harold a crown he had so long been in expectation of; he sent ambassadors to Harold, to require him to deliver him up the crown, and in case of refusal, to charge him with the breach of his oath, and declare war against him. Harold replied to the effect that William had no right to the crown of England: that supposing the late king had disposed of it in his favour, a thing the English knew nothing of, it was contrary to the laws of the land, which allow not the king to give away the crown according to his inclination, much less to a foreigner: that he had been elected by those who had the power of placing the kings on the throne, and therefore could not resign it, without the breach of that trust reposed in him by the English: that the oath, the violation of which he was charged with, having been extorted from him at a time when he had not the power to help himself, it was null and void, by the laws of all the nations in the world: and in conclusion, that he knew how to defend his right against any person that durst dispute it with him.

Harold finding he was likely to have so formidable an adversary, endeavoured to make himself popular. He lessened the taxes, and caused justice to be duly and impartially administered, and left nothing that could confirm his subjects in the esteem and regard they already manifested towards

* They are now called the Isles of Orkney. Whatever the ancients have said of their number, there are but twenty-six inhabited, the rest are used only for pasturage, and are called Holmes. Orkney lies north of Caithness, in the latitude of fifty-nine and sixty degrees. Eagles are in such plenty here and do so much mischief, that whoever kills one, is entitled to a hen from every house in the parish. The largest of these isles is Mainland, anciently Pomona, twenty-four miles long, whereon stands the only remarkable town, called Kirkwall, famous for St. Magnus's church, and the bishop of Orkney's palace. The isles were first inhabited by the Picts, who kept possession of them till destroyed in 839, by Kenneth II. of Scotland, from which time they were subject to the Scots, till delivered up by Donald Ban, the usurper, in 1099, to Magnus king of Norway; but in 1263, they were surrendered to Alexander III., king of Scotland, by treaty with St. Magnus, king of Norway; who is said to have built the stately cathedral at Kirkwall. They have since remained annexed to the crown of Scotland. In Hoy, one of these isles, lies a stone called Dwarfie-stone, thirty-six feet long, eighteen broad, and nine thick, hollowed by art with a square hole of two feet high, for the entry. Within, at one end, is a bed big enough for two men, excellently hewn out of the stone, with a pillow; at the other end is a couch, and in the middle a hearth for a fire, with a hole over it for the chimney. Orkney gives title to an earl.

him; and his labour was not in vain, for the English were enthusiastic in his cause.

William's chief difficulty was to raise a sum of money sufficient for the charge of so great an undertaking; and his first method was, to convene an assembly of the states of Normandy, to obtain their concurrence. But he found them unwilling to comply with his desires; and this conduct destroying his hopes of raising money in a public way, he resorted to an expedient, which succeeded; namely, to borrow money of private persons; and gaining some of the chief persons, the rest were inspired with an emulation who should be most zealous in assisting him. William Fitzosborne undertook to fit out forty ships at his own expense; and every one according to his ability subscribed; so that the duke by this method raised more money than he could have done by a public tax; but as this mode did not raise sufficient, he engaged several of the neighbouring princes to furnish him with troops and transports, on condition of their having lands assigned them in England after the conquest; and he even demanded the assistance of France; but it was not the interest of that crown that he should become more powerful. Fortunately for him, King Philip, who was then a minor, under the care of the earl of Flanders, obstructed not his proceedings, which a prince who had been old enough to have known his own interests, would infallibly have done. It is true indeed, the court of France endeavoured to dissuade the duke from this enterprise, but without success.

William, who was too wise not to be sensible of the weakness of his title, omitted nothing that might serve to give it some colour of justice; and with this view he procured the pope's approbation of his undertaking, to whom, it is said, he made a promise of holding the kingdom of England of the apostolic see. However this be, the pope very heartily espoused his cause, and sent him a consecrated banner, as a mark of his approbation; and moreover, willing that all Christians should know that religion was concerned in this affair, he solemnly excommunicated all that should dare oppose the duke in the execution of this project. This approbation was of great service, as it furnished him with means to justify his intended expedition, and at the same time removed the scruples of such as were to engage in his cause. But it had not the same effect in England; for whether the English knew nothing of the pope's excommunication, or looked upon it as a gross piece of partiality, it did not prevent Harold from equipping a large fleet, and raising a numerous army, with which he resolutely expected his enemy.

The charge of keeping so considerable an armament, could not but be very burdensome to the people, a thing the king would have been glad to avoid. After he had some months expected in vain the arrival of William, finding he did not appear, and the autumnal equinox approaching, he imagined, pursuant to some false information he had received, that the duke had deferred his expedition till the spring; and accordingly, thought he might safely lay up his ships for the winter, and disband his troops, to save an unnecessary expense.

As Harold was returning to London out of Kent, where he had given his last orders for disbanding the army, news was brought him that the king of Norway, accompanied with Earl Tostig, was entering the Tyne, with a fleet of five hundred sail. Surprised at this unexpected invasion, he hastily drew his army together again, but before they were ready to march, the Norwegians had made a great progress; and having sacked the counties on both sides the Tyne, they put to sea, and entering the Humber, landed their forces on the north side, and ravaged the country with inexpressible cruelties. Morcar and Edwin, who were upon the spot, endeavoured to stop their career, with some troops levied in haste; but were so completely defeated, that their whole army was destroyed. Flushed with this success, the Norwegians advanced towards York, and laid siege to the city, which they quickly became masters of; the inhabitants, who were unprovided with things necessary for their defence, choosing rather to surrender upon terms, than expose themselves to certain ruin.

Harold having drawn his army together, advanced with all expedition, to give the Norwegians battle, who having left their fleet in the Humber, were marching towards the north, to complete the reduction of Northumberland, before they proceeded to other conquests; and as they marched but slowly, he came up with them at Stanford-bridge, on the river Derwent, a little below York. The Norwegians, upon his approach, intrenched themselves in so advantageous a situation that it seemed impossible to force them; being posted on the other side of the river, where there was no attacking them but by the bridge, of which they were masters. Notwithstanding this, Harold, who was very sensible how much it behoved him to come to an engagement, ordered the bridge to be attacked without delay; and the Norwegians stoutly defended it, but could not withstand the efforts of the English, though animated by the astonishing valour of one of their own men, who defended the bridge alone against the English army for a considerable time. At length, the brave Norwegian being slain, Harold became master of the bridge, and passed his army over; when furiously falling upon the enemy, after an obstinate fight, he entirely routed them. There had never been seen in England an engagement between two such numerous armies, each having no less than threescore thousand men; and the battle, which was consequently very sanguinary, lasted from seven in the morning till three in the afternoon. Harfager and Tostig were both slain, and Harold obtained a complete victory.

Of the whole army that came from Norway in five hundred ships, the remains were carried off by Olaüs, son of Harfager, in twenty vessels, by the conqueror's leave. The booty which was taken upon this occasion was very great, since there was found in the camp all that the Norwegians had brought from home, and all they had plundered in the kingdom. Harold was so exceedingly impolitic as to retain the spoil to himself; as he considered, the expending this booty in the war against the duke of Normandy, would very much ease the people, whose affection he was desirous to conciliate; but it raised such discontent in his army, as seriously injured him afterwards; and it would have been far better if he had secured the hearts of his soldiers by a timely liberality.

Whilst Harold was busied in the north, in rectifying the disorders occasioned by the Norwegian invasion, the duke of Normandy, who had long waited for a wind at St. Valery, set sail about the end of September, and had a speedy passage to Pevensey* in Sussex. It is affirmed, that in leaping ashore he fell, at which one of the soldiers said merrily, See, our duke is taking possession of England; which the duke took as a good omen. Nobody appearing to oppose his landing, his first care was to erect a fort near the place where he disembarked, to favour his retreat in case of necessity; some historians, however, assert that he sent his ships back to Normandy, to let his army see they had nothing to trust to but their valour. After some days' stay at Pevensey, he marched along the shore as far as Hastings, where he built a stronger fort than the former, resolving there to expect his enemy, of whom he had no intelligence; and it was here that he published a manifesto, showing the reasons of his coming into England; namely, first, to revenge the death of Prince Alfred, brother of King Edward; a frivolous pretence, since Earl Godwin, the contriver of that murder, was dead, and Harold never charged with it. Secondly, to restore Robert, archbishop of Canterbury to his see; a no better reason than the first, for Robert was banished by the general assembly in Edward's reign; and consequently, the present king could not be blamed for it; but it is very likely this article was inserted in the manifesto on the pope's account, to serve as a cover for his partiality to the duke. Thirdly, and principally, to offer the English his assistance to punish Harold for presuming to seize the crown, without any right, and directly contrary to his oath.

It is to be observed, in this manifesto no mention is made either of Edward's will, or verbal promise, and that his silence on that head renders this third motive very trifling. For, without such a will or promise, what pretence could the duke of Normandy have to concern himself with the affairs of England? Some affirm he founded his right on his kindred to Edward; but he was no way related to the late king, but by Emma of Normandy, who had never any title to the crown; and besides, he was himself illegitimate. But he did not rely so much on the justice of his manifesto, as on the strength of his army. He was very sensible, if he obtained the victory, his reasons would be readily admitted. Meanwhile, not to terrify the English, he charged his army to injure none, but such as were actually in arms against him; but neither this precaution nor his promises gained him any friends; for the English could not conceive upon what foundation he had entered the kingdom with an army, or what advantage any one could have by taking his part.

The news of the landing of the Normans was rapidly conveyed to Harold, who was still in the north, little expecting this invasion till the spring. As soon as he was informed of it, he marched to give these new enemies battle, whom he did not account more formidable than the Norwegians; and by hasty marches, he proceeded to London, where, upon a review, he found his army very much diminished, not only by the battle of Stamford, but by unusual desertions, occasioned by the discontent of his troops. All the nobility of the kingdom, however, repaired to him, and offered their assistance on an occasion where it was no less their interest than his to repel the foreigners; and whilst he expected at London some of his troops who were to follow him, William sent ambassadors to require him to resign the crown, and to charge him with breach of oath. He was so moved at the arrogance wherewith the ambassadors addressed him, that he could hardly refrain from violence towards them; he, however, did govern his passion; but returned a menacing and insulting message. The duke patiently heard what Harold ordered to be said to him, and dismissed the ambassadors without any answer.

Meantime, Harold having drawn all his forces together, encamped about seven miles from the Norman army, with a resolution to give them battle; and whilst the two armies lay thus near one another, spies were continually sent out on both sides, each leader being equally desirous to know the strength and posture of his enemies. But the English spies magnified in such a manner the number and discipline of the Normans, that the principal officers began to doubt of the success of the war; and Gurth, a brother of Harold, took occasion from these reports, to persuade him to defer the battle. Duke William perceiving by all Harold's motions, that he was bent to give him battle, advanced a little to seize an advantageous post, where he could conveniently draw up his army.

Whilst they were preparing for a battle, which was to decide the fate of both princes, William seemed to abate something of his confidence; and it is to be presumed, the thoughts of a battle in an enemy's country, where his loss would be irretrievable, inspired him with some dread of the issue. Before they engaged, he sent the king by the hands of a certain monk, the four following proposals, for him to take his choice. The first was, to resign the crown, as he said he was bound by oath to do. The second was, an offer to return into Normandy, provided Harold would do him homage for the kingdom of England. The third was, to refer the differences to the judgment of the apostolic see. And the last proposition was, to decide the contest by single combat. It is not surprising that Harold rejected these four proposals, as they were all so preposterously advantageous to the duke. The two first were an insult to Harold; and although the third might seem at first sight something fairer, it was in reality equally partial, the pope having already declared in favour of the duke. As for the fourth, the advantage preponderated entirely on the duke's side, since in a single combat, he hazarded only his person, whereas Harold ventured his crown with his life; and the victory would have procured the duke of Normandy a noble kingdom, whereas it would have only acquired the king the bare advantage of getting rid of an invader. Harold's politic answer therefore was, "God should determine on the morrow the justice of their rights."

The English spent the whole night in carousing and singing, as if they were sure of the victory; while the Normans, on the contrary, were employed in preparing for the battle, and offering up prayers for success. On the 14th of October, Harold's birthday, but much more memorable for one of the greatest events that ever happened in England, the two armies engaged. In the front of the English stood the Kentish men, a privilege they had enjoyed ever since the time of the heptarchy; and Harold placed himself in the centre, and would fight on foot, that his men might be the more encouraged, by seeing their king exposed to equal danger with the meanest soldier. The Normans were drawn up in three bodies. Montgomery and Fitzosborne conducted the first; Geoffrey Martel commanded the second; and the duke himself headed the body of reserve, to succour those who should most want it.* The Normans began the fight with a volley of arrows, which being shot upward, were like a thick cloud over the heads of the foremost body of the English; and as their ranks were very close, the arrows did great execution. The English not being used to this way of fighting, were at first put into some little disorder; and the Normans, anxious to take advantage of it, vigorously attacked them. But the English falling directly into good order again, gave them so warm a reception, that they were obliged to draw back and take breath; but immediately renewed the attack, and met with as brave a resistance as before; nor was it in the power of either to break the other's ranks; the English choosing rather to die than give way, and the Normans being ashamed to retreat. Both sides fought stoutly for a considerable time, without either gaining ground; and the presence of their leaders animating the soldiers, they every where fought with equal bravery, without the least signs of advantage on either side; and we may judge of the valour of the troops in both armies by the length of the fight, which began at seven in the morning, and lasted till night.

There is so much confusion in the accounts of the historians, that to give a clear idea of the battle is not easy; but all historians unanimously agree, that two circumstances gave the Normans the victory. The fight had lasted all day, and the success was still very uncertain; when William devised a stratagem, which made victory incline to his side. Perceiving there was no breaking the ranks of the English, he ordered his troops to retreat as they fought, as if they were discouraged; but, at the same time, to be very careful to keep their ranks. This order being executed, the English looked upon the enemies' retreat as the beginning of their victory; and possessed with this notion, they encouraged one another with reiterated shouts, to press the retiring enemies. Their eagerness made them break their ranks, that they might push them with the greater impetuosity, imagining they were upon the point of taking to flight; when the Normans, finding their stratagem had taken effect, stood their ground, and by a discipline they had long been used to, closed their ranks, and falling on the disordered English, made a terrible slaughter of them. Harold, enraged to see the victory, which a moment before he thought himself sure of, snatched out of his hands, used his utmost endeavours to rally his troops that were in extreme disorder; and his labour was not altogether in vain, for at last he drew up, on a rising ground at a little distance from the field of battle, a good body of foot, which became at length very considerable, by being continually joined by the flying troops. The duke of Normandy's victory being yet far from complete, whilst so strong a body of the English kept together, he ordered them to be attacked with great fury; but the English received the onset with such bravery, and the Normans lost such numbers of their men, that the fortune of the day seemed still very doubtful. The approach of the night, and the resolution of the English, making the duke despair of penetrating their ranks, he began to think himself conquered since he was not entirely victorious; and probably, the English army might have retreated in good order, by favour of the night, if Harold could have resolved to leave his enemy in possession of the field of battle, at a time when the loss on both sides were nearly equal. But apprehending his retreat might be prejudicial to his affairs, and derogatory to his reputation, he determined to maintain his post, and not give the enemy that advantage; and he was also in hopes he should be able to rally his whole army during the night, and renew the battle the next morning.

Meantime, the duke perceiving the night was likely to rob him of the advantage of a complete victory, made one effort more to drive the English from their post; and in this last onset, Harold was slain by an arrow shot into his brains; and his troops, disheartened at this fatal accident, began to give ground, and betake themselves to flight. Thus Harold's death was the second circumstance that procured the Normans the victory. The English were entirely routed, and were pursued as long as the day lasted; and in this pursuit it was, that a terrible slaughter was made of the fugitives, the conquerors killing without mercy all they could overtake, to save the trouble of guarding the prisoners. The darkness of the night, however, saved a good part of the English army, who retreated under the conduct of Morcar and Edwin. These two thanes, who had all along firmly adhered to Harold, seeing he was slain, as well as Gurth and Lewin, his brothers, submitted at length to circumstances, and retreated, having given, the whole day, proofs of their valour. This long and bloody battle cost the duke of Normandy six thousand men; but the English lost a much greater number.*

William, at the height of his wishes, gave orders for the whole army to fall on their knees, and return God thanks for so signal a victory. After which, he caused his tent to be pitched in the field of battle, and spent the residue of the night among the slain. On the morrow, he ordered his own dead to be buried, and gave the English peasants leave to do the same office for the others; and the bodies of the king and his brothers being found, he sent them to Gith, their mother, who gave them as honourable a burial as the circumstance of the time would permit, in Waltham-abbey, founded by the king, her son.†

Thus fell Harold, with his sword in his hand, in defence not only of his own, but of his country's cause, against the ambition of the duke of

* This battle was fought near Heathfield, in Sussex, in the place where the town of Battle now stands, so called from this day's action, wherein our modern historians say were slain above threescore thousand Englishmen.

† An ancient manuscript in the Cottonian library relates, that the king's body was difficult to be known on account of its being covered with wounds, but was at last discovered by one who had been his mistress, by the means of certain private marks known only to herself. This lady was called Swan's-neck, from her beautiful neck. The duke sent the body to his mother without any ransom, though she is said to have offered him its weight in gold. But though all others agree that Harold fell in this battle, yet Knighton, from Giraldus Cambrensis, asserts that he was not slain, but escaping, retired to a cell near St. John's church, in Chester, and died there an anchorite, as was owned by himself in his last confession when he was dying. In memory of which, Knighton says, they showed his tomb when he wrote.

* The chief of William's generals were, Eustace, earl of Bologne, William Fitz-Richard, earl of Evereux, Geoffrey, son of Rotrou, earl of Mortaigne, Robert, son of Roger, earl of Beaumont, Almeri de Touars, Hugh, earl of Etaples, Walter Giffard, Hugh Grentemesnil, and William de Warren

Normandy. The historians, who wrote in the reigns of the conqueror and his sons, have endeavoured to blacken the memory of Harold, to justify, in some measure, the ambition of the duke; but all they have said against this last Saxon king, tends only to the imputation of a breach of the oath, on which we have seen what he alleged in his own vindication. He might have been much more justly blamed for his secret practices, in procuring Prince Edgar to be excluded from the throne, who alone had a right to aspire to it. It may be said, Harold would have been more worthy of the crown, had he been less forward to obtain it. He gained the love and esteem of the English whilst he was but a private man, and did nothing, during his short reign of nine months and nine days, which tended to lessen their affection. He fought within the space of a few days, two great battles, with very different success; in the first of which, his abilities and valour procured him a signal victory over the king of Norway; and in the last, his defeat must be wholly ascribed to his ill fortune. In his personal qualities, he is described as being candid, affable, and exceedingly generous.

Harold was twice married. By his first wife, whose name is unknown, he had three sons, Edmund, Godwin, and Magnus, who retired into Ireland after the death of their father. By his second wife, Alghitha, sister of Morcar and Edwin, he had a son called Wolf, who was but a child at the time of the battle of Hastings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus; and also two daughters, of whom Gunilda, the eldest, becoming blind, passed her days in a nunnery; and the youngest was married to Waldemar, king of Russia, by whom she had a daughter, who was wife to Waldemar, king of Denmark.

Thus ended in England the empire of the Anglo-Saxons, which began above six hundred years before in the person of Hengist, the first king of Kent.

State of the Church, from Ethelred II., to the Norman Conquest.

From the beginning of the reign of Ethelred II., to the end of the empire of the Saxons, may be termed an age of ignorance, with respect to all Europe, but more especially with regard to England.

Whatever attempts have been made at various times to prove the antiquity of transubstantiation, it has never been proved to be the doctrine of the church of England, before this period; and it is certain, from the testimony of a prelate, who was at the head of the church of England, that the doctrine of transubstantiation was not introduced in the time of Ethelred II., who ascended the throne in 979.

It is not the same with regard to the invocation of the Virgin, and of the saints, since, on the contrary, it was practised in England in this very century; which is manifest from Canute the Great's charter to the abbey of Glastonbury, where there is mention made of "the Blessed Virgin, and all the other saints." But as the authority of the charters of those days are not equally admitted by all, the same thing may be proved from a public litany then read in the church; where we find, that after the invocation of the Holy Trinity, these words are thrice repeated, "O Holy Mary, pray for us:"

after which, the angels and saints were addressed by name. It is to be observed, when this practice was first introduced, the application to the Blessed Virgin and saints was not so direct: "May the Holy Virgin, the mother of God, and all the saints intercede for us," are the words in the public form of prayer used by the Anglo-Saxons, which is in Latin; and although the lessons, prayers, psalms, Lord's Prayer, and creed, are in the same language, yet at the end of each article or verse, there follows a Saxon translation in a paraphrastic style, that the people might understand what was said.

Among the canons, which go under the name of Elfric, who lived in the reign of Ethelred II., the 33d obliges priests to have by them two sorts of consecrated oil, one for children, and another for the sick; and enjoins that the sick should be always anointed upon their beds, and should confess themselves before the ceremony of anointing passed upon them, which no priest was to presume to perform till desired by the sick person. Whence it may be inferred, they did not stay till the sick were in their last agonies, before they administered the extreme unction.*

In the 33d canon, the four first general councils are put upon the same footing with the four Gospels; but those of later ages are not of so great authority; whence it is evident that the author of these canons did not think all the general councils were infallible. Had he been of this opinion, he would not have given a greater authority to the four first than to the other councils.

From the beginning of the reign of Ethelred II., to the Norman conquest, we find in the ecclesiastical history of England but two councils. Most probably, the wars with the Danes prevented the bishops from assembling more frequently, or perhaps were the occasion of the records of these conventions being lost. Both these councils, the one held at Engsham, and the other at Haba, assembled whilst Elphegus was archbishop. They consisted of seculars as well as ecclesiastics, and the constitutions passed there related both to church and state. The most remarkable canons are as follow:—

In the council of Engsham, the 2d canon enjoins the celibacy of the clergy.

The 9th forbids all persons to do any wrong to the church, or eject a clergyman out of his benefice without the consent of the bishop.

By the 17th, every Friday was to be a fast, unless it fell upon a holiday.

The 19th enjoins widows to stay twelve months after the death of their husbands, before they marry again.

The 20th enjoins frequent confessions, and the people are ordered to receive the sacrament three times, at least, in a year.

The council of Haba has but one canon worth notice; namely, the second; by which every Christian was obliged to fast three days with bread and water, before the feast of St. Michael, and to distribute among the poor what he should have eaten in these three days.

These are the only canons worth remarking in these two synods; but to supply the want of councils, we have the ecclesiastical laws of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor; some of which are inserted, to show the great regard these two monarchs had for the clergy. The following are Canute's:—

The 4th enjoins all Christians to pay great respect to the clergy, because their sacerdotal functions are extremely beneficial to the people.

By the 5th, if a priest was accused of any crime, he had the liberty of purging himself by saying mass, and receiving the eucharist.

The 12th recommends celibacy to the clergy, and ranks them among the thanes of the second class, that is, among the gentry.

The 20th ordains, that at funerals the dues shall be paid upon the breaking up of the ground; and that the dues shall be paid to the parish the deceased belonged to, though he was buried elsewhere.

The 22d enjoins the observance of Sunday from Saturday three o'clock in the afternoon, till Monday break of day.

The 23d determines the times of fasting, and places the vigils of the festivals of the blessed Virgin and of the apostles among the fasts.

There are several others, relating to the payment of tithes and Peter-pence, the violators of the privileges of the clergy, and the like, in favour of the church.

It is also decreed by these laws, that every Christian should learn the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles' Creed; otherwise, they were allowed neither to stand godfather, nor receive the communion, nor have Christian burial.

The ecclesiastical laws of Edward the Confessor, relate chiefly to the protection of the church and clergy.

The 1st forbids the molesting a clergyman, contrary to the tenour of the privileges of the church.

The 2d appoints certain days, whereon all proceedings in the courts of justice were to cease.

By the 3d, the church's causes are to be tried first.

The 4th firmly establishes the immunities of those who in any wise depend on the church, and ordains that they shall not be obliged to answer any plea, &c., except in the ecclesiastical court.

The 5th confirms the privilege of sanctuary to churches, and extends it even to priests' houses.

By the 6th, if any person broke in upon the privileges of the church, he had no way of being relieved but by submitting to the sentence of the bishop.

The 6th orders the punctual payment of tithes, and sets forth what is to be paid.

The 9th determines the circumstances relating to the ordeal trial.

The 12th settles the fine of Manbote, or the sum to be paid to the lord for killing any of his vassals or slaves: the king's and the archbishop's Manbote is fixed at the same sum.

By the 13th all treasure found belongs to the king, unless it be found in a church or churchyard; then the gold is the king's, and the silver the church's.

It is visible throughout these laws, that the clergy took care of themselves, when they came in contact with devout and easy princes, or such as stood in need of their interest.

But notwithstanding the great consideration of the Saxon kings for the clergy, they could not retain the privilege of choosing their bishops and abbots. Whilst the prelates confined themselves within the bounds of their pastoral functions, and meddled not with civil matters, the power of electing was freely left to the chapters; but when the bishops became rich and popular, and began to interpose in state affairs, by reason of the fiefs they were possessed of, it was of great consequence to the kings, to have such bishops and abbots as were in their interest, or at least, were obliged to them for their preferments. Accordingly, the kings began to interpose in elections, by way of canvassing, or recommendation, and very often by refusing to put in possession of the fiefs belonging to the church or abbey, such prelates and abbots as they did not like; and ultimately, the authority of the court prevailed so, that in the time of Ethelred II., the monks had entirely lost the privilege of choosing their abbots, as appears from Ingulphus; who says, "In those days the monks and abbots seldom resorted to court. But ever since the kings have disposed of the abbeys, the monks have made interest with the courtiers, which sometimes cost them very dear." The historian himself loudly complains of this abuse, though he was installed in the abbey of Croyland by the same method, that is, by the sole will and pleasure of William the Conqueror.

There were but two removals of bishops' sees within the period now treated of. The see of Kirtou, in Wessex,* was removed to Exeter,† and the see of Lindisfarn, in Northumberland, to Durham. Aldhun, bishop of Lindisfarn, being disturbed in that small island by the incursions of the Danes, removed to Durham, carrying with him the relics of St. Cuthbert, where he built a cathedral, and fixed his see, which remains there to this day.‡

In 981, the archiepiscopal see of Canterbury acquired a new jurisdiction in Wales. Gucan, a Welsh priest, being chosen bishop of Llandaff, and consecrated by Archbishop Dunstan, this precedent was followed by his successors, who like him owned the archbishop of Canterbury for their metropolitan: and some writers have inferred from hence, that all the British bishops at the same time owned the superiority of the church of Rome; but this cannot be admitted. It is certain, the bishops of St. David's exercised the archiepiscopal functions in Wales, till the time of Henry I., and that without the ornament of the pall, the mark of submission to the pope.

Edmund, bishop of Durham, was remarkable for the manner of his election. The chapter of Durham having met to elect a bishop, and not being able to agree in their choice, Edmund, a priest of that church, said jestingly, that since they were at a loss whom to choose, they might as good select him and make him a bishop. As miracles were then much in vogue, the chapter looked

* Crediton, or Kirtou, stands on the Creden in Devonshire, there are now no signs of its having been a bishop's see, but a great meadow, called My Lord's Meadow.

† This city stands on the river called Isc by the Britons, and Ex by the Saxons, whence the names Isca and Exancaster. The Welsh call it to this day Caerisc. It was made a bishop's see by Edward the Confessor, in 1048. Leofric, a Burgundian, was the first bishop.

‡ Durham being almost surrounded by the river Were, was called by the Saxons, Dunholme, Dun signifying a hill (the city being seated on one), and Holme, that is, a river island; it was built about the year 995.

pon this motion as a divine impulse, and so unanimously agreed to elect him; and Edmund became famous for his vigour and boldness in reprimanding vice, even in persons of the highest birth and stations.

We must also reckon, in the number of illustrious persons of that age, certain English ecclesiastics, who flourished in Sweden and Norway. Olaüs Scot-Kunung, king of Sweden, designing to become a Christian, desired Ethelred to send him some missionaries to instruct him in the Gospel; and Sigefrid, archdeacon of York (not archbishop, as a Swedish writer says), Eskil, Gunichild, Rudolf, and Bernard, or David, undertook this mission. Sigefrid was made bishop of Wexia, a city in the province of Smaland in Sweden, and baptized Olaüs; but the greatest part of these missionaries were martyred by the pagans, to whom they preached.*

Of the division of the kingdom into parishes, the following particulars may be interesting.

Augustin, the first bishop of the Saxons, receiving from the king of Kent some lands, for the maintenance of himself and the monks he brought with him, disposed of the profits of these lands, and the offerings of Christians as he thought proper; desirous of having instruction in this matter, he consulted the pope, Gregory I., who replied, it was the custom in the church of Rome to divide the offerings into four portions, and distribute one of them for the maintenance of the inferior clergy; but as Augustin and his companions were monks of the same order, he exhorted them to live together as brethren; and thus also lived Aidan and Finan, bishops of the Northumbrians, who were monks as well as Austin, though of a different order. But it cannot be inferred from hence, that in all the churches, the bishop and his clergy lived in common, as some pretend; for on the contrary, it seems to follow, from the bishop's being obliged to distribute the fourth part of the church's revenues among the clergy, that they did not live so. Be this as it will, the bishop and clergy were maintained, as much out of the profits of the lands given to the church, as by the daily offerings of the people.

The number of Christians increasing every day, and there being at first in each diocese, which contained a whole kingdom, but one church, it could not but be very inconvenient to many of the new converts to resort thither; and it became necessary therefore that others should be built, and priests sent to officiate in them; who were not however affixed to any particular church, but kept with the bishop, who sent out sometimes one, sometimes another, to minister in the remote churches, after which they returned to him. In proportion therefore as Christians increased, new churches were erected for the convenience of those who lived at a distance from the cathedral; which were no more than chapels to the principal church, to which belonged all the offerings that were made in the others. Accordingly the priests at their return, put the offerings they had received into the bishop's hands, which served for the maintenance of the bishop, and the clergy who were about him. The priests at first had no other titles, but that of belonging to a certain diocese: for these first rural churches are not to be considered as distinct parishes, but as appendages belonging to the cathedral.

These rural churches were not at first very numerous, because the nobles of large estates, who were the only persons that founded them, were generally contented with building one single church for the use of their vassals. The number of Christians increasing rapidly, it had at this period become necessary to provide for the constant residence of a priest in each of these churches; and as it was inconvenient to have a new priest every time to do duty, the bishops were willing to continue the same; and from this time, parishes may properly be said to commence. However, lest the priests, thus fixed to one cure, should be unmindful of their dependence on the cathedral, the bishops reserved in their own hands the revenues and oblations these churches were endowed with; which gave the founders uneasiness; who very justly could not bear to see the priest, who did all the duty, have so small a share of their donations. Wherefore, the zeal for erecting new churches beginning to cool, at a time when there was most need of them, the bishops thought fit to yield a little; and compounded with those who were inclined to build churches, and were satisfied with reserving to the cathedral a third or fourth part of the incomes, with the right of baptism and burial. This obstacle being removed, these private oratories became very numerous, almost every great man building one for the convenience of himself and his vassals. Moreover, when any thane alienated part of his estate, the purchaser seldom failed of erecting a church in his new purchase; and the bishops also being greatly enriched by the grants made to their dioceses, built likewise churches on their lands, as well for the convenience of their tenants, as to imitate the nobles, among whom they themselves began to be ranked. By all these means the rural churches abounding every where, there was no necessity of sending priests from place to place, since each church, as was before observed, had one of its own; and thus by degrees the parochial division was settled. However, the bishops were long in possession of the tithes and oblations, till at length, in order to excite more vividly the zeal of Christians, they removed this difficulty which obstructed the building and endowing of churches; and not only left to the parochial priests the revenues the founders were pleased to assign, or at least, the much greater part, but also granted them the power of administering the sacraments in their respective churches. Such was the rise and progress of parochial division, which was nearly perfected in the reign of Edgar, or perhaps of Canute the Great; although between that period and the reign of Edward the Confessor, there were some further subdivisions; but, in all probability, there were as few new parishes after the Norman conquest: we find by several charters of the latter

* Through the idleness or ignorance of the monks, the only writers in those days, we have but few historians from Asser to the Norman conquest. Next to Asser was Ethelwerd, who wrote in the reign of Edgar, and lived till 1090, though he did not continue his chronicle so far. He was (as he himself says) descended of the blood-royal. His works consist of four books, which were published by Sir H. Saville. Bishop Nicolson says, the whole is an imperfect translation of the Saxon annals. His style is inflated and obscure, and in some places hardly sense; and therefore, but of little use, unless in settling the reigns and deaths of some of our Saxon kings, who lived about his time, concerning which the copies of the Saxon annals differ. From him to the conquest we meet with no historians, except Osbern, who wrote the lives of St. Dunstan and St. Alphage, which are published in the first volume of Anglia Sacra; and the author of a treatise called Encomium Emmae, being a short account of the period immediately preceding the reign of Edward the Confessor.

Saxon kings, that the parishes of Cambridgeshire, Huntingdonshire, and Lincolnshire, were much the same as now; and it appears from Domesday-book, that all the parishes of the counties mentioned there are nearly the same as at present.

CHAPTER VI.

THE ANGLO-SAXON GOVERNMENT AND MANNERS.

First Saxon government—Succession of the kings—The Wittenagemot—The aristocracy—The several orders of men—Courts of justice—Criminal law—Rules of proof—Military force—Public revenue—Value of money—Manners.

THE government of the Germans, and that of all the northern nations, who established themselves on the ruins of Rome, was always extremely free; and those fierce people, accustomed to independence and insured to arms, were more guided by persuasion than authority, in the submission which they paid to their princes. The military despotism which had taken place in the Roman empire, and which, previously to the irruption of those conquerors, had sunk the genius of men, and destroyed every noble principle of science and virtue, was unable to resist the vigorous efforts of a free people; and Europe, as from a new epoch, rekindled her ancient spirit, and shook off the base servitude to arbitrary will and authority under which she had so long laboured. The free constitutions then established, however impaired by the encroachments of succeeding princes, still preserve an air of independence and legal administration, which distinguish the European nations; and if that part of the globe maintain sentiments of liberty, honour, equity, and valour, superior to the rest of mankind, it owes these advantages chiefly to the seeds implanted by those generous barbarians.

The Saxons who subdued Britain, as they enjoyed great liberty in their own country, obstinately retained that invaluable possession in their new settlement; and they imported into this island the same principles of independence which they had inherited from their ancestors. The chieftains (for such they were, more properly than kings or princes) who commanded them in those military expeditions, still possessed a very limited authority; and as the Saxons exterminated, rather than subdued the ancient inhabitants, they were indeed transplanted into a new territory, but preserved unaltered all their civil and military institutions. The language was pure Saxon; even the names of places, which often remain while the tongue entirely changes, were almost all affixed by the conquerors; the manners and customs were wholly German; and the same picture of a fierce and bold liberty, which is drawn by the masterly pencil of Tacitus, will suit those founders of the English government. The king, so far from being invested with arbitrary power, was only considered as the first among the citizens; his authority depended more on his personal qualities than on his station; he was even so far on a level with the people, that a stated price was fixed for his head, and a legal fine was levied upon his murderer, which, though proportionate to his station, and superior to that paid for the life of a subject, was a sensible mark of his subordination to the community.

It is easy to imagine, that an independent people, so little restrained by law and cultivated by science, would not be very strict in maintaining a regular succession of their princes. Though they paid great regard to the royal family, and ascribed to it an undisputed superiority, they either had no rule, or none that was steadily observed, in filling the vacant throne; and present convenience in that emergency, was more attended to than general principles. We are not, however, to suppose that the crown was considered as altogether elective; and that a regular plan was traced by the constitution for supplying, by the suffrages of the people, every vacancy made by the demise of the first magistrate. If any king left a son of an age and capacity fit for government, the young prince naturally stepped into the throne. If he was a minor, his uncle, or the next prince of the blood, was promoted to the government, and left the sceptre to his posterity. Any sovereign, by taking previous measures with the leading men, had it greatly in his power to appoint his successor. All these changes, and indeed the ordinary administration of government, required the express concurrence, or at least the tacit acquiescence of the people; but possession, however obtained, was extremely apt to secure their obedience, and the idea of any right, which was once excluded, was but feeble and imperfect. This is so much the case in all barbarous monarchies, and occurs so often in the history of the Anglo-Saxons, that we cannot consistently entertain any other notion of their government. The idea of an hereditary succession in authority is so natural to men, and is so much fortified by the usual rule in transmitting private possessions, that it must retain a great influence on every society which does not exclude it by the refinements of a republican constitution. But as there is a material difference between government and private possessions, and every man is not as much qualified for exercising the one, as for enjoying the other, a people who are not sensible of the general advantages attending a fixed rule, are apt to make great leaps in the succession, and frequently to pass over the person, who, had he possessed the requisite years and abilities, would have been thought entitled to the sovereignty. Thus, these monarchies are not, strictly speaking, either elective or hereditary; and though the destination of a prince may often be followed in appointing his successor, they can as little be regarded as wholly testamentary. The states by their suffrage may sometimes establish a sovereign; but they more frequently recognise the person whom they find established; a few great men take the lead; the people, overawed and influenced, acquiesce in the government; and the reigning prince, provided he be of the royal family, passes undisputedly for the legal sovereign.

It is confessed, that our knowledge of the Anglo-Saxon history and antiquities is too imperfect to afford us means of determining, with certainty, all the prerogatives of the crown and privileges of the people, or of giving an exact delineation of that government. It is probable, also, that the constitution might be somewhat different in the different kingdoms, and that it changed considerably during the course of six centuries, which elapsed from the first invasion of the Saxons till the Norman conquest.* But most of these differences and changes, with their causes and effects, are unknown to us. It only appears, that at all times, and in all the kingdoms, there was a national council, called a Wittenagemot, or assembly of the wise men (for that is the import of the term), whose consent was requisite for enacting laws and for ratifying the chief acts of public administration. The preambles to all the laws of Ethelbert, Ina, Alfred, Edward the Elder, Athelstan, Edmund, Edgar, Ethelred, and Edward the Confessor; even those to the laws of Canute, though a kind of conqueror, put this matter beyond controversy, and carry proof every where of a limited and legal government. But who were the constituent members of this Wittenagemot has not been determined with certainty by antiquaries. It is agreed, that the bishops and abbots† were an essential part; and it is also evident from the tenour of those ancient laws, that the Wittenagemot enacted statutes which regulated the ecclesiastical as well as civil government, and that those dangerous principles, by which the church is totally severed from the state, were hitherto unknown to the Anglo-Saxons. It also appears, that the aldermen, or governors of counties, who after the Danish times were often called earls,‡ were admitted into this council, and gave their consent to the public statutes. But besides the prelates and aldermen, there is also mention of the wites, or wisemen, as a component part of the Wittenagemot; but who these were, is not so clearly ascertained by the laws or the history of that period. The matter would probably be of difficult discussion, even were it examined impartially; but as our modern parties have chosen to divide on this point, the question has been disputed with the greater obstinacy, and the arguments on both sides have become, on that account, the more captious and deceitful. Our monarchical faction maintain, that these wites, or sapientis, were the judges, or men learned in the law: the popular faction assert them to be the representatives of the boroughs, or what we now call the commons.

The expressions employed by all ancient histo-

* We know of one change, not inconsiderable, in the Saxon constitution. The Saxon annals inform us, that it was in early times the prerogative of the king to name the dukes, earls, aldermen, and sheriffs of the counties. Asser, a contemporary writer, informs us, that Alfred deposed all the ignorant aldermen, and appointed men of more capacity in their place: yet the laws of Edward the Confessor say expressly, that the heretoghs, or dukes, and the sheriffs, were chosen by the freeholders in the folk-mote, a county court, which was assembled once a year, and where all the freeholders swore allegiance to the king.

† Sometimes abbesses were admitted; at least they often signed the king's charters or grants.

‡ It appears from the ancient translations of the Saxon annals and laws, and from King Alfred's translation of Bede, as well as from all the ancient historians, that comes in Latin, alderman in Saxon, and earl in Dano-Saxon, were quite synonymous. There is only a clause in a law of King Athelstan's, which has stumbled some antiquaries, and has made them imagine that an earl was superior to an alderman. The weregild, or the price of an earl's blood, is there fixed at 15,000 thrismas, equal to that of an archbishop; whereas, that of a bishop and alderman is only 8000 thrismas. To solve this difficulty, we must have recourse to Selden's conjecture, that the term of earl was in the age of Athelstan just beginning to be in use in England, and stood at that time for the atheling, or prince of the blood, heir to the crown. This he confirms by a law of Canute, where an atheling and an archbishop are put upon the same footing. In another law of the same Athelstan, the weregild of the prince, or atheling, is said to be 15,000 thrismas. He is therefore the same who is called earl in the former law.

rians, in mentioning the Wittenagemot, seem to contradict the latter supposition. The members are almost always called the principes, satrapæ, optimates, magnates, proceres; terms which seem to suppose an aristocracy, and to exclude the commons. The boroughs also, from the low state of commerce, were so small and so poor, and the inhabitants lived in such dependence on the great men, that it seems nowise probable they would be admitted as a part of the national councils. The commons are well known to have had no share in the governments established by the Franks, Burgundians, and other northern nations; and we may conclude that the Saxons, who remained longer barbarous and uncivilized than those tribes, would never think of conferring such an extraordinary privilege on trade and industry. The military profession alone was honourable among all those conquerors: the warriors subsisted by their possessions in land: they became considerable by their influence over their vassals, retainers, tenants, and slaves: and it requires strong proof to convince us that they would admit any of a rank so much inferior as the burgesses, to share with them in the legislative authority. Tacitus indeed affirms, that among the ancient Germans, the consent of all the members of the community was required in every important deliberation; but he speaks not of representatives; and this ancient practice, mentioned by the Roman historian, could only have taken place in small tribes, where every citizen might, without inconvenience, be assembled upon any extraordinary emergency. After principalities became extensive; after the difference of property had formed distinctions more important than those which arose from personal strength and valour; we may conclude, that the national assemblies must have been more limited in their number, and composed only of the more considerable citizens.

But though we must exclude the burgesses, or commons, from the Saxon Wittenagemot, there is some necessity for supposing that this assembly consisted of other members than the prelates, abbots, aldermen, and the judges or privy-council. For as all these, excepting some of the ecclesiastics,* were anciently appointed by the king; had there been no other legislative authority, the royal power had been in a great measure absolute, contrary to the tenour of all the historians, and to the practice of all the northern nations. We may therefore conclude, that the more considerable proprietors of land were, without any election, constituent members of the national assembly: there is reason to think that forty hides, or between four and five thousand acres, was the estate requisite for entitling the possessor to this honourable privilege. We find a passage in an ancient author, by which it appears, that a person of very noble birth, even one allied to the crown, was not esteemed a princeps (the term usually employed by ancient historians when the Wittenagemot is mentioned), till he had acquired a fortune of that amount. Nor need we imagine that the public council would become disorderly or confused by admitting so great a multitude. The landed property of England was probably in few hands during the Saxon times, at least during the latter part of that period: and as men had hardly any ambition to attend those public councils, there was no danger of the assembly's becoming too numerous for the dispatch of the little business which was brought before them.

* There is some reason to think that the bishops were sometimes chosen by the Wittenagemot, and confirmed by the king. The abbots in the monasteries of royal foundation were anciently named by the king; though Edgar gave the monks the election, and only reserved to himself the ratification. This destination was afterwards frequently violated; and the abbots, as well as the bishops, were afterwards all appointed by the king; as we learn from Ingulph, a writer contemporary to the conquest.

In opposition to the foregoing statement of Hume, may be placed Sharon Turner's opinion of this important national assembly, whose superior means of gaining correct information, if not superior penetration, should decide the question in favour of the popular opinion that a representative government was known to, and exercised by, the Anglo-Saxons. He says, "After many years' consideration of the question, I am inclined to believe, that the Anglo-Saxon Wittenagemot very much resembled our present parliament in the orders and persons that composed it; and that the members, who attended as representatives, were chosen by classes analogous to those who now possess the elective franchise."

"We have an expressive outline of the general construction of all the German national councils, in these words of Tacitus: 'On the minor affairs the chiefs consult: on the greater, all; yet so that those things, of which the decision rests with the people, are treated of among the chiefs.' This passage shows that, by the general principle of the most ancient German gemots, the people made an essential part of the assembly. Both chiefs and people deliberated, and the people decided. This being the primeval principle of the national councils of ancient Germany, before the Angles and Saxons left it, it becomes incumbent on the historical antiquary to show, not when the people acceded to the Wittenagemots, but when, if ever, they were divested of the right of attending them. Of such a divestment there is no trace either in our historical or legal records."

It is certain, that whatever we may determine concerning the constituent members of the Wittenagemot, in whom, with the king, the legislature resided, the Anglo-Saxon government, in the period preceding the Norman conquest, was become extremely aristocratical: the royal authority was very limited; the people, even if admitted to that assembly, were of little or no weight and consideration. We have hints given us in historians, of the great power and riches of particular noblemen: and it could not but happen, after the abolition of the heptarchy, when the king lived at a distance from the provinces, that those great proprietors, who resided on their estates, would much augment their authority over their vassals and retainers, and over all the inhabitants of the neighbourhood. Hence the immeasurable power assumed by Harold, Godwin, Leofric, Siward, Morcar, Edwin, Eadric, and Alfric, who controlled the authority of the kings, and rendered themselves quite necessary in the government. The two latter, though detested by the people, on account of their joining a foreign enemy, still preserved their power and influence; and we may therefore conclude, that their authority was founded, not on popularity, but on family rights and possessions. There is one Athelstan mentioned in the reign of the king of that name, who is called alderman of all England, and is said to be half-king; though the monarch himself was a prince of valour and abilities. And we find, that in the latter Saxon times, and in these alone, the great offices went from father to son, and became in a manner hereditary in the families.

The circumstances attending the invasions of the Danes would also serve much to increase the power of the principal nobility. Those freebooters made unexpected inroads on all quarters; and there was a necessity that each county should resist them by its own force, and under the conduct of its own nobility and its own magistrates. For the same reason that a general war, managed by the united efforts of the whole state, commonly augments the power of the crown; those private wars and inroads turned to the advantage of the aldermen and nobles.

Among that military and turbulent people, so averse to commerce and the arts, and so little inured to industry, justice was commonly very ill administered, and great oppression and violence seem to have prevailed. These disorders would be increased by the exorbitant power of the aristocracy; and would, in their turn, contribute to increase it. Men, not daring to rely on the guardianship of the laws, were obliged to devote themselves to the service of some chieftain, whose orders they followed, even to the disturbance of the government, or the injury of their fellow-citizens and who afforded them in return protection from any insult or injustice by strangers. Hence we find by the extracts which Dr. Brady has given us from Domesday-book, that almost all the inhabitants, even of towns, had placed themselves under the clientship of some particular nobleman, whose patronage they purchased by annual payments, and whom they were obliged to consider as their sovereign, more than the king himself, or even the legislature. A client, though a freeman, was supposed so much to belong to his patron, that his murderer was obliged by law to pay a fine to the latter, as a compensation for his loss; in like manner as he paid a fine to the master for the murder of his slave. Men who were of a more considerable rank, but not powerful enough, each to support himself by his own independent authority, entered into formal confederacies with each other, and composed a kind of separate community, which rendered itself formidable to all aggressors. Dr. Hickes has preserved a curious Saxon bond of this kind, which he calls a Sodalitium, and which contains many particulars characteristic of the manners and customs of the times. All the associates are there said to be gentlemen of Cambridgeshire; and they swear before the holy relics to observe their confederacy, and to be faithful to each other: they promise to bury any one of the associates who dies, in whatever place he had appointed; to contribute to his funeral charges; and to attend at his interment; and whoever is wanting in this last duty, binds himself to pay a measure of honey. When any of the associates is in danger, and calls for the assistance of his fellows, they promise, besides flying to his succour, to give information to the sheriff; and if he be negligent in protecting the person exposed to danger, they engage to levy a fine of one pound upon him: if the president of the society himself be wanting in this particular, he binds himself to pay one pound; unless he has the reasonable excuse of sickness, or of duty to his superior. When any of the associates is murdered, they are to exact eight pounds from the murderer; and if he refuse to pay it, they are to prosecute him for the sum at their joint expense. If any of the associates who happens to be poor kill a man, the society are to contribute, in a certain proportion, to pay his fine: a mark a-piece if the fine be 700 shillings; less if the person killed be a clown or ceorle; the half of that sum again if he be a Welshman. But where any of the associates kills a man, wilfully and without provocation, he must himself pay the fine. If any of the associates kill any of his fellows in a like criminal manner, besides paying the usual fine to the relations of the deceased, he must pay eight pounds to the society, or renounce the benefit of it: in which case, they bind themselves, under the penalty of one pound, never to eat or drink with him, except in the presence of the king, bishop, or alderman. There are other regulations to protect themselves and their servants from all injuries, to revenge such as are committed, and to prevent their giving abusive language to each other; and the fine, which they engage to pay for this last offence, is a measure of honey.

It is not to be doubted but a confederacy of this kind must have been a great source of friendship and attachment; when men lived in perpetual danger from enemies, robbers, and oppressors, and received protection chiefly from their personal valour, and from the assistance of their friends or patrons. As animosities were then more violent, connexions were also more intimate, whether voluntary, or derived from blood: the most remote degree of propinquity was regarded: an indelible memory of benefits was preserved: severe vengeance was taken for injuries, both from a point of honour, and as the best means of future security; and the civil union being weak, many private engagements were contracted in order to supply its place, and to procure men that safety which the laws and their own innocence were not alone able to insure to them.

On the whole, notwithstanding the seeming liberty, or rather licentiousness of the Anglo-Saxons, the great body even of the free citizens, in those ages, really enjoyed much less true liberty than where the execution of the laws is the most severe, and where subjects are reduced to the strictest subordination and dependence on the civil magistrate. The reason is derived from the excess itself of that liberty. Men must guard themselves at any price against insults and injuries; and where they receive not protection from the laws and magistrates, they will seek it by submission to superiors, and by herding in some private confederacy which acts under the direction of a powerful leader. And thus all anarchy is the immediate cause of tyranny, if not over the state, at least over many of the individuals.

Security was provided by the Saxon laws to all members of the Wittenagemot, both in going and returning, except they were notorious thieves and robbers.

The German-Saxons, as the other nations of that continent, were divided into three ranks of men, the noble, the free, and the slaves. This distinction they brought over with them into Britain.

The nobles were called thanes; and were of two kinds, the king's thanes and lesser thanes. The latter seem to have been dependent on the former; and to have received lands, for which they paid rent, services, or attendance in peace or war. We know of no title which raised any one to the rank ofthane, except noble birth and the possession of land. The former was always much regarded by all the German nations, even in their most barbarous state; and as the Saxon nobility, having little credit, could scarcely burden their estates with much debt, and as the commons had little trade or industry by which they could accumulate riches, these two ranks of men, even though they were not separated by positive laws, might remain long distinct, and the noble families continue many ages in opulence and splendour. There were no middle ranks of men, that could gradually mix with their superiors, and insensibly procure to themselves honour and distinction. If by any extraordinary accident, a mean person acquired riches, a circumstance so singular made him be known and remarked; he became the object of envy, as well as of indignation, to all the nobles; he would have great difficulty to defend what he had acquired; and he would find it impossible to protect himself from oppression, except by courting the patronage of some great chieftain, and paying a large price for his safety.

There are two statutes among the Saxon laws, which seem calculated to confound those different ranks of men; that of Athelstan, by which a merchant, who had made three long sea-voyages on his own account, was entitled to the quality ofthane; and that of the same prince, by which a ceorle or husbandman, who had been able to purchase five hides of land, and had a chapel, a kitchen, a hall, and a bell, was raised to the same distinction. But the opportunities were so few, by which a merchant or ceorle could thus exalt himself above his rank, that the law could never overcome the reigning prejudices; the distinction between noble and base blood would still be indelible; and the well-born thanes would enter-tain the highest contempt for those legal and factitious ones. Though we are not informed of any of these circumstances by ancient historians, they are so much founded on the nature of things, that we may admit them as a necessary and infallible consequence of the situation of the kingdom during those ages.

The cities appear by Domesday-book to have been at the conquest little better than villages.* York itself, though it was always the second, at least the third† city in England, and was the capital of a great province, which never was thoroughly united with the rest, contained then but 1418 families.‡ Malmesbury tells us, that the great distinction between the Anglo-Saxon nobility, and the French or Norman, was, that the latter built magnificent and stately castles; whereas the former consumed their immense fortunes in riot and hospitality, and in mean houses. We may thence infer, that the arts in general were much less advanced in England than in France; a greater number of idle servants and retainers lived about the great families; and as these, even in France, were powerful enough to disturb the execution of the laws, we may judge of the authority acquired by the aristocracy in † Norwich contained 738 houses, Exeter 315, Ipswich 538, Northampton 60, Hertford 146, Canterbury 262, Bath 64, Southampton 84, Warwick 225. These are the most considerable he mentions. The account of them is extracted from Domesday-book.

* Winchester, being the capital of the West Saxon monarchy, was anciently a considerable city.

‡ There were six wards, besides the archbishop's palace; and five of these wards contained the number of families here mentioned, which, at the rate of five persons to a family, makes about 7000 souls. The sixth ward was laid waste.

England. When Earl Godwin besieged the confessor in London, he summoned from all parts his huscarles, or houseceorles and retainers, and thereby constrained his sovereign to accept of the conditions which he was pleased to impose upon him.

The lower ranks of freemen were denominated ceorles among the Anglo-Saxons; and where they were industrious, they were chiefly employed in husbandry: whence a ceorle and a husbandman became in a manner synonymous terms. They cultivated the farms of the nobility or thanes, for which they paid rent; and they seem to have been removeable at pleasure. For there is little mention of leases among the Anglo-Saxons: the pride of the nobility, together with the general ignorance of writing, must have rendered those contracts very rare, and must have kept the husbandmen in a dependent condition. The rents of farms were then chiefly paid in kind.

But the most numerous rank by far in the community seems to have been the slaves or villains, who were the property of their lords, and were consequently incapable themselves of possessing any property. Dr. Brady assures us, from a survey of Domesday-book, that, in all the counties of England, the far greater part of the land was occupied by them, and that the husbandmen, and still more the socmen, who were tenants that could not be removed at pleasure, were very few in comparison. This was not the case with the German nations, as far as we can collect from the account given us by Tacitus. The perpetual wars in the heptarchy, and the depredations of the Danes, seem to have been the cause of this great alteration with the Anglo-Saxons. Prisoners taken in battle, or carried off in the frequent inroads, were then reduced to slavery; and became, by right of war, entirely at the disposal of their lords. Great property in the nobles, especially if joined to an irregular administration of justice, naturally favours the power of the aristocracy; but still more so, if the practice of slavery be admitted, and has become very common. The nobility not only possess the influence which always attends riches, but also the power which the laws give them over their slaves and villains. It then becomes difficult, and almost impossible for a private man to remain altogether free and independent.

There were two kinds of slaves among the Anglo-Saxons; household slaves, after the manner of the ancients, and prædial or rustic, after the manner of the Germans. These latter resembled the serfs, which are at present to be met with in Poland, Denmark, and some parts of Germany. The power of a master over his slaves was not unlimited among the Anglo-Saxons, as it was among their ancestors. If a man beat out his slave's eye or teeth, the slave recovered his liberty: if he killed him, he paid a fine to the king; provided the slave died within a day after the wound or blow: otherwise it passed unpunished. The selling of themselves or children to slavery was always the practice among the German nations, and was continued by the Anglo-Saxons.

The great lords and abbots among the Anglo-Saxons possessed a criminal jurisdiction within their territories, and could punish, without appeal, any thieves or robbers whom they caught there. This institution must have had a very contrary effect to that which was intended, and must have procured robbers a sure protection on the lands of such noblemen as did not sincerely mean to discourage crimes and violence.

But though the general strain of the Anglo-Saxon government seems to have become aristocratical, there were still considerable remains of the ancient democracy, which were not, indeed, sufficient to protect the lowest of the people, without the patronage of some great lord, but might give security, and even some degree of dignity, to the gentry or inferior nobility. The administration of justice, in particular, by the courts of the decennary, the hundred, and the county, was well calculated to defend general liberty, and to restrain the power of the nobles. In the county courts, or shiremotes, all the freeholders were assembled twice a year, and received appeals from the inferior courts. They there decided all causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil; and the bishop, together with the alderman or earl, presided over them. The affair was determined in a summary manner, without much pleading, formality, or delay, by a majority of voices; and the bishop and alderman had no further authority than to keep order among the freeholders, and interpose with their opinion. Where justice was denied during three sessions by the hundred, and then by the county court, there lay an appeal to the king's court; but this was not practised on slight occasions. The alderman received a third of the fines levied in those courts; and as most of the punishments were then pecuniary, this perquisite formed a considerable part of the profits belonging to his office. The two-thirds also, which went to the king, made no contemptible part of the public revenue. Any freeholder was fined who absented himself thrice from these courts.

As the extreme ignorance of the age made deeds and writings very rare, the county or hundred court was the place where the most remarkable civil transactions were finished, in order to preserve the memory of them, and prevent all future disputes. Here testaments were promulgated, slaves manumitted, bargains of sale concluded; and sometimes, for greater security, the most considerable of these deeds were inserted in the blank leaves of the parish Bible, which thus became a kind of register too sacred to be falsified. It was not unusual to add to the deed an imprecation on all such as should be guilty of that crime.

Among a people who lived in so simple a manner as the Anglo-Saxons, the judicial power is always of greater importance than the legislative. There were few or no taxes imposed by the states. There were few statutes enacted; and the nation was less governed by laws than by customs, which admitted a great latitude of interpretation. Though it should, therefore, be allowed that the Wittenagemot was altogether composed of the principal nobility, the county-courts, where all the freeholders were admitted, and which regulated all the daily occurrences of life, formed a wide basis for the government, and were no contemptible checks on the aristocracy. But there is another power still more important than either the judicial or legislative; to wit, the power of injuring or serving by immediate force and violence, for which it is difficult to obtain redress in courts of justice. In all extensive governments, where the execution of the laws is feeble, this power naturally falls into the hands of the principal nobility; and the degree of it which prevails, cannot be determined so much by the public statutes, as by small incidents in history, by particular customs, and sometimes by the reason and nature of things.

The powers of all the members of the Anglo-Saxon government are disputed among historians and antiquaries: the extreme obscurity of the subject, even though faction had never entered into the question, would naturally have begotten those controversies. But the great influence of the lords over their slaves and tenants, the clientship of the burghers, the total want of a middling rank of men, the extent of the monarchy, the loose execution of the laws, the continued disorders and convulsions of the state; all these circumstances evince that the Anglo-Saxon government became at last extremely aristocratical; and the events, during the period immediately preceding the conquest, confirm this inference or conjecture.

Both the punishments inflicted by the Anglo-Saxon courts of judicature, and the methods of proof employed in all causes, appear somewhat singular, and are very different from those which prevail at present among all civilized nations.

We must conceive that the ancient Germans were little removed from the original state of nature: the social confederacy among them was more martial than civil: they had chiefly in view the means of attack or defence against public enemies, not those of protection against their fellow-citizens. Their possessions were so slender and so equal, that they were not exposed to great danger; and the natural bravery of the people made every man trust to himself, and to his particular friends, for his defence or vengeance. This defect in the political union drew much closer the knot of particular confederacies: an insult upon any man was regarded by all his relations and associates as a common injury: they were bound by honour, as well as by a sense of common interest, to revenge his death, or any violence which he had suffered: they retaliated on the aggressor by like acts of violence; and if he were protected, as was natural and usual, by his own clan, the quarrel was spread still wider, and bred endless disorders in the nation.

The Frisians, a tribe of the Germans, had never advanced beyond this wild and imperfect state of society; and the right of private revenge still remained among them unlimited and uncontrolled. But the other German nations, in the age of Tacitus, had made one step further towards completing the political or civil union. Though it still continued to be an indispensable point of honour for every clan to revenge the death or injury of a member, the magistrate had acquired a right of interposing in the quarrel, and of accommodating the difference. He obliged the person maimed or injured, and the relations of one killed, to accept of a present from the aggressor and his relations, as a compensation for the injury,* and to drop all further prosecution of revenge. That the accommodation of one quarrel might not be the source of more, this present was fixed and certain, according to the rank of the person killed or injured, and was commonly paid in cattle, the chief property of those rude and uncultivated nations. A present of this kind gratified the revenge of the injured family, by the loss which the aggressor suffered: it satisfied their pride, by the submission which it expressed: it diminished their regret for the loss or injury of a kinsman, by their acquisition of new property: and thus general peace was for a moment restored to the society.*

But when the German nations had been settled some time in the provinces of the Roman empire, they made still another step towards a more cultivated life, and their criminal justice gradually improved and refined itself. The magistrate, whose office it was to guard public peace, and to suppress private animosities, conceived himself to be injured by every injury done to any of his people; and besides the compensation to the person who suffered, or to his family, he thought himself entitled to exact a fine called the Fridwit, as an atonement for the breach of peace, and as a reward for the pains which he had taken in accommodating the quarrel. When this idea, which is so natural, was once suggested, it was willingly received both by sovereign and people. The numerous fines which were levied, augmented the revenue of the king: and the people were sensible that he would be more vigilant in interposing with his good offices, when he reaped such immediate advantage from them; and that injuries would be less frequent, when, besides compensation to the person injured, they were exposed to this additional penalty.†

This short abstract contains the history of the criminal jurisprudence of the northern nations for several centuries. The state of England, in this particular, during the period of the Anglo-Saxons, may be judged of by the collection of ancient laws, published by Lambard and Wilkins. The chief purport of these laws is not to prevent or entirely suppress private quarrels, which the legislator knew to be impossible, but only to regulate and moderate them. The laws of Alfred enjoin, that if any one know that his enemy or aggressor, after doing him an injury, resolves to keep within his own house and his own lands,‡ he shall not fight him till he require compensation for the injury. If he be strong enough to besiege him in his house, he may do it for seven days without attacking him; and if the aggressor be willing, during that time, to surrender himself and his arms, his adversary may detain him thirty days; but is afterwards obliged to restore him safe to his kindred, and be content with the compensation. If the criminal fly to the temple, that sanctuary must not be violated. Where the assailant has not force sufficient to besiege the criminal in his house, he must apply to the alderman for assistance; and if the alderman refuse aid, the assailant must have recourse to the king: and he is not allowed to assault the house, till after this supreme magistrate has refused assistance. If any one meet with his enemy, and be ignorant that he was resolved to keep within his own lands, he must, before he attack him, require him to surrender himself prisoner, and deliver up his arms; in which case he may detain him thirty days: but if he refuse to deliver up his arms, it is then law-

* The author says, that the price of the composition was fixed: which must have been by the laws and the interposition of the magistrates.

† Besides paying money to the relations of the deceased and to the king, the murderer was also obliged to pay the master of a slave, or vassal, a sum as the compensation for his loss. This was called the Manbote.

‡ The addition of these last words in italics appears necessary from what follows in the same law.

* Called by the Saxons mægbot.

ful to fight him. A slave may fight in his master's quarrel: a father may fight in his son's with any one, except with his master.

It was enacted by King Ina, that no man should take revenge for an injury till he had first demanded compensation, and had been refused it.

King Edmund, in the preamble to his laws, mentions the general misery occasioned by the multiplicity of private feuds and battles; and he established several expedients for remedying this grievance. He ordains, that if any one commit murder, he may, with the assistance of his kindred, pay within a twelvemonth the fine of his crime; and if they abandon him, he shall alone sustain the deadly feud or quarrel with the kindred of the murdered person: his own kindred are free from the feud, but on condition that they neither converse with the criminal, nor supply him with meat or other necessities: if any of them, after renouncing him, receive him into their house, or give him assistance, they are finable to the king, and are involved in the feud. If the kindred of the murdered person take revenge on any but the criminal himself after he is abandoned by his kindred, all their property is forfeited, and they are declared to be enemies to the king and all his friends. It is also ordained, that the fine for murder shall never be remitted by the king; and that no criminal shall be killed, who flies to the church, or any of the king's towns; and the king himself declares, that his house shall give no protection to murderers, till they have satisfied the church by their penance, and the kindred of the deceased, by making compensation. The method appointed for transacting this composition is founded in the same law.

These attempts of Edmund, to contract and diminish the feuds, were contrary to the ancient spirit of the northern barbarians, and were a step towards a more regular administration of justice. By the Salic law, any man might, by a public declaration, exempt himself from his family quarrels: but then he was considered by the law as no longer belonging to the family, and he was deprived of all right of succession, as the punishment of his cowardice.

The price of the king's head, or his weregild,* as it was then called, was by law 30,000 thrimas, near 1300 pounds of present money. The price of the prince's head was 15,000 thrimas; that of a bishop's, or alderman's, 8000; a sheriff's, 4000; a thane's, or clergyman's, 2000; a ceorle's, 266. These prices were fixed by the laws of the Angles. By the Mercian law, the price of a ceorle's head was 200 shillings; that of a thane's, six times as much; that of a king's six times more. By the laws of Kent, the price of the archbishop's head was higher than that of the king's. Such respect was then paid to the ecclesiastics! It must be understood, that where a person was unable, or unwilling, to pay the fine, he was put out of the protection of the law, and the kindred of the deceased had liberty to punish him as they thought proper.

Some antiquarians have thought that these compensations were only given for manslaughter, not for wilful murder: but no such distinction appears in the laws; and it is contradicted by the practice of all the other barbarous nations, by that of the ancient Germans, and by that curious monument above mentioned of Saxon antiquity, preserved by

Hickes. There is indeed a law of Alfred's, which makes wilful murder capital;* but this seems only to have been an attempt of that great legislator towards establishing a better police in the kingdom, and it probably remained without execution. By the laws of the same prince, a conspiracy against the life of the king might be redeemed by a fine.

The price of all kinds of wounds was likewise fixed by the Saxon laws: a wound of an inch long under the hair, was paid with one shilling: one of a like size in the face two shillings: thirty shillings for the loss of an ear; and so forth. There seems not to have been any difference made, according to the dignity of the person. By the laws of Ethelbert, any one who committed adultery with his neighbour's wife was obliged to pay him a fine, and buy him another wife,

These institutions are not peculiar to the ancient Germans. They seem to be the necessary progress of criminal jurisprudence among every free people, where the will of the sovereign is not implicitly obeyed. We find them among the ancient Greeks during the time of the Trojan war. Compositions for murder are mentioned in Nestor's speech to Achilles in the ninth Iliad. The Irish, who never had any connexions with the German nations, adopted the same practice till very lately; and the price of a man's head was called among them his eric; as we learn from Sir John Davis. The same custom seems also to have prevailed among the Jews.

Theft and robbery were frequent among the Anglo-Saxons. In order to impose some check upon these crimes, it was ordained that no man should sell or buy any thing above twenty-pence value, except in open market; and every bargain of sale must be executed before witnesses. Gangs of robbers much disturbed the peace of the country; and the law determined, that a tribe of banditti, consisting of between seven and thirty-five persons, was to be called a turma or troop: any greater company was denominated an army. The punishments for this crime were various, but none of them capital. If any man could track his stolen cattle into another's ground, the latter was obliged to show the tracks out of it, to pay their value.

Rebellion, to whatever excess it was carried, was not capital, but might be redeemed by a sum of money. The legislators, knowing it impossible to prevent all disorders, only imposed a higher fine on breaches of the peace committed in the king's court, or before an alderman, or bishop. An alehouse too seems to have been considered as a privileged place; and any quarrels that arose there were more severely punished than elsewhere.

If the manner of punishing crimes among the Anglo-Saxons appear singular, the proofs were not less so; and were also the natural result of the situation of those people. Whatever we may imagine concerning the usual truth and sincerity of men who live in a rude and barbarous state, there is much more falsehood, and even perjury, among them, than among civilized nations: virtue, which is nothing but a more enlarged and more cultivated reason, never flourishes to any degree, nor is founded on steady principles of honour,

* It is probable, that by a wilful murder Alfred means a treacherous murder, committed by one who has no declared feud with another except where a good education becomes general; and where men are taught the pernicious consequences of vice, treachery, and immorality. Even superstition, though more prevalent among ignorant nations, is but a poor supply for the defects in knowledge and education: our European ancestors, who employed every moment the expedient of swearing on extraordinary crosses and relics, were less honourable in all engagements than their posterity, who, from experience, have omitted those ineffectual securities. This general proneness to perjury was much increased by the usual want of discernment in judges, who could not discuss an intricate evidence, and were obliged to number, not weigh, the testimony of the witnesses.* Hence the ridiculous practice of obliging men to bring compurgators, who, as they did not pretend to know any thing of the fact, expressed upon oath, that they believed the person spoke true; and these compurgators were in some cases multiplied to the number of three hundred. The practice also of single combat was employed by most nations on the continent as a remedy against false evidence; and though it was frequently dropped, from the opposition of the clergy, it was continually revived from experience of the falsehood attending the testimony of witnesses. It became at last a species of jurisprudence: the cases were determined by law, in which the party might challenge his adversary, or the witnesses, or the judge himself: and though these customs were absurd, they were rather an improvement on the methods of trial which had formerly been practised among these barbarous nations, and which still prevailed among the Anglo-Saxons.

When any controversy about a fact became too intricate for those ignorant judges to unravel, they had recourse to what they called the judgment of God, that is, to fortune: their methods of consulting this oracle were various. One of them was the decision by the cross: it was practised in this manner. When a person was accused of any crime, he first cleared himself by oath, and he was attended by eleven compurgators. He next took two pieces of wood, one of which was marked with the sign of the cross, and wrapping both up in wool, he placed them on the altar, or on some celebrated relic. After solemn prayers for the success of the experiment, a priest, or in his stead, some inexperienced youth, took up one of the pieces of wood, and if he fixed upon that which was marked with the figure of a cross, the person was pronounced innocent; if otherwise, guilty. This practice, as it arose from superstition, was abolished by it in France. The Emperor Louis the Debonnaire prohibited that method of trial, not because it was uncertain, but lest that sacred figure, says he, of the cross, should be prostituted in common disputes and controversies.

The ordeal was another established method of trial among the Anglo-Saxons. It was practised either by boiling water or red-hot iron. The former was appropriated to the common people; the latter to the nobility. The water, or iron, was consecrated by many prayers, masses, fastings, and exorcisms; after which the person accused either took up a stone sunk in the water to a certain depth, or carried the iron to a certain distance; and his hand being wrapped up, and the covering sealed for three days, if there appeared, on examining it, no marks of burning, he was pronounced innocent; if otherwise, guilty. The trial by cold water was different: the person was thrown into consecrated water; if he swam, he was guilty; if he sunk, innocent. It is difficult for us to conceive how any innocent person could ever escape by the one trial, or any criminal be convicted by the other. But there was another usage admirably calculated for allowing every criminal to escape who had confidence enough to try it. A consecrated cake, called a corsned, was produced; which if the person could swallow and digest, he was pronounced innocent.

The feudal law, if it had place at all among the Anglo-Saxons, which is doubtful, was not certainly extended over all the landed property, and was not attended with those consequences of homage, reliefs,* worship, marriage, and other burdens, which were inseparable from it in the kingdoms of the continent. As the Saxons expelled, or almost entirely destroyed the ancient Britons, they planted themselves in this island on the same footing with their ancestors in Germany, and found no occasion for the feudal institutions, which were calculated to maintain a kind of standing army, always in readiness to suppress any insurrection among the conquered people. The trouble and expense of defending the state in England lay equally upon all the land; and it was usual for every five hides to equip a man for the service. The trinoda necessitas, as it was called, or the burden of military expeditions, of repairing highways, and of building and supporting bridges, was inseparable from landed property, even though it belonged to the church, or monasteries, unless exempted by a particular charter. The ceorles, or husbandmen, were provided with arms, and were obliged to take their turn in military duty. There were computed to be 243,600 hides in England; consequently, the ordinary military force of the kingdom consisted of 48,720 men; though, no doubt, on extraordinary occasions, a greater number might be assembled. The king and nobility had some military tenants, who were called Sithcunmen. And there were some lands annexed to the office of alderman, and to other offices; but these probably were not of great extent, and were possessed only during pleasure, as in the commencement of the feudal law in other countries of Europe.

The revenue of the king seems to have consisted chiefly in his demesnes, which were large; and in the tolls and imposts which he probably levied at discretion on the boroughs and seaports that lay within his demesnes. He could not alienate any part of the crown lands, even to religious uses, without the consent of the states. Danegelt was a land-tax of a shilling a hide, imposed by the states, either for payment of the sums exacted by the Danes, or for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence against those invaders.

The Saxon pound, as likewise that which was coined for some centuries after the conquest, was near three times the weight of our present money.

* Sometimes the laws fixed easy general rules for weighing the credibility of witnesses. A man whose life is estimated at 120 shillings, counterbalanced six ceorles, each of whose lives was only valued at twenty shillings, and his oath was esteemed equivalent to that of all the six.

* On the death of an alderman, a greater or lesser thane, there was a payment made to the king of his best arms; and this was called his heriot: but this was not of the nature of a relief. The value of this heriot was fixed by Canute's laws.

there were forty-eight shillings in the pound, and five pence in a shilling; consequently a Saxon shilling was near a fifth heavier than ours, and a Saxon penny near three times as heavy. As to the value of money in those times, compared to commodities, there are some, though not very certain means of computation. A sheep, by the laws of Athelstan, was estimated at a shilling; that is, fifteen-pence of our money. The fleece was two-fifths of the value of the whole sheep, much above its present estimation; and the reason probably was, that the Saxons, like the ancients, were little acquainted with any clothing but what was made of wool. Cotton was quite unknown: and linen was not generally used. An ox was computed at six times the value of a sheep; a cow at four. If we suppose that the cattle in that age, from the defects in husbandry, were not so large as they are at present in England, we may compute that money was then near ten times of greater value. A horse was valued at about thirty-six shillings of our present money, or thirty Saxon shillings; a mare a third less. A man at three pounds. The board wages of a child the first year were eight shillings, together with a cow's pasture in summer, and an ox's in winter. William of Malmesbury mentions it as a remarkably high price, that William Rufus gave fifteen marks for a horse, or about thirty pounds of our present money. Between the years 900 and 1000, Ednoth bought a hide of land for about 118 shillings of our present money. This was little more than a shilling an acre, which indeed appears to have been the usual price, as we may learn from other accounts. A palfrey was sold for twelve shillings about the year 966. The value of an ox in King Ethelred's time, was between seven and eight shillings; a cow about six shillings. Gervas of Tilbury says, that in Henry the First's time, bread, which would suffice a hundred men for a day, was rated at three shillings, or a shilling of that age; for it is thought that, soon after the conquest, a pound sterling was divided into twenty shillings: a sheep was rated at a shilling, and so of other things in proportion. In Athelstan's time, a ram was valued at a shilling, or four-pence Saxon. The tenants of Shireburn were obliged, at their choice, to pay either six-pence, or four hens. About 1232, the abbot of St. Alban's, going on a journey, hired seven handsome stout horses; and agreed, if any of them died on the road, to pay the owner thirty shillings a-piece of our present money. It is to be remarked, that in all ancient times the raising of corn, especially wheat, being a species of manufacture, that commodity always bore a higher price, compared with cattle, than it does in our times. The Saxon Chronicle tells us, that in the reign of Edward the Confessor, there was the most terrible famine ever known; insomuch that a quarter of wheat rose to sixty pennies, or fifteen shillings of our present money. Consequently it was as dear as if it now cost seven pounds ten shillings. This much exceeds the great famine in the end of Queen Elizabeth; when a quarter of wheat was sold for four pounds. Money in this last period was nearly of the same value as in our time. These severe famines are a certain proof of bad husbandry.

On the whole, there are three things to be considered, wherever a sum of money is mentioned in ancient times. First, the change of denomination, by which a pound has been reduced to the third part of its ancient weight in silver. Secondly, the change in value by the greater plenty of money, which has reduced the same weight of silver to ten times less value, compared with commodities; and consequently a pound sterling to the thirtieth part of the ancient value. Thirdly, the fewer people, and less industry, which were then to be found in every European kingdom. This circumstance made even the thirtieth part of the sum more difficult to levy, and caused any sum to have more than thirty times greater weight and influence, both abroad and at home, than in our times; in the same manner that a sum, a hundred thousand pounds, for instance, is at present more difficult to levy in a small state, such as Bavaria, and can produce greater effects on such a small community, than on England. This last difference is not easy to be calculated; but allowing that England has now six times more industry, and three times more people, than it had at the conquest, and for some reigns after that period, we are upon that supposition to conceive, taking all circumstances together, every sum of money mentioned by historians, as if it were multiplied more than a hundred fold above a sum of the same denomination at present.

In the Saxon times, land was divided equally among all the male children of the deceased, according to the custom of gavelkind. The practice of entails is to be found in those times. Land was chiefly of two kinds, bockland, or land held by book or charter, which was regarded as full property, and descended to the heirs of the possessor; and folkland, or the land held by the ceorles and common people, who were removable at pleasure, and were indeed only tenants during the will of their lords.

The first attempt which we find in England to separate the ecclesiastical from the civil jurisdiction, was that law of Edgar, by which all disputes among the clergy were ordered to be carried before the bishop. The penances were then very severe; but as a man could buy them off with money, or might substitute others to perform them, they lay easy upon the rich.

The following brief particulars of the manners of the Anglo-Saxons, are taken from the third volume of Turner's History. Their earliest years were passed under the guidance of females, for whom the Gothic nations had a peculiar respect. On the death of the father, the family was intrusted to the guardianship of the mother.

The crime of abandoning their children by exposing them, prevailed amongst them. The period of infancy closed with the seventh year, and childhood commenced at the eighth, when their governance and education were committed to men, who were generally ecclesiastics.

Their names were expressive of valued qualities or some particular circumstances; for instance, Æthulwulph, the noble wolf. The power of the father was limited, but if compelled by necessity, he might deliver up his son to a state of servitude, that is, slavery, without the child's consent; but a child above fifteen might evade this power by choosing a religious life. Up to the age of fifteen, a father might marry his daughter as he pleased, but not after.

The clergy being the only persons possessing any learning, were the general preceptors of youth.

The Saxon youth seem to have been accustomed to habits of docility and obedience.

The food of the Anglo-Saxons was a mixture of animal and vegetable diet. They reared various sorts of corn in enclosed and cultivated lands, and they domesticated cattle. They had oxen, sheep, and great abundance of swine. They used likewise fowls, deer, goats, and hares. They also ate fish, more particularly eels, which they nourished in the artificial receptacles of dikes and meres. In very early times they used horse-flesh. Wheaten-bread was eaten mostly by the wealthier persons. Barley-bread was the common food, as were also milk, cheese, butter, and eggs. Honey was in great repute. Orchards were cultivated, and figs, grapes, nuts, almonds, and pears, are mentioned. Soups and broths were every-day dishes. Ale and mead were their favourite drinks; wine was used as an occasional luxury. Other liquors are incidentally mentioned, viz., Pigment, which was a sweet and odoriferous liquor made of honey, wine, and spices of various kinds; and Morat, also made of honey diluted with the juice of mulberries. Cider was also known.

They were intemperate. We have a glance of their customs in a passage of an old chronicler, who says, "When all were satisfied with their dinner, and their tables were removed, they continued drinking till the evening."

They seem to have had places like taverns or ale-houses, where liquor was sold.

They broiled, baked, and boiled their food. Men and women mingled indiscriminately at the dining-table. They used cloths for the table, and had knives (but not forks), dishes, spoons, and bowls. They drank out of gold and silver cups and horns, which were variously ornamented.

They had variety and vanity in dress. Women of rank wore necklaces, bracelets, and rings with gems. Their hair was artificially dressed with hot irons: fine hair was a great desideratum in their value of personal beauty. Rouge was also known, which is no proof of refinement of manners, as many barbarous nations use it. Mantles, kirtles, and gowns were in use. In the drawings on the manuscripts of these times, the women appear with a long loose robe, reaching down to the ground, and large loose sleeves. Upon the head is a hood or veil, which, falling down before, was wrapped round the neck and breast. Their heads have no other covering than the hood.

In the dress of the men a feminine taste prevailed. They had sometimes gold and precious stones round the neck, and the wealthy wore costly bracelets and rings. They had silk, linen, and woollen garments: silk, from its costliness, was only used by the wealthy. The fashion of their garments of course varied. They had large mantles, which were ornamented with gold and gems. Close coats or tunics, girded with a belt, which Strutt represents as having been put on over the head like a shirt. Many persons having supposed the smockfrock of the husbandmen of our own day is a pure piece of Saxon costume; and if it was well made, tightened with a broad belt, and on a man of good carriage, it would form a much handsomer drapery than the unmeaning stiff-cut coats of our time. Socks and stockings, and other covering for the legs, are mentioned by their writers.

In the Bayeux tapestry the Saxons are represented, both nobles and inferiors, in caps or bonnets. Close coats, with sleeves to the wrists, which are girded round them with a belt, and have loose skirts like kelts, but not reaching quite to the knee. Breeches covering the knees. Short cloaks buttoned on the right shoulder. Shoes which seem close round the ankle.

The delineations of the Saxon manuscripts almost universally represent the hair of the men as divided from the crown to the forehead, and combed down the sides of the head in waving ringlets. Their beards were continuations of their whiskers on each side, meeting the hair from the chin, but there dividing, and ending in two forked points. Young men usually, and sometimes servants, are represented without beards. The clergy were forbidden to wear beards; and in Harold the Second's time, the laity only had a mustachio on the upper lip.

They were partial to vivid and glaring colours, and much ornament.

The clergy were compelled to wear plain dresses. Furs, as lining, were in use with all classes.

In their ecclesiastical buildings the Anglo-Saxons were expensive and magnificent; their dwelling-houses seem to have been small and inconvenient.

Their furniture was most probably heavy, rude, and ill-fashioned. Whatever invention in this kind of luxuries they possessed was gained from the clergy, whose communication with Rome gave them the means of introducing many of the mechanical arts.

Hangings for rooms to supply the defects of their coarse carpentry were amongst the first of their articles of furniture. Benches and stools with coverings, are mentioned as their seats. These appear to have been much ornamented with devices of animals and flowers as at present. Their tables were occasionally very costly, being sometimes of silver and gold, but generally of wood; they were sometimes inlaid with gold, silver, and gems. Candlesticks of various sorts were used, as also bells, both large and small. Mirrors of silver; beds and bed-hangings, and coverlets of bear and other skins.

Gold and silver, of which they seem to have possessed a great deal, was used for cups and bowls and other utensils, and also to adorn their sword-hilts, saddles, bridles, and banners. Their gold rings contained gems; and even their garments, saddles, and bridles, were sometimes jewelled.

Spices were a great luxury, and came from India through Italy. Four ounces of cinnamon were sent from one church dignitary to another as a rare present.

Hot baths were much used, but not cold, except as a penitentiary punishment.

Their amusements were very convivial, they delighted in minstrelsy, and, like most uncultivated minds, in tricks of agility and sleight of hand. The chief amusements were hunting and hawking.

Tournaments appear to have been used in the age of the Saxons.

The Anglo-Saxons were very superstitious. They had many pretenders to witchcraft. They believed in the powers of philtres and spells, and invoked spirits. They confided in prognostics, and believed in the influence of particular times and seasons.

The northern nations, at one period, burnt their dead. But the custom of interring the body ha become established among the Anglo-Saxons, at the era when their history began to be recorded by their Christian clergy, and was never discontinued.

Their common coffins were wood, the more costly were stone. Thus a nun, who had been buried in a wooden coffin, was afterwards placed in one of stone. Their kings were interred in stone coffins; they were buried in linen, and the clergy in their vestments. Friends are described as attending in illness round the bed of the dying, and on their death, tearing their clothes and hair. At first, none but the very pious were buried in the church. Every free person who died was expected to have previously provided a handsome present for the church.

The population at the time of the Norman conquest may be estimated at about two millions of souls. There can be no doubt that nearly three-fourths of the Anglo-Saxon population were in a state of slavery.

The Anglo-Saxon scholars formed themselves on the Roman writers. Few even among the ecclesiastics had any pretensions to originality. Their poetry even seems formed on a classical model; the wild songs of the northern bards having given way to the Christian poets, who appear to have been close imitators of the worst writers of the lower empire, turgid and inflated. Their scientific knowledge was as limited as the rest of Europe, and abounded with the grossest absurdities. They practised medicine, but had no scientific knowledge of it, depending more on charms and exorcisms, than on their own knowledge.

They had the musical instruments of chords, and wind instruments.

The progress of the Anglo-Saxons in the art of design and painting was very limited. The talents of the artists varied, but none bear the impress of genius, or even correctness; such as it was, it was chiefly employed in illuminating manuscripts. Of their sculpture and carving we know but little. Their rings and ornamented horns, and the jewel of Alfred, found in the Isle of Athelney, show that they had the art of engraving on metals and other substances with much neatness of mechanical execution, though with little taste or design.

The first Saxon churches were all built of wood. Greensted church, in Essex, is a curious and perhaps unique specimen of this kind of architecture. They were ultimately constructed of stone, and their highest characteristic is vastness. They are heavy, and seem to be the result of a gloomy imagination. In 676, Benedict sought for masons to complete a church in the Roman manner, which he loved; and for the first time procured glass-makers from Gaul to make latticed windows.

The Anglo-Saxons cultivated the art of husbandry with some attention. They used hedges and ditches to separate their fields and lands. They had ploughs, rakes, sickles, scythes, forks, and flails, very like those that are now commonly used. They had also carts or waggons. Their windmills and watermills are frequently mentioned in every period of their history.

The hide was the common measure of land; it seems to have denominated about one hundred and twenty acres.

The more ancient Saxons are described by the Roman writers as having a curved sword, or rather scimitar, a buckler, and dagger; but on their arrival in Britain, and afterwards, their swords were double-edged, straight, broad, and pointed. The infantry were more various in their implements than the cavalry: the former used either spears, battle-axes, or clubs. Their shields were of a moderate size, oval and convex, and with a spike in the centre. It is said, they had not defensive armour for the body until the eighth century; but this seems scarcely credible, as they found the Britons using the Roman, and its utility would strike them before three hundred years. The Danes varied but little in their weapons from the Saxons; their spears and swords were longer, and they fought more with the battle-axe. The bow was not in use as a military weapon, though used occasionally in hunting. The cavalry are uniformly represented with a long spear in the right-hand, and a sword on the left side.

We cannot leave the Anglo-Saxons, the nation that may be considered as the main stock from which we are derived, without a glance at their character. They seem to have been, on their first arrival, a generous race of savages, totally, of course, uncultivated in mind, but still of a free, brave, and enterprising disposition. The vices recorded of them are not of a base nature; their intemperance was palliated by hospitality, and their love of war by valour and spirit. They had not the cold-blooded selfishness of the Normans. They were guided by impulses, which were more frequently tending to good than evil, though deteriorated and perverted by ignorance, and false views of right and wrong. That they were ready to do right when they were shown, is proved by their ready conversion to the benevolent doctrines of Christianity. They respected women, and were careful in the education of youth. Their laws betray a spirit of natural equity, and very often of most generous and amiable feelings. Their institutions were founded on notions of freedom and justice, and permitted the exercise of individual will, which gave variety, manliness, and force, to their character. They flourished in a dark age, and were shrouded in the errors of the time; but still we must look back on them as the wild but noble founders of whatever is liberal in our institutions, and regard them as the firm and resolute maintainers of the rational equality of mankind, and as the fathers of those precepts of freedom which the Norman despotism was never able entirely to eradicate. Their love of liberty might not be the offspring of cultivated reason nor of elevated benevolence, but it was engendered by an indomitable hatred of oppression, and an intrepid sense of their own personal rights. This has descended in many instances to our time, and, aided by the advance of knowledge, may lead us to the desired state of liberty without lawlessness, and public spirit without faction.

CHAPTER VII.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

Consequences of the battle of Hastings—Submission of the English—Settlement of the government—King's return to Normandy—Discontents of the English—Their insurrections—Rigours of the Norman government—New insurrections—New rigours of the government—Introduction of the feudal law—Innovation in ecclesiastical government—Insurrection of the Norman barons—Dispute about investitures—Revolt of Prince Robert—Domesday-book—The New Forest—War with France—Death and Character of William the Conqueror.

NOTHING could exceed the consternation which seized the English when they received intelligence of the unfortunate battle of Hastings, the death of their king, the slaughter of their principal nobility, and of their bravest warriors, and the rout and dispersion of the remainder. But though the loss which they had sustained in that fatal action was considerable, it might have been repaired by a great nation, where the people were generally armed, and where there resided so many powerful noblemen in every province, who could have assembled their retainers, and have obliged the duke of Normandy to divide his army, and probably to waste it in a variety of actions and rencounters. It was thus that the kingdom had formerly resisted for many years its invaders, and had been gradually subdued by the continued efforts of the Romans, Saxons, and Danes; and equal difficulties might have been apprehended by William in this bold and hazardous enterprise. But there were several vices in the Anglo-Saxon constitution, which rendered it difficult for the English to defend their liberties in so critical an emergency. The people had in a great measure lost all national pride and spirit, by their recent and long subjection to the Danes: and as Canute had, in the course of his administration, much abated the rigours of conquest, and had governed them equitably by their own laws, they regarded with the less terror the ignominy of a foreign yoke, and deemed the inconveniences of submission less formidable, than those of bloodshed, war, and resistance. Their attachment also to the ancient royal family had been much weakened, by their habits of submission to the Danish princes, and by their late election of Harold, or their acquiescence in his usurpation. And as they had long been accustomed to regard Edgar Atheling, the only heir of the Saxon line, as unfit to govern them even in times of order and tranquillity, they could entertain small hopes of his being able to repair such great losses as they had sustained, or to withstand the victorious arms of the duke of Normandy.

That they might not, however, be altogether wanting to themselves in this extreme necessity, the English took some steps towards adjusting their disjointed government, and uniting themselves against the common enemy. The two potent earls, Edwin and Morcar, who had fled to London with the remains of the broken army, took the lead on this occasion, in concert with Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, a man possessed of great authority and of ample revenues, they proclaimed Edgar, and endeavoured to put the people in a posture of defence, and encourage them to resist the Normans. But the terror of the late defeat, and the near neighbourhood of the invaders, increased the confusion inseparable from great revolutions; and every resolution proposed was hasty, fluctuating, tumultuary; disconcerted by fear or faction, ill-planned, and worse executed.

William, that his enemies might have no time to recover from their consternation, or unite their counsels, immediately put himself in motion after his victory, and resolved to prosecute an enterprise, which nothing but celerity and vigour could render finally successful. His first attempt was against Romney, whose inhabitants he severely punished, on account of their cruel treatment of some Norman seamen and soldiers who had been carried thither by stress of weather, or by a mistake in their course: and foreseeing that his conquest of England might still be attended with many difficulties and much opposition, he deemed it necessary, before he should advance further into the country, to make himself master of Dover, which would both secure him a retreat in case of adverse fortune, and afford him a safe landing-place for such supplies as might be requisite for pushing his advantages. The terror diffused by his victory at Hastings was so great, that the garrison of Dover, though numerous and well-provided, immediately capitulated; and as the Normans, rushing in to take possession of the town, hastily set fire to some of the houses, William, desirous to conciliate the minds of the English by an appearance of lenity and justice, made compensation to the inhabitants for their losses.

The Norman army, being much distressed with a dysentery, was obliged to remain here eight days; but the duke, on their recovery, advanced with quick marches towards London, and by his approach increased the confusions which were already so prevalent in the English counsels. The ecclesiastics in particular, whose influence was great over the people, began to declare in his favour; and as most of the bishops and dignified clergymen were even then Frenchmen or Normans, the pope's bull, by which his enterprise was avowed and hallowed, was now openly insisted on as a reason for general submission. The superior learning of those prelates, which, during the Confessor's reign, had raised them above the ignorant Saxons, made their opinions be received with implicit faith; and a young prince like Edgar, whose capacity was deemed so mean, was but ill-qualified to resist the impression which they made on the minds of the people. A repulse which a body of Londoners received from five hundred Norman horse, renewed in the city the terror of the great defeat at Hastings; the easy submission of all the inhabitants of Kent was an additional discouragement to them; the burning of Southwark before their eyes, made them dread a like fate to their own city; and no man any longer entertained thoughts but of immediate safety and of self-preservation. Even the Earls Edwin and Morcar, in despair of making effectual resistance, retired with their troops to their own provinces; and the people thenceforth disposed themselves unanimously to yield to the victor. As soon as he passed the Thames at Wallingford, and reached Berkhamstead, Stigand, the primate, made submissions to him. Before he came within sight of the city, all the chief nobility, and Edgar Atheling himself, the new-elected king, came into his camp, and declared their intention of yielding to his authority. They requested him to mount their throne, which they now considered as vacant; and declared to him, that as they had always been ruled by regal power, they desired to follow, in this particular, the example of their ancestors, and knew of no one more worthy than himself to hold the reins of government.

Though this was the great object to which the duke's enterprise tended, he feigned to deliberate on the offer; and, being desirous, at first, of preserving the appearance of a legal administration, he wished to obtain a more explicit and formal consent of the English nation: but Aimar of Aquitaine, a man equally respected for valour in the field and for prudence in council, remonstrating with him on the danger of delay in so critical a conjuncture, he laid aside all further scruples, and accepted of the crown which was tendered him. Orders were immediately issued to prepare everything for the ceremony of his coronation; but as he was yet afraid to place entire confidence in the Londoners, who were numerous and warlike, he meanwhile commanded fortresses to be erected, in order to curb the inhabitants, and to secure his person and government.

Stigand was not much in the duke's favour, both because he had intruded into the see on the expulsion of Robert the Norman, and because he possessed such influence and authority over the English as might be dangerous to a new-established monarch. William, therefore, pretending that the primate had obtained his pall in an irregular manner from Pope Benedict IX., who was himself a usurper, refused to be consecrated by him, and conferred this honour on Aldred, archbishop of York. Westminster-abbey was the place appointed for that magnificent ceremony; the most considerable of the nobility, both English and Norman, attended the duke on this occasion; Aldred, in a short speech, asked the former whether they agreed to accept of William as their king; the bishop of Constance put the same question to the latter; and both being answered with acclamations, Aldred administered to the duke the usual coronation-oath, by which he bound himself to protect the church, to administer justice, and to repress violence: he then anointed him, and put the crown upon his head.* There appeared nothing but joy in the countenances of the spectators: but in that very moment there burst forth the strongest symptoms of the jealousy and animosity which prevailed between the nations, and which continually increased during the reign of this prince. The Norman soldiers, who were placed without, in order to guard the church, hearing the shouts within, fancied that the English were offering violence to their duke; and they immediately assaulted the populace, and set fire to the neighbouring houses. The alarm was conveyed to the nobility who surrounded the prince; both the English and Normans, full of apprehensions, rushed out to secure themselves from the present danger; and it was with difficulty that William himself was able to appease the tumult.

The king, thus possessed of the throne by a pretended destination of King Edward, and by an irregular election of the people, but still more by force of arms, retired from London to Barking in Essex; and there received the submissions of all the nobility who had not attended his coronation. Edric, surnamed the Forester, grand-nephew to that Edric so noted for his repeated acts of perfidy during the reigns of Ethelred and Edmund; Earl Coxo, a man famous for bravery; even Edwin and Morcar, earls of Mercia and Northumberland; with the other principal noblemen of England, came and swore fealty to him; were received into favour, and were confirmed in the possession of their estates and dignities. Everything bore the appearance of peace and tranquillity; and William had no other occupation than to give contentment to the foreigners who had assisted him to mount the throne, and to his new subjects, who had so readily submitted to him.

He had got possession of all the treasure of Harold, which was considerable; and being also supplied with rich presents from the opulent men in all parts of England, who were solicitous to gain the favour of their new sovereign, he distributed great sums among his troops, and by this liberality gave them hopes of obtaining at length those more durable establishments which they had expected from his enterprise. Their ecclesiastics, both at home and abroad, had much forwarded his success; and he failed not in return, to express his gratitude and devotion in the manner which was most acceptable to them: he sent Harold's standard to the pope, accompanied with many valuable presents. All the considerable monasteries and churches in France, where prayers had been put up for his success, now tasted of his bounty. The English monks found him well disposed to favour their order; and he built a new convent near Hastings, which he called Battle Abbey, and which, on pretence of supporting monks to pray for his own soul, and for that of Harold, served as a lasting memorial of his victory.

He introduced into England that strict execution of justice for which his administration had been much celebrated in Normandy; and even during this violent revolution, every disorder or oppression met with rigorous punishment. His army, in particular, was governed with severe discipline; and notwithstanding the insolence of victory, care was taken to give as little offence as possible to the jealousy of the vanquished. The king appeared solicitous to unite in an amicable manner the Normans and the English, by intermarriages and alliances; and all his new subjects who approached his person, were received with affability and regard. No signs of suspicion appeared, not even towards Edgar Atheling, the heir of the ancient royal family, whom William confirmed in the honours of earl of Oxford, conferred on him by Harold, and whom he affected to treat with the highest kindness, as nephew to the Confessor, his great friend and benefactor. Though he confiscated the estates of Harold, and of those who had fought in the battle of Hastings on the side of that prince, whom he represented as a usurper, he seemed willing to admit of every plausible excuse for past opposition to his pretensions, and he received many into favour who had carried arms against him. He confirmed the liberties and immunities of London and the other cities of England; and appeared desirous of replacing everything on ancient establishments. In his whole administration he bore the resemblance of the lawful prince, not of the conqueror; and the English began to flatter themselves that they had changed, not the form of their government, but the succession only of their sovereigns, a matter which gave them small concern. The better to reconcile his new subjects to his authority, William made a progress through some parts of England; and besides a splendid court and majestic presence, which overawed the people, already struck with his military fame, the appearance of his clemency and justice gained the approbation of the wise, attentive to the first steps of their new sovereign.

* Malmesbury says, that he also promised to govern the Normans and English by equal laws; and this addition to the usual oath seems not improbable, considering the circumstances of the times.

But amidst this confidence and friendship which he expressed for the English, the king took care to place all real power in the hands of his Normans, and still to keep possession of the sword, to which he was sensible he had owed his advancement to sovereign authority. He disarmed the city of London and other places, which appeared most warlike and populous; and building citadels in that capital, as well as in Winchester, Hereford, and the cities best situated for commanding the kingdom, he quartered Norman soldiers in all of them, and left nowhere any power able to resist or oppose him. He bestowed the forfeited estates on the most eminent of his captains, and established funds for the payment of his soldiers. And thus, while his civil administration carried the face of a legal magistrate, his military institutions were those of a master and tyrant; at least, one who reserved to himself, whenever he pleased, the power of assuming that character.

By this mixture, however, of vigour and lenity, he had so soothed the minds of the English, that he thought he might safely revisit his native country, and enjoy the triumph and congratulation of his ancient subjects. He left the administration in the hands of his uterine brother, Odo, bishop of Baieux, and of William Fitz Osborne. That their authority might be exposed to less danger, he carried over with him all the most considerable nobility of England, who, while they served to grace his court by their presence and magnificent retinues, were in reality hostages for the fidelity of the nation. Among these were Edgar Atheling, Stigand, the primate, the Earls Edwin and Morcar, Waltheof, the son of the brave Earl Siward, with others, eminent for the greatness of their fortunes and families, or for their ecclesiastical and civil dignities. He was visited at the abbey of Fescamp, where he resided during some time, by Rodolph, uncle to the king of France, and by many powerful princes and nobles, who, having contributed to his enterprise, were desirous of participating in the joy and advantages of its success. His English courtiers, willing to ingratiate themselves with their new sovereign, outvied each other in equipages and entertainments; and made a display of riches, which struck the foreigners with astonishment. William of Poitiers, a Norman historian, who was present, speaks with admiration of the beauty of their persons, the size and workmanship of their silver plate, the costliness of their embroideries, an art in which the English then excelled; and he expresses himself in such terms, as tend much to exalt our idea of the opulence and cultivation of the people.* But though everything bore the face of joy and festivity, and William himself treated his new courtiers with great appearance of kindness, it was impossible altogether to prevent the insolence of the Normans; and the English nobles derived little satisfaction from those entertainments, where they considered themselves as led in triumph by their ostentatious conqueror.

In England, affairs took still a worse turn during the absence of the sovereign. Discontents and complaints multiplied everywhere; secret conspiracies were entered into against the government; hostilities were already begun in many places; and everything seemed to menace a revolution, as rapid as that which had placed William on the throne. The historian above mentioned, who is a panegyrist of his master, throws the blame entirely on the fickle and mutinous disposition of the English, and highly celebrates the justice and lenity of Odo's and Fitz Osborne's administration. But other historians, with more probability, impute the cause chiefly to the Normans, who, despising a people that had so easily submitted to the yoke, envying their riches, and grudging the restraints imposed upon their own rapine, were desirous of provoking them to a rebellion, by which they expected to acquire new confiscations and forfeitures, and to gratify those unbounded hopes which they had formed in entering on this enterprise.

It is evident, that the chief reason of this alteration in the sentiments of the English, must be ascribed to the departure of William, who was alone able to curb the violence of his captains, and to overawe the mutinies of the people. Nothing indeed appears more strange, than that this prince, in less than three months after the conquest of a great, warlike, and turbulent nation, should absent himself, in order to revisit his own country, which remained in profound tranquillity, and was not menaced by any of its neighbours; and should so long leave his jealous subjects at the mercy of an insolent and licentious army. Were we not assured of the solidity of his genius and the good sense displayed in all other circumstances of his conduct, we might ascribe this measure to a vain ostentation, which rendered him impatient to display his pomp and magnificence among his ancient subjects. It is therefore more natural to believe, that in so extraordinary a step he was guided by a concealed policy; and that though he had thought proper at first to allure the people to submission by the semblance of a legal administration, he found that he could neither satisfy his rapacious captains, nor secure his unstable government, without further exerting the rights of conquest, and seizing the possessions of the English. In order to have a pretext for this violence, he endeavoured, without discovering his intentions, to provoke and allure them into insurrections, which, he thought, could never prove dangerous; while he detained all the principal nobility in Normandy, while a great and victorious army was quartered in England, and while he himself was so near to suppress any tumult or rebellion. But as no ancient writer has ascribed this tyrannical purpose to William, it called the treasury of Arabia. The English women excel in the use of the needle, and in the embroidery of gold. The men in every species of elegant workmanship. Moreover, the best artists of Germany reside among them; and merchants import into the island the most valuable specimen of foreign manufacture."

* The Norman Chronicler, according to Lingard's translation, says, speaking of England, "That land far surpasses the Gauls in abundance of the precious metals. If in fertility it may be termed the granary of Ceres, in riches it should be scarcely seems allowable, from conjecture alone, to throw such an imputation upon him.

But whether we are to account for that measure from the king's vanity or from his policy, it was the immediate cause of all the calamities which the English endured during this and the subsequent reigns, and gave rise to those mutual jealousies and animosities between them and the Normans, which were never appeased till a long tract of time had gradually united the two nations, and made them one people. The inhabitants of Kent who had first submitted to the conqueror, were the first that attempted to throw off the yoke; and in confederacy with Eastace, count of Boulogne, who had also been disgusted by the Normans, they made an attempt, though without success, on the garrison of Dover. Edric, the Forester, whose possessions lay on the bank of the Severn, being provoked at the depredations of some Norman captains in his neighbourhood, formed an alliance with Bleythan and Rowallan, two Welsh princes; and endeavoured, with their assistance, to repel force by force. But though these open hostilities were not very considerable, the disaffection was general among the English, who had become sensible, though too late, of their defenceless condition, and began already to experience those insults and injuries which a nation must always expect, that allows itself to be reduced to that abject situation. A secret conspiracy was entered into to perpetrate in one day a general massacre of the Normans, like that which had formerly been executed upon the Danes; and the quarrel was become so general and national, that the vassals of Earl Coxo, having desired him to head them in an insurrection, and finding him resolute in maintaining his fidelity to William, put him to death as a traitor to his country.

With regard to Coxo (or Copsi, as he is variously named), the fact appears to be, that he was a renegade to the Saxon interest. In Edward's time (according to Lingard), he was deputy to Tostig, in Northumbria, but subsequently on the appointment of Morcar, a thane of the name of Osulf, had taken his office and continued in it, until the Norman conquest, when he was deprived of it, and the pliant Coxo was reinstated. Osulf, aided by private resentment, employed the indignant hatred of his countrymen against the foreign tyrants, and surprised his competitor at Newburn. Coxo sought shelter in the church, which was set on fire. The flames drove him to the door, and Osulf gratified his private hatred under the semblance of patriotism, and cut down his rival.

The king, informed of these dangerous discontents, hastened back to England; and by his presence, and the vigorous measures which he pursued, disconcerted all the schemes of the conspirators. Such of them as had been more violent in their mutiny, betrayed their guilt by flying, or concealing themselves; and the confiscation of their estates, while it increased the number of malcontents, both enabled William to gratify further the rapacity of his Norman captains, and gave them the prospect of new forfeitures and attainders. The king began to regard all his English subjects as inveterate and irreclaimable enemies; and thenceforth either embraced, or was more fully confirmed in the resolution of seizing their possessions, and of reducing them to the most abject slavery. Though the natural violence and severity of his temper made him incapable of feeling any remorse in the execution of this tyrannical purpose, he had art enough to conceal his intention, and to preserve still some appearance of justice in his oppressions. He ordered all the English who had been arbitrarily expelled by the Normans during his absence, to be restored to their estates;* but at the same time he imposed a general tax on the people, that of Danegelt, which had been abolished by the confessor, and which had always been extremely odious to the nation.

As the vigilance of William overawed the malcontents, their insurrections were more the result of an impatient humour in the people, than of any regular conspiracy, which could give them a rational hope of success against the established power of the Normans. The inhabitants of Exeter, instigated by Githa, mother to King Harold, refused to admit a Norman garrison, and betaking themselves to arms, were strengthened by the accession of the neighbouring inhabitants of Devonshire and Cornwall. The king hastened with his forces to chastise this revolt; and on his approach, the wiser and more considerable citizens, sensible of the unequal contest, persuaded the people to submit, and to deliver hostages for their obedience. A sudden mutiny of the populace broke this agreement; and William appearing before the walls, ordered the eyes of one of the hostages to be put out, as an earnest of that severity which the rebels must expect if they persevered in their revolt. The inhabitants were anew seized with terror, and surrendering at discretion, threw themselves at the king's feet, and supplicated his clemency and forgiveness. William was not destitute of generosity, when his temper was not hardened either by policy or passion: he was prevailed on to pardon the rebels, and he set guards on all the gates, in order to prevent the rapacity and insolence of his soldiery. Githa escaped with her treasures to Flanders. The malcontents of Cornwall imitated the example of Exeter, and met with like treatment: and the king, having built a citadel in that city, which he put under the command of Baldwin, son of Earl Gilbert, returned to Winchester, and dispersed his army into their quarters. He was here joined by his wife Matilda, who had not before visited England, and whom he now ordered to be crowned by Archbishop Aldred. Soon after, she brought him an accession to his family by the birth of a fourth son, whom he named Henry. His three elder sons, Robert, Richard, and William, still resided in Normandy.

But though the king appeared thus fortunate, both in public and domestic life, the discontents of his English subjects augmented daily; and the injuries committed and suffered on both sides, rendered the quarrel between them and the Normans absolutely incurable. The insolence of victorious masters, dispersed throughout the kingdom, seemed intolerable to the natives; and wherever they found the Normans, separate or assembled in small bodies, they secretly set upon them, and gratified their vengeance by the slaughter of their enemies. But an insurrection in the north drew thither the general attention, and seemed to threaten more important consequences. Edwin and Morcar appeared at the head of this rebellion; and these potent noblemen, before they took arms, stipulated for foreign succours, from their nephew Bleythan, prince of North Wales, from Malcolm, king of Scotland, and from Sweyn, king of Denmark. Besides the general discontent which had seized the English, the two earls were incited to this revolt by private injuries. William, in order to insure them to his interests, had, on his accession, promised his daughter in marriage to Edwin; but either he had never seriously intended to perform this engagement, or, having changed his plan of administration in England from clemency to rigour, he thought it was to little purpose, if he gained one family, while he enraged the whole nation. When Edwin, therefore, renewed his applications, he gave him an absolute denial; and this disappointment, added to so many other reasons of disgust, induced that nobleman and his brother to concur with their incensed countrymen, and to make one general effort for the recovery of their ancient liberties. William knew the importance of celerity in quelling an insurrection, supported by such powerful leaders, and so agreeable to the wishes of the people; and having his troops always in readiness, he advanced by great journeys to the north. On his march, he gave orders to fortify the castle of Warwick, of which he left Henry de Beaumont governor, and that of Nottingham, which he committed to the custody of William Peverell, another Norman captain. He reached York before the rebels were in any condition for resistance, or were joined by any of the foreign succours which they expected, except a small reinforcement from Wales; and the two earls found no means of safety, but by having recourse to the clemency of the victor. Archil, a potent nobleman in those parts, imitated their example, and delivered his son as a hostage for his fidelity; nor were the people, thus deserted by their leaders, able to make any further resistance. But the treatment which William gave the chiefs, was very different from that which fell to the share of their followers. He observed religiously the terms which he had granted to the former, and allowed them for the present to keep possession of their estates; but he extended the rigours of his confiscations over the latter, and gave away their lands to his foreign adventurers. These planted throughout the whole country, and in possession of the military power, left Edwin and Morcar, whom he pretended to spare, destitute of all support, and ready to fall, whenever he should think proper to command their ruin. A peace which he made with Malcolm, who did him homage for Cumberland, seemed at the same time to deprive them of all prospect of foreign assistance.

The English were now sensible that their final destruction was intended; and that instead of a sovereign, whom they had hoped to gain by their submissions, they had tamely surrendered themselves, without resistance, to a tyrant and a conqueror. Though the early confiscation of Harold's followers might seem iniquitous, being inflicted on men who had never sworn fealty to the duke of Normandy, who were ignorant of his pretensions, and who only fought in defence of the government which they themselves had established in their own country; yet were these rigours, however contrary to the ancient Saxon laws, excused on account of the urgent necessities of the prince; and those who were not involved in the present ruin, hoped that they should henceforth enjoy, without molestation, their possessions and their dignities. But the successive destruction of so many other families convinced them, that the king intended to rely entirely on the support and affections of foreigners; and they foresaw new forfeitures, attainders, and acts of violence, as the necessary result of this destructive plan of administration. They observed, that no Englishman possessed his confidence, or was intrusted with any command or authority; and that the strangers, whom a rigorous discipline could have but ill restrained, were encouraged in their insolence and tyranny against them. The easy submission of the kingdom on its first invasion, had exposed the natives to contempt; the subsequent proofs of their animosity and resentment had made them the object of hatred; and they were now deprived of every expedient by which they could hope to make themselves either regarded or beloved by their sovereign. Impressed with the sense of this dismal situation, many Englishmen fled into foreign countries, with an intention of passing their lives abroad free from oppression, or of returning on a favourable opportunity to assist their friends in the recovery of their native liberties. Edgar Atheling himself, dreading the insidious caresses of William, was persuaded by Cospatric, a powerful Northumbrian, to escape with him into Scotland; and he carried thither his two sisters, Margaret and Christina. They were well received by Malcolm, who soon after espoused Margaret, the elder sister; and partly with a view of strengthening his kingdom by the accession of so many strangers, partly in hopes of employing them against the growing power of William, he gave great countenance to all the English exiles. Many of them settled there, and laid the foundation of families which afterwards became celebrated.

While the English suffered under these oppressions, even the foreigners were not much at their ease; but finding themselves surrounded on all hands by enraged enemies, who took every advantage against them, and menaced them with still more bloody effects of the public resentment, they began to wish again for the tranquillity and security of their native country. Hugh de Grentmesnil and Humphrey de Teliol, though intrusted with great commands, desired to be dismissed the service; and some others imitated their example: a desertion which was highly resented by the king, and which he punished by the confiscation of all their possessions in England. But William's bounty to his followers could not fail of alluring many new adventurers into his service; and the rage of the vanquished English served only to excite the attention of the king and those warlike chiefs, and keep them in readiness to suppress every commencement of domestic rebellion or foreign invasion.

It was not long before they found occupation for their prowess and military conduct. Godwin, Edmund, and Magnus, three sons of Harold, had, immediately after the defeat at Hastings, sought a retreat in Ireland; where, having met with a kind reception from Dermot and other princes of that country, they projected an invasion of England, and they hoped that all the exiles from Denmark, Scotland, and Wales, assisted by forces from these several countries, would at once commence hostilities, and rouse the indignation of the English against their haughty conquerors.

They landed in Devonshire; but found Brian, son of the count of Brittany, at the head of some foreign troops, ready to oppose them; and being defeated in several actions, they were obliged to retreat to their ships, and to return with great loss to Ireland. The efforts of the Normans were now directed to the north, where affairs had fallen into the utmost confusion. The more impatient of the Northumbrians had attacked Robert de Comyn, who was appointed governor of Durham; and gaining the advantage over him from his negligence, they put him to death in that city, with seven hundred of his followers. This success animated the inhabitants of York, who, rising in arms, slew Robert Fitz-Richard their governor; and besieged in the castle William Mallet, on whom the command was now devolved. A little after, the Danish troops landed from three hundred vessels: Osberne, brother to King Sweyn, was intrusted with the command of these forces, and he was accompanied by Harold and Canute, two sons of that monarch. Edgar Atheling appeared from Scotland, and brought along with him Cospatric, Waltheof, Siward, Beane, Merleswain, Adelin, and other leaders, who, partly from the hopes which they gave of Scottish succours, partly from their authority in those parts, easily persuaded the warlike and discontented Northumbrians to join the insurrection. Mallet, that he might better provide for the defence of the citadel of York, set fire to some houses which lay contiguous; but this expedient proved the immediate cause of his destruction. The flames, spreading into the neighbouring streets, reduced the whole city to ashes: the enraged inhabitants, aided by the Danes, took advantage of the confusion to attack the castle, which they carried by assault; and the garrison, to the number of three thousand men, was put to the sword without mercy.

This success proved a signal to many other parts of England, and gave the people an opportunity of showing their detestation of the Normans. Hereward, a nobleman in East-Anglia, celebrated for valour, assembled his followers, and taking shelter in the Isle of Ely, made inroads on all the neighbouring country. The English in the counties of Somerset and Dorset rose in arms, and assaulted Montacute the Norman governor, while the inhabitants of Cornwall and Devon invested Exeter, which from the memory of William's clemency still remained faithful to him. Edric the Forester, calling in the assistance of the Welsh, laid siege to Shrewsbury, and made head against Earl Briant and Fitz Osbourne, who commanded in those quarters. The English, everywhere repenting their former easy submission, seemed determined to make by concert one great effort for the recovery of their liberties, and for the expulsion of their oppressors.

William, undismayed amidst this scene of confusion, assembled his forces, and animating them with the prospect of new confiscations and forfeitures, he marched against the rebels in the north, whom he regarded as the most formidable, and whose defeat he knew would strike a terror into all the other malcontents. Joining policy to force, he tried before his approach to weaken the enemy, by detaching the Danes from them; and he engaged Osberne, by large presents, and by offering him the liberty of plundering the sea-coast, to retire, without committing further hostilities, into Denmark. Cospatric also, in despair of success, made his peace with the king, and paying a sum of money as an atonement for his insurrection, was received into favour, and even invested with the earldom of Northumberland. Waltheof, who long defended York with great courage, was allured with this appearance of clemency; and as William knew how to esteem valour, even in an enemy, that nobleman had no reason to repent of this confidence. Even Edric, compelled by necessity, submitted to the conqueror, and received forgiveness, which was soon after followed by some degree of trust and favour. Malcolm, coming too late to support his confederates, was constrained to retire; and all the English rebels in other parts, except Hereward, who still kept in his fastnesses, dispersed themselves, and left the Normans undisputed masters of the kingdom. Edgar Atheling, with his followers, sought again a retreat in Scotland from the pursuit of his enemies.

But the seeming clemency of William towards the English leaders, proceeded only from artifice, or from his esteem of individuals: his heart was hardened against all compassion towards the people; and he scrupled at no measure, however violent or severe, which seemed requisite to support his plan of tyrannical administration. Sensible of the restless disposition of the Northumbrians, he determined to incapacitate them ever after from giving disturbance, and he issued orders for laying entirely waste that fertile country, which for the extent of sixty miles lies between the Humber and the Tees. The houses were reduced to ashes by the merciless Normans; the cattle seized and driven away; the instruments of husbandry destroyed; and the inhabitants compelled either to seek for a subsistence in the southern parts of Scotland, or if they lingered in England, from a reluctance to abandon their ancient habitations, they perished miserably in the woods from cold and hunger. The lives of a hundred thousand persons are computed to have been sacrificed to this stroke of barbarous policy, which, by seeking a remedy for a temporary evil, thus inflicted a lasting wound on the power and populousness of the nation.

But William, finding himself entirely master of a people who had given him such sensible proofs of their impotent rage and animosity, now resolved to proceed to extremities against all the natives of England, and to reduce them to a condition in which they should no longer be formidable to his government. The insurrections and conspiracies in so many parts of the kingdom, had involved the bulk of the landed proprietors, more or less, in the guilt of treason; and the king took advantage of executing against them, with the utmost rigour, the laws of forfeiture and attainder. Their lives were indeed commonly spared; but their estates were confiscated, and either annexed to the royal demesnes, or conferred with the most profuse bounty on the Normans and other foreigners. While the king's declared intention was to depress, or rather, entirely extirpate, the English gentry, it is easy to believe that scarcely the form of justice would be observed in these violent proceedings; and that any suspicions served as the most undoubted proofs of guilt against a people thus devoted to destruction. It was crime sufficient in an Englishman to be opulent, or noble, or powerful; and the policy of the king, concurring with the rapacity of foreign adventurers, produced almost a total revolution in the landed property of the kingdom. Ancient and honourable families were reduced to beggary; the nobles themselves were everywhere treated with ignominy and contempt; they had the mortification of seeing their castles and manors possessed by Normans of the meanest birth and lowest stations; and they found themselves carefully excluded from every road which led either to riches or preferment.*

As power naturally follows property, this revolution alone gave great security to the foreigners; but William, by the new institutions which he established, took also care to retain for ever the military authority in those hands which had enabled him to subdue the kingdom. He introduced into England the feudal law, which he found established in France and Normandy, and which, during that age, was the foundation both of the stability and of the disorders in most of the monarchical governments of Europe. He divided all the lands of England, with very few exceptions, besides the royal demesnes, into baronies; and he conferred these, with the reservation of stated services and payments, on the most considerable of his adventurers. These great barons, who held immediately of the crown, shared out a great part of their lands to other foreigners, who were denominated knights, or vassals, and who paid their lord the same duty and submission in peace and war, which he himself owed to his sovereign. The whole kingdom contained about 700 chief tenants, and 60,215 knights'-fees; and as none of the native English were admitted into the first rank, the few who retained their landed property were glad to be received into the second, and under the protection of some powerful Norman, to load themselves and their posterity with this grievous burden, for estates which they had received free from their ancestors. The small mixture of English which entered into this civil or military fabric (for it partook of both species), was so restrained by subordination under the foreigners, that the Norman dominion seemed now to be fixed on the most durable basis, and to defy all the efforts of its enemies.

The better to unite the parts of the government, and to bind them into one system, which might serve both for defence against foreigners, and for the support of domestic tranquillity, William reduced the ecclesiastical revenues under the same feudal law; and though he had courted the church on his invasion and accession, he now subjected it to services which the clergy regarded as a grievous slavery, and as totally unbefitting their profession. The bishops and abbots were obliged, when required, to furnish to the king, during war, a number of knights, or military tenants, proportioned to the extent of property possessed by each see or abbey; and they were liable, in case of failure, to the same penalties which were exacted from the laity. The pope and the ecclesiastics exclaimed against this tyranny, as they called it; but the king's authority was so well established over the army, who held everything from his bounty, that superstition itself, even in that age, when it was most prevalent, was constrained to bend under his superior influence.

* The obliging of all the inhabitants to put out the fires and lights at certain hours, upon the sounding of a bell called the corfeu, is represented by Polydore Virgil, lib. 9, as a mark of the servitude of the English. But this was a law of police, which William had previously established in Normandy.

But as the great body of the clergy were still natives, the king had much reason to dread the effects of their resentment: he therefore used the precaution of expelling the English from all the considerable dignities, and of advancing foreigners in their place. The partiality of the Confessor towards the Normans had been so great, that, aided by their superior learning, it had promoted them to many of the sees in England; and even before the period of the conquest, scarcely more than six or seven of the prelates were natives of the country. But among these was Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, a man who, by his address and vigour, by the greatness of his family and alliances, by the extent of his possessions, as well as by the dignity of his office, and his authority among the English, gave jealousy to the king. Though William had on his accession affronted this prelate, by employing the archbishop of York to officiate at his consecration, he was careful on other occasions to load him with honours and caresses, and to avoid giving him further offence till the opportunity should offer of effecting his final destruction. The suppression of the late rebellions, and the total subjection of the English, made him hope that an attempt against Stigand, however violent, would be covered by his great successes, and be overlooked amidst the other important revolutions which affected so deeply the property and liberty of the kingdom. Yet, notwithstanding these great advantages, he did not think it safe to violate the reverence usually paid to the primate but under cover of a new superstition, which he was the great instrument of introducing into England.

The doctrine which exalted the papacy above all human power, had gradually diffused itself from the city and court of Rome; and was, during that age, much more prevalent in the southern than in the northern kingdoms of Europe. Pope Alexander, who had assisted William in his conquests, naturally expected that the French and Normans would import into England the same reverence for his sacred character with which they were impressed in their own country; and would break the spiritual as well as civil independency of the Saxons, who had hitherto conducted their ecclesiastical government with an acknowledgment indeed of primacy in the see of Rome, but without much idea of its title to dominion or authority. As soon, therefore, as the Norman prince seemed fully established on the throne, the pope dispatched Ermenfroy, bishop of Sion, as his legate into England; and this prelate was the first that had ever appeared with that character in any part of the British islands. The king, though he was probably led by principle to pay this submission to Rome, determined, as is usual, to employ the incident as a means of serving his political purposes, and of degrading those English prelates who were become obnoxious to him. The legate submitted to become the instrument of his tyranny; and thought that the more violent the exertion of power, the more certainly did it confirm the authority of that court from which he derived his commission. He summoned, therefore, a council of the prelates and abbots at Winchester; and being assisted by two cardinals, Peter and John, he cited before him Stigand, archbishop of Canterbury, to answer for his conduct. The primate was accused of three crimes; the holding of the see of Winchester together with that of Canterbury; the officiating in the pall of Robert his predecessor; and the having received his own pall from Benedict IX., who was afterwards deposed for simony, and for intrusion into the papacy. These crimes of Stigand were mere pretences; since the first had been a practice not unusual in England, and was never anywhere subjected to a higher penalty than a resignation of one of the sees; the second was a pure ceremonial; and as Benedict was the only pope who then officiated, and his acts were never repealed, all the prelates of the church, especially those who lay at a distance, were excusable for making their applications to him. Stigand's ruin, however, was resolved on, and was prosecuted with great severity. The legate degraded him from his dignity; the king confiscated his estate, and cast him into prison, where he continued in poverty and want during the remainder of his life. Like rigour was exercised against the other English prelates: Agelric, bishop of Selesey, and Agelmare of Elmham, were deposed by the legate, and imprisoned by the king. Many considerable abbots shared the same fate: Egelwin, bishop of Durham, fled the kingdom: Wulstan of Worcester, a man of an inoffensive character, was the only English prelate that escaped this general proscription,* and remained in possession of his dignity. Aldred, archbishop of York, who had set the crown on William's head, had died a little before of grief and vexation, and had left his malediction to that prince, on account of the breach of his coronation-oath, and of the extreme tyranny with which he saw he was determined to treat his English subjects.

It was a fixed maxim in this reign, as well as in some of the subsequent, that no native of the island should ever be advanced to any dignity, ecclesiastical, civil, or military. The king, therefore, upon Stigand's deposition, promoted Lanfranc, a Milanese monk, celebrated for his learning and piety, to the vacant see. This prelate was rigid in defending the prerogatives of his station; and after a long process before the pope, he obliged Thomas, a Norman monk, who had been appointed to the see of York, to acknowledge the primacy of the archbishop of Canterbury. Where ambition can be so happy as to cover its enterprises, even to the person himself, under the appearance of principle, it is the most incurable and inflexible of all human passions. Hence Lanfranc's zeal in promoting the interests of the papacy, by which he himself augmented his own authority, was indefatigable; and met with proportionable success. The devoted attachment to Rome continually increased in England; and being favoured by the sentiments of the conquerors, as well as by the monastic establishments formerly introduced by Edred and by Edgar, it soon reached the same height at which it had, during some time, stood in France and Italy. It afterwards went much further; being favoured by that very remote situation which had at first obstructed its progress; and being less checked by knowledge and a liberal education, which were still somewhat more common in the southern countries.

The prevalence of this superstitious spirit be-

* Brompton relates, that Wulstan was also deprived by the synod: but refusing to deliver his pastoral staff and ring to any but the person from whom he first received it, he went immediately to King Edward's tomb, and struck the staff so deeply into the stone, that none but himself was able to pull it out: upon which he was allowed to keep his bishopric. This instance may serve, instead of many, as a specimen of the monkish miracles.

came dangerous to some of William's successors, and incommodious to most of them. But the arbitrary sway of this king over the English, and his extensive authority over the foreigners, kept him from feeling any immediate inconveniences from it. He retained the church in great subjection, as well as his lay subjects; and would allow none, of whatever character, to dispute his sovereign will and pleasure. He prohibited his subjects from acknowledging any one for pope whom he himself had not previously received. He required that all the ecclesiastical canons, voted in any synod, should first be laid before him, and be ratified by his authority; even bulls or letters from Rome could not legally be produced till they received the same sanction; and none of his ministers or barons, whatever offences they were guilty of, could be subjected to spiritual censures till he himself had given his consent to their excommunication. These regulations were worthy of a sovereign, and kept united the civil and ecclesiastical powers, which the principles introduced by this prince himself had an immediate tendency to separate.

But the English had the cruel mortification to find that their king's authority, however acquired, or however extended, was all employed in their oppression; and that the scheme of their subjection, attended with every circumstance of insult and indignity, was deliberately formed by the prince, and wantonly prosecuted by his followers. William had even entertained the difficult project of totally abolishing the English language; and for that purpose, he ordered that in all schools throughout the kingdom, the youth should be instructed in the French tongue; a practice which was continued from custom till after the reign of Edward III., and was never, indeed, totally discontinued in England. The pleadings in the supreme courts of judicature were in French: the deeds were often drawn in the same language: the laws were composed in that idiom: no other tongue was used at court: it became the language of all fashionable company; and the English themselves, ashamed of their own country, affected to excel in that foreign dialect. From this attention of William, and from the extensive foreign dominions long annexed to the crown of England, proceeded that mixture of French which is at present to be found in the English tongue, and which composes so large a portion of our language. But amidst those endeavours to depress the English nation, the king, moved by the remonstrances of some of his prelates, and by the earnest desires of the people, restored a few of the laws of King Edward; which, though seemingly of no great importance towards the protection of general liberty, gave them extreme satisfaction, as a memorial of their ancient government, and an unusual mark of compliance in their imperious conquerors.*

* What these laws were of Edward the Confessor, which the English, every reign during a century and a half, desired so passionately to have restored, is much disputed by antiquaries; and our ignorance of them seems one of the greatest defects in the ancient English history. The collection of laws in Wilkins, which pass under the name of Edward, are plainly a posterior and an ignorant compilation. Those to be found in Ingulf are genuine; but so imperfect, and contain so few clauses favourable to the subject, that we see no great reason for their contending for them so vehemently. It is probable that the English meant the common law, as it prevailed during the reign of Edward; which we may conjecture to have been more indulgent to liberty than the Norman institutions. The most material articles of it were afterwards comprehended in Magna Charta.

The situation of the two great earls, Morcar and Edwin, became now very disagreeable. Though they had retained their allegiance during this general insurrection of their countrymen, they had not gained the king's confidence, and they found themselves exposed to the malignity of the courtiers, who envied them on account of their opulence and greatness, and at the same time involved them in that general contempt which they entertained for the English. Sensible that they had entirely lost their dignity, and could not even hope to remain long in safety, they determined, though too late to share the same fate with their countrymen. While Edwin retired to his estate in the north, with a view of commencing an insurrection, Morcar took shelter in the Isle of Ely with the brave Hereward, who, secured by the inaccessible situation of the place, still defended himself against the Normans. But this attempt served only to accelerate the ruin of the few English who had hitherto been able to preserve their rank or fortune during the past convulsions. William employed all his endeavours to subdue the Isle of Ely; and having surrounded it with flat-bottomed boats, and made a causeway through the morasses to the extent of two miles, he obliged the rebels to surrender at discretion. Hereward alone forced his way, sword in hand, through the enemy; and still continued his hostilities by sea against the Normans, till at last, William, charmed with his bravery, received him into favour, and restored him to his estate. Earl Morcar, and Egelwin, bishop of Durham, who had joined the malcontents, were thrown into prison, and the latter soon after died in confinement. Edwin, attempting to make his escape into Scotland, was betrayed by some of his followers, and was killed by a party of Normans, to the great affliction of the English, and even to that of William, who paid a tribute of generous tears to the memory of this gallant and beautiful youth. The king of Scotland, in hopes of profiting by these convulsions, had fallen upon the northern counties; but on the approach of William he retired; and when the king entered his country, he was glad to make peace, and to pay the usual homage to the English crown. To complete the king's prosperity, Edgar Atheling himself, despairing of success, and weary of a fugitive life, submitted to his enemy; and receiving a decent pension for his subsistence, was permitted to live in England unmolested. But these acts of generosity towards the leaders were disgraced, as usual, by William's rigour against the inferior malcontents. He ordered the hands to be lopt off, and the eyes to be put out, of many of the prisoners whom he had taken in the Isle of Ely; and he dispersed them in that miserable condition throughout the country, as monuments of his severity.

The province of Maine, in France, had, by the will of Herbert, the last count, fallen under the dominion of William some years before his conquest of England; but the inhabitants, dissatisfied with the Norman government, and instigated by Fulk, count of Anjou, who had some pretensions to the succession, now rose in rebellion, and expelled the magistrates whom the king had placed over them. The full settlement of England afforded him leisure to punish this insult on his authority; but being unwilling to remove his Norman forces from this island, he carried over a considerable army, composed almost entirely of English; and joining them to some troops levied in Normandy, he entered the revolted province. The English appeared ambitious of distinguishing themselves on this occasion, and of retrieving that character of valour which had long been national among them; but which their late easy subjection under the Normans had somewhat degraded and obscured. Perhaps, too, they hoped that, by their zeal and activity, they might recover the confidence of their sovereign, as their ancestors had formerly, by like means, gained the affections of Canute; and might conquer his inveterate prejudices in favour of his own countrymen. The king's military conduct, seconded by these brave troops, soon overcame all opposition in Maine: the inhabitants were obliged to submit, and the count of Anjou relinquished his pretensions.

But during these transactions the government of England was greatly disturbed; and that, too, by those very foreigners who owed everything to the king's bounty, and who were the sole object of his friendship and regard. The Norman barons, who had engaged with their duke in the conquest of England, were men of the most independent spirit; and though they obeyed their leader in the field, they would have regarded with disdain the richest acquisitions, had they been required in return to submit, in their civil government, to the arbitrary will of one man. But the imperious character of William, encouraged by his absolute dominion over the English, and often impelled by the necessity of his affairs, had prompted him to stretch his authority over the Normans themselves beyond what the free genius of that victorious people could easily bear. The discontents were become general among those haughty nobles; and even Roger, earl of Hereford, son and heir of Fitz Osborne, the king's chief favourite, was strongly infected with them. This nobleman, intending to marry his sister to Ralph de Guader, earl of Norfolk, had thought it his duty to inform the king of his purpose, and to desire the royal consent; but meeting with a refusal, he proceeded, nevertheless, to complete the nuptials, and assembled all his friends, and those of Guader, to attend the solemnity. The two earls, disgusted by the denial of their request, and dreading William's resentment for their disobedience, here prepared measures for a revolt; and during the gaiety of the festival, while the company was heated with wine, they opened the design to their guests. They inveighed against the arbitrary conduct of the king; his tyranny over the English, whom they affected on this occasion to commiserate; his imperious behaviour to his barons of the noblest birth; and his apparent intention of reducing the victors and the vanquished to a like ignominious servitude. Amidst their complaints, the indignity of submitting to a bastard* was not forgotten; the certain prospect of success in a revolt, by the assistance of the Danes and the discontented English, was insisted on; and the whole company, inflamed with the same sentiments, and warmed by the jollity of the entertainment, entered, by a solemn engagement, into the design of shaking off the royal authority. Even Earl Waltheof, who was present, inconsiderately expressed his approbation of the conspiracy, and promised his concurrence towards its success.

This nobleman, the last of the English who had been permitted to possess any power or authority, had, after his capitulation at York, been received into favour by the Conqueror; had even married Judith, niece to that prince; and had been promoted to the earldoms of Huntingdon and Northampton. Cospatric, earl of Northumberland, having, on some new disgust from William, retired into Scotland, where he received the earldom of Dunbar from the bounty of Malcolm, Waltheof was appointed his successor in that important command, and seemed still to possess the confidence and friendship of his sovereign. But as he was a man of generous principles, and loved his country, it is probable that the tyranny exercised over the English lay heavy upon his mind, and destroyed all the satisfaction which he could reap from his own grandeur and advancement. When a prospect, therefore, was opened of retrieving their liberty, he hastily embraced it; while the fumes of the liquor, and the ardour of the company, prevented him from reflecting on the consequences of that rash attempt. But after his cool judgment returned, he foresaw that the conspiracy of those discontented barons was not likely to prove successful against the established power of William; or if it did, that the slavery of the English, instead of being alleviated by that event, would become more grievous under a multitude of foreign leaders, factions and ambitious, whose union and whose discord would be equally oppressive to the people. Tormented with these reflections, he opened his mind to his wife Judith, of whose fidelity he entertained no suspicion; but who, having secretly fixed her affections on another, took this opportunity of ruining her easy and credulous husband. She conveyed intelligence of the conspiracy to the king, and aggravated every circumstance, which, she believed would tend to incense him against Waltheof, and render him absolutely implacable. Meanwhile the earl, still dubious with regard to the part which he should act, discovered the secret in confession to Lanfranc, on whose probity and judgment he had a great reliance: he was persuaded by the prelate, that he owed no fidelity to those rebellious barons, who had by surprise gained his consent to a crime; that his first duty was to his sovereign and benefactor, his next to himself and his family; and that if he seized not the opportunity of making atonement for his guilt by revealing it, the temerity of the conspirators was so great, that they would give some other person the means of acquiring the merit of the discovery. Waltheof, convinced by these arguments, went over to Normandy; but though he was well received by the king, and thanked for his fidelity, the account, previously transmitted by Judith, had sunk deep into William's mind, and had destroyed all the merit of her husband's repentance.

The conspirators, hearing of Waltheof's departure, immediately concluded their design to be betrayed; and they flew to arms before their schemes were ripe for execution, and before the arrival of the Danes, in whose aid they placed their chief confidence. The earl of Hereford was checked by Walter de Lacy, a great baron in those parts, who, supported by the bishop of Worcester and the abbot of Evesham, raised some forces, and prevented the earl from passing the Severn, or advancing into the heart of the kingdom. The earl of Norfolk was defeated at Fagadun, near Cambridge, by Odo, the regent, assisted by Richard de Bienfate and William de Warrenne, the two justiciaries. The prisoners taken in this action had their right foot cut off, as a punishment of their treason: the earl himself escaped to Norwich, thence to Denmark; where the Danish fleet, which had made an unsuccessful attempt upon the coast of England, soon after arrived, and brought him intelligence, that all his confederates were either killed, banished, or taken prisoners.* Ralph retired in despair to Britany, where he possessed a large estate and extensive jurisdictions.

The king, who hastened over to England in order to suppress the insurrection, found that no thing remained but the punishment of the criminals, which he executed with great severity. Many of the rebels were hanged; some had their eyes put out; others their hands cut off. But William, agreeably to his usual maxims, showed more lenity to their leader, the earl of Hereford, who was only condemned to a forfeiture of his estate, and to imprisonment during pleasure. The king seemed even disposed to remit this last part of the punishment; had not Roger, by a fresh insolence, provoked him to render his confinement perpetual. But Waltheof, being an Englishman, was not treated with so much humanity; though his guilt, always much inferior to that of the other conspirators, was atoned for by an early repentance and return to his duty. William, instigated by his niece, as well as by his rapacious courtiers, who longed for so rich a forfeiture, ordered him to be tried, condemned, and executed. The English, who considered this nobleman as the last resource of their nation, grievously lamented his fate, and fancied that miracles were wrought by his relics, as a testimony of his innocence and sanctity. The infamous Judith, falling soon after under the king's displeasure, was abandoned by all the world, and passed the rest of her life in contempt, remorse, and misery.

Nothing remained to complete William's satisfaction, but the punishment of Ralph de Guader; and he hastened over to Normandy, in order to gratify his vengeance on that criminal. But though the contest seemed very unequal between a private nobleman and the king of England, Ralph was so well supported both by the earl of Brittany and the king of France, that William, after besieging him for some time in Dol, was obliged to abandon the enterprise, and make with those powerful princes a peace, in which Ralph himself was included. England, during his absence, remained in tranquillity, and nothing remarkable occurred, except two ecclesiastical synods which were summoned, one at London, another at Winchester. In the former, the precedence among the episcopal sees was settled, and the seat of some of them was removed from small villages to the most considerable town within the diocese. In the second was transacted a business of more importance.

The industry and perseverance are surprising, with which the popes had been treasuring up powers and pretensions during so many ages of ignorance; while each pontiff employed every fraud for advancing purposes of imaginary piety, and cherished all claims which might turn to the advantage of his successors, though he himself could not expect ever to reap any benefit from them. All this immense store of spiritual and civil authority was now devolved on Gregory VII., of the name of Hildebrand, the most enterprising pontiff that had ever filled the chair, and the least restrained by fear, decency, or moderation. Not content with shaking off the yoke of the emperors, who had hitherto exercised the power of appointing the pope on every vacancy, at least of ratifying his election, he undertook the arduous task of entirely disjoining the ecclesiastical from the civil power, and of excluding profane laymen from the right which they had assumed, of filling the vacancies of bishoprics, abbeys, and other spiritual dignities. The sovereigns, who had long exercised this power, and who had acquired it, not by encroachments on the church, but on the people, to whom it originally belonged, made great opposition to this claim of the court of Rome; and Henry IV., the reigning emperor, defended this prerogative of his crown with a vigour and resolution suitable to its importance. The few offices, either civil or military, which the feudal institutions left the sovereign the power of bestowing, made the prerogative of conferring the pastoral ring and staff the most valuable jewel of the royal diadem; especially as the general ignorance of the age bestowed a consequence on the ecclesiastical offices, even beyond the great extent of power and property which belonged to them. Superstition, the child of ignorance, invested the clergy with an authority almost sacred; and as they engrossed the little learning of the age, their interposition became requisite in all civil business, and a real usefulness in common life was thus superadded to the spiritual sanctity of their character.

When the usurpations, therefore, of the church had come to such maturity as to embolden her to attempt extorting the right of investitures from the temporal power, Europe, especially Italy and Germany, was thrown into the most violent convulsions, and the pope and the emperor waged implacable war on each other. Gregory dared to fulminate the sentence of excommunication against Henry and his adherents, to pronounce him rightfully deposed, to free his subjects from their oaths of allegiance; and, instead of shocking mankind by this gross encroachment on the civil authority, he found the stupid people ready to second his most exorbitant pretensions. Every minister, servant, or vassal of the emperor, who received any disgust, covered his rebellion under the pretence of principle; and even the mother of this monarch, forgetting all the ties of nature, was seduced to countenance the insolence of his enemies. Princes themselves, not attentive to the pernicious consequences of those papal claims, employed them for their present purposes: and the controversy, spreading into every city of Italy, engendered the parties of Guelf and Ghibbelin; the most durable and most inveterate factions that ever arose from the mixture of ambition and religious zeal. Besides numberless assassinations, tumults, and convulsions, to which they gave rise, it is computed that the quarrel occasioned no less than sixty battles in the reign of Henry IV., and eighteen in that of his successor, Henry V., when the claims of the sovereign pontiff finally prevailed.

But the bold spirit of Gregory, not dismayed with the vigorous opposition which he met with from the emperor, extended his usurpations all over Europe; and well knowing the nature of mankind, whose blind astonishment ever inclines them to yield to the most impudent pretensions, he seemed determined to set no bounds to the spiritual, or rather temporal, monarchy which he had undertaken to erect. He pronounced the sentence of excommunication against Nicephorus, emperor of the East; Robert Guiscard, the adventurous Norman who had acquired the dominion of Naples, was attacked by the same dangerous weapon: he degraded Boleslas, king of Poland, from the rank of king; and even deprived Poland of the title of a kingdom: he attempted to treat Philip, king of France, with the same rigour which he had employed against the emperor: he pretended to the entire property and dominion of Spain; and he parcelled it out amongst adventurers, who undertook to conquer it from the Saracens, and to hold it in vassalage under the see of Rome. Even the Christian bishops, on whose aid he relied for subduing the temporal princes, saw that he was determined to reduce them to servitude; and by assuming the whole legislative and judicial power of the church, to centre all authority in the sovereign pontiff.

William the Conqueror, the most potent, the most haughty, and the most vigorous prince in Europe, was not, amidst all his splendid successes, secure from the attacks of this enterprising pontiff. Gregory wrote him a letter, requiring him to fulfil his promise in doing homage for the kingdom of England to the see of Rome, and to send him over that tribute, which all his predecessors had been accustomed to pay to the vicar of Christ. By the tribute, he meant Peter's-pence; which, though at first a charitable donation of the Saxon princes, was interpreted, according to the usual practice of the Romish court, to be a badge of subjection acknowledged by the kingdom. William replied, that the money should be remitted as usual; but that neither had he promised to do homage to Rome, nor was it in the least his purpose to impose that servitude on his state. And the better to show Gregory his independence, he ventured, notwithstanding the frequent complaints of the pope, to refuse to the English bishops the liberty of attending a general council which that pontiff had summoned against his enemies.

But though the king displayed this vigour in supporting the royal dignity, he was infected with the general superstition of the age, and he did not perceive the ambitious scope of those institutions, which under colour of strictness in religion, were introduced or promoted by the court of Rome. Gregory, while he was throwing all Europe into combustion by his violence and impostures, affected an anxious care for the purity of manners; and even the chaste pleasures of the marriage-bed were inconsistent, in his opinion, with the sanctity of the sacerdotal character. He had issued a decree prohibiting the marriage of priests, excommunicating all clergymen who retained their wives, declaring such unlawful commerce to be fornication, and rendering it criminal in the laity to attend divine worship when such profane priests officiated at the altar. This point was a great object in the politics of the Roman pontiffs; and it cost them infinitely more pains to establish it, than the propagation of any speculative absurdity which they had ever attempted to introduce. Many synods were summoned in different parts of Europe, before it was finally settled; and it was there constantly remarked, that the younger clergymen complied cheerfully with the pope's decrees in this particular, and that the chief reluctance appeared in those who were more advanced in years: an event so little consonant to men's natural expectations, that it could not fail to be glossed on, even in that blind and superstitious age. William allowed the pope's legate to assemble, in his absence, a synod at Winchester, in order to establish the celibacy of the clergy; but the church of England could not yet be carried the whole length expected. The synod was content with decreeing, that the bishops should not thenceforth ordain any priests or deacons without exacting from them a promise of celibacy; but they enacted, that none, except those who belonged to collegiate or cathedral churches, should be obliged to separate from their wives.

The king passed some years in Normandy; but his long residence there was not entirely owing to his declared preference to that duchy: his presence was also necessary for composing those disturbances which had arisen in that favourite territory, and which had even originally proceeded from his own family. Robert, his eldest son, surnamed Gambaron, or Courthose, from his short legs, was a prince who inherited all the bravery of his family and nation; but without that policy and dissimulation by which his father was so much distinguished, and which, no less than his military valour, had contributed to his great successes. Greedy of fame, impatient of contradiction, without reserve in his friendships, candid in his enmities, this prince could endure no control even from his imperious father, and openly aspired to that independence, to which his temper, as well as some circumstances in his situation, strongly invited him. When William first received the submissions of the province of Maine, he had promised the inhabitants that Robert should be their prince; and before he undertook the expedition against England, he had, on the application of the French court, declared him his successor in Normandy, and had obliged the barons of that duchy to do him homage as their future sovereign. By this artifice, he had endeavoured to appease the jealousy of his neighbours, as affording them a prospect of separating England from his dominions on the continent; but when Robert demanded of him the execution of those engagements, he gave him an absolute refusal, and told him, according to the homely saying, that he never intended to throw off his clothes till he went to bed. Robert openly declared his discontent; and was suspected of secretly instigating the king of France and the earl of Brittany to the opposition which they made to William, and which had formerly frustrated his attempts upon the town of Dol. And as the quarrel still augmented, Robert proceeded to entertain a strong jealousy of his two surviving brothers, William and Henry (for Richard was killed in hunting, by a stag), who, by greater submission and complaisance, had acquired the affections of their father. In this disposition on both sides, the greatest trifle sufficed to produce a rupture between them.

The three princes, residing with their father in the castle of l'Aigle in Normandy, were one day engaged in sport together; and after some mirth and jollity, the two younger took a fancy of throwing over some water on Robert as he passed through the court on leaving their apartment; a frolic which he would naturally have regarded as innocent, had it not been for the suggestions of Alberic de Grentmesnil, son of that Hugh de Grentmesnil whom William had formerly deprived of his fortunes, when that baron deserted him during his greatest difficulties in England. The young man, mindful of the injury, persuaded the prince that this action was meant as a public affront, which it behoved him in honour to resent; and the choleric Robert, drawing his sword, ran up stairs, with an intention of taking revenge on his brothers. The whole castle was filled with tumult, which the king himself, who hastened from his apartment, found some difficulty to appease. But he could by no means appease the resentment of his eldest son, who complaining of his partiality, and fancying that no proper atonement had been made him for the insult, left the court that very evening, and hastened to Rouen, with an intention of seizing the citadel of that place. But being disappointed in this view by the precaution and vigilance of Roger de Ivery, the governor, he fled to Hugh Neufchatel, a powerful Norman baron, who gave him protection in his castles; and he openly levied war against his father. The popular character of the prince, and a similarity of manners, engaged all the young nobility of Normandy and Maine, as well as of Anjou and Brittany, to take part with him; and it was suspected that Matilda, his mother, whose favourite he was, supported him in his rebellion by secret remittances of money, and by the encouragement which she gave his partisans.

All the hereditary provinces of William, as well as his family, were, during several years, thrown into convulsions by this war; and he was at last obliged to have recourse to England, where that species of military government which he had established, gave him greater authority than the ancient feudal institutions permitted him to exercise in Normandy. He called over an army of English under his ancient captains, who soon expelled Robert and his adherents from their retreats, and restored the authority of the sovereign in all his dominions. The young prince was obliged to take shelter in the castle of Gerberoy, in the Beauvoisis, which the king of France, who secretly fomented all these dissensions, had provided for him. In this fortress he was closely besieged by his father, against whom, having a strong garrison, he made an obstinate defence. There passed under the walls of this place many rencounters, which resembled more the single combats of chivalry, than the military actions of armies; but one of them was remarkable for its circumstances and its event. Robert happened to engage the king, who was concealed by his helmet; and both of them being valiant, a fierce combat ensued, till at last the young prince wounded his father in the arm, and unhorsed him. On his calling out for assistance, his voice discovered him to his son, who, struck with remorse for his past guilt, and astonished with the apprehensions of one much greater, which he had so nearly incurred, instantly threw himself at his father's feet, craved pardon for his offences, and offered to purchase forgiveness by any atonement. The resentment harboured by William was so implacable, that he did not immediately correspond to this dutiful submission of his son with like tenderness; but giving him his malediction, departed for his own camp on Robert's horse, which that prince had assisted him to mount. He soon after raised the siege, and marched with his army to Normandy; where the interposition of the queen, and other common friends, brought about a reconciliation, which was probably not a little forwarded by the generosity of the son's behaviour in this action, and by the returning sense of his past misconduct. The king seemed so fully appeased, that he even took Robert with him into England; where he intrusted him with the command of an army, in order to repel an inroad of Malcolm, king of Scotland, and to retaliate by a like inroad into that country. The Welsh, unable to resist William's power, were, about the same time, necessitated to pay a compensation for their incursions, and everything was reduced to full tranquillity in this island.

This state of affairs gave William leisure to begin and finish an undertaking, which proves his extensive genius, and does honour to his memory: it was a general survey of all the lands in the kingdom, their extent in each district, their proprietors, tenures, value; the quantity of meadow, pasture, wood, and arable land, which they contained; and in some counties the number of tenants, cottagers, and slaves of all denominations, who lived upon them. He appointed commissioners for this purpose, who entered every particular in their register by the verdict of juries; and after a labour of six years (for the work was so long in finishing), brought him an exact account of all the landed property of his kingdom.* Perhaps the more northern counties were not comprehended in this survey, on account of their wild uncultivated state. This monument, called Domesday-book, the most valuable piece of antiquity possessed by any nation, is still preserved in the Exchequer; and though only some extracts of it have hitherto been published, it serves to illustrate to us, in many particulars, the ancient state of England. The great Alfred had finished a like survey of the kingdom in his time, which was long kept at Winchester, and which probably served as a model to William in this undertaking.

The king was naturally a great economist; and though no prince had ever been more bountiful to his officers and servants, it was merely because he had rendered himself universal proprietor of England, and had a whole kingdom to bestow. He reserved an ample revenue for the crown; and in the general distribution of land among his followers, he kept possession of no less than 1422 manors in different parts of England, which paid him rent, either in money, or in corn, cattle, and the usual produce of the soil. An ancient historian computes, that his annual fixed income, besides escheats, fines, reliefs, and other casual profits to a great value, amounted to near 400,000 pounds a-year;* a sum which, if all circumstances be attended to, will appear wholly incredible. A pound in that age, as we have already observed, contained three times the weight of silver that it does at present; and the same weight of silver, by the most probable computation, would purchase near ten times more of the necessities of life, though not in the same proportion of the finer manufactures. This revenue, therefore, of William, would be equal to at least nine or ten millions at present; and as that prince had neither fleet nor army to support, the former being only an occasional expense, and the latter being maintained, without any charge to him, by his military vassals, we must thence conclude, that no emperor or prince, in any age or nation, can be compared to the Conqueror for opulence and riches. This leads us to suspect a great mistake in the computation of the historian; though, if we consider that avarice is always imputed to William, as one of his vices, and that having by the sword rendered himself master of all the lands in the kingdom, he would certainly in the partition retain a great proportion for his own share, we can scarcely be guilty of any error in asserting, that perhaps no king of England was ever more opulent, or more able to support, by his revenue, the splendour and magnificence of a court, or could bestow more on his pleasures, or in liberalities to his servants and favourites.

There was one pleasure to which William, as well as all the Normans and ancient Saxons, was extremely addicted, and that was hunting; but this pleasure he indulged more at the expense of his unhappy subjects, whose interests he always disregarded, than to the loss or diminution of his own revenue. Not content with those large forests, which former kings possessed in all parts of England, he resolved to make a new forest near Winchester, the usual place of his residence: and for that purpose, he laid waste the country in Hampshire for an extent of thirty miles, expelled the inhabitants from their houses, seized their property, even demolished churches and convents, and made the sufferers no compensation for the injury. At the same time, he enacted new laws, by which he prohibited all his subjects from hunting in any of his forests, and rendered the penalties more severe than ever had been inflicted for such offences. The killing of a deer or boar, or even a hare, was punished with the loss of the delinquent's eyes; and that at a time, when the killing of a man could be atoned for by paying a moderate fine or composition.

The transactions recorded during the remainder of this reign, may be considered more as domestic occurrences, which concern the prince, than as national events, which regard England. Odo, bishop of Baieux, the king's uterine brother, whom he had created earl of Kent, and intrusted with a great share of power during his whole reign, had amassed immense riches; and agreeably to the usual progress of human wishes, he began to regard his present acquisitions but as a step to further grandeur. He had formed the chimerical project of buying the papacy; and though Gregory, the reigning pope, was not of advanced years, the prelate had confided so much in the predictions of an astrologer, that he reckoned upon the pontiff's death, and upon attaining, by his own intrigues and money, that envied state of greatness. Resolving, therefore, to remit all his riches to Italy, he had persuaded many considerable barons, and, among the rest, Hugh, earl of Chester, to take the same course; in hopes that, when he should mount the papal throne, he would bestow on them more considerable establishments in that country. The king, from whom all these projects had been carefully concealed, at last got intelligence of the design, and ordered Odo to be arrested. His officers, from respect to the immunities which the ecclesiastics now assumed, scrupled to execute the command, till the king himself was obliged in person to seize him; and when Odo insisted that he was a prelate, and exempt from all temporal jurisdiction, William replied, that he arrested him not as bishop of Baieux, but as earl of Kent. He was sent prisoner to Normandy; and notwithstanding the remonstrances and menaces of Gregory, was detained in custody during the remainder of this reign.

* Dr. Lingard says, "the first volume, a large folio of vellum, and in 382 double pages, written in a small character, contains thirty-one counties, beginning with Kent and ending with Lincolnshire. The other is a quarto volume of 450 double pages, in a large character, but contains only the counties of Essex, Norfolk, and Sussex. There is no description of the four northern counties; but the West Riding of Yorkshire is made to comprehend that part of Lancashire which lies to the north of the Ribble, with some districts in Westmoreland and Cumberland: while the southern portion of Lancashire is included in Cheshire. Rutland is similarly divided between Nottinghamshire and Lincolnshire."

Another domestic event gave the king much more concern: it was the death of Matilda, his consort, whom he tenderly loved, and for whom he had ever preserved the most sincere friendship. Three years afterwards he passed into Normandy, and carried with him Edgar Atheling, to whom he willingly granted permission to make a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. He was detained on the continent by a misunderstanding, which broke out between him and the king of France, and which was occasioned by inroads made into Normandy by some French barons on the frontiers. It was little in the power of princes at that time to restrain their licentious nobility; but William suspected that these barons durst not have provoked his indignation, had they not been assured of the countenance and protection of Philip. His displeasure was increased by the account he received of some railleries which that monarch had thrown out against him. As the king advanced in years, to use Lingard's words, "he grew excessively corpulent; and to reduce his bulk, submitted by the advice of his physicians to a long course of medicine. Philip of France, in allusion to this circumstance, said in a conversation with his courtiers, that the king of England was lying in at Rouen. When this insipid jest, which cost the lives of hundreds who never heard it, was reported to William, he burst into a paroxysm of rage, his martial spirit could not brook the indignity of being compared to a woman; and he swore that at his churching he would set all France in a blaze." To understand the force of the reparation, it must be recollected that it was the custom for women to present lights to the church on that occasion."

Immediately on his recovery, he led an army into L'Isle de France, and laid every thing waste with fire and sword. He took the town of Mante, which he reduced to ashes. But the progress of these hostilities was stopped by an accident, which soon after put an end to William's life. His horse starting aside of a sudden, he bruised his belly on the pommel of the saddle; and being in a bad habit of body, as well as somewhat advanced in years, he began to apprehend the consequences, and ordered himself to be carried in a litter to the monastery of St. Gervas. Finding his illness increase, and being sensible of the approach of death, he discovered at last the vanity of all human grandeur, and was struck with remorse for those horrible cruelties and acts of violence, which, in the attainment and defence of it, he had committed during the course of his reign over England. He endeavoured to make atonement by presents to churches and monasteries; and he issued orders that Earl Morcar, Siward, Bearne, and other English prisoners should be set at liberty. He was even prevailed on, though not without reluctance, to consent, with his dying breath, to release his brother Odo, against whom he was extremely incensed. He left Normandy and Maine to his eldest son Robert: he wrote to Lanfranc, desiring him to crown William king of England: he bequeathed to Henry nothing but the possessions of his mother Matilda: but foretold, that he would one day surpass both his brothers in power and opulence. He expired in the sixty-third year of his age, in the twenty-first year of his reign over England, and in the fifty-fourth of that over Normandy.

Few princes have been more fortunate than this great monarch, or were better entitled to grandeur and prosperity, from the abilities and the vigour of mind which he displayed in all his conduct. His spirit was bold and enterprising, yet guided by prudence: his ambition, which was exorbitant, and lay little under the restraints of justice, still less under those of humanity, never submitted to the dictates of sound policy. Born in an age when the minds of men were intractable and unacquainted with submission, he was yet able to direct them to his purposes; and partly from the ascendancy of his vehement character, partly from art and dissimulation, to establish an unlimited authority. Though not insensible to generosity, he was hardened against compassion; and he seemed equally ostentatious and equally ambitious of show and parade in his clemency and in his severity. The maxims of his administration were austere; but might have been useful, had they been solely employed to preserve order in an established government: they were ill calculated for softening the rigours, which, under the most gentle management, are inseparable from conquest. His attempt against England was the last great enterprise of the kind, which, during the course of seven hundred years, has fully succeeded in Europe; and the force of his genius broke through those limits, which first the feudal institutions, and then the refined policy of princes, have fixed to the several states of Christendom. Though he rendered himself infinitely odious to his English subjects, he transmitted his power to his posterity, and the throne is still filled by his descendants: a proof that the foundations which he laid were firm and solid, and that, amidst all his violence, while he seemed only to gratify the present passion, he had still an eye towards futurity.

Dr. Lingard gives the following more circumstantial account of his death and character: he says, "early in the morning of the 9th September, 1087, the king heard the sound of a bell, and eagerly inquired what it meant. He was informed that it tolled the hour of prime, in the church of St. Mary. 'Then,' said he, stretching out his arms, 'I commend my soul to my lady, the mother of God, that by her holy prayers she may reconcile me to her son my Lord Jesus Christ:' and immediately expired. From the events which followed his death, the reader may judge of the unsettled state of society at the time. The knights and pro-lates hastened to their respective homes to secure their property; the citizens of Rouen began to conceal their most valuable effects; the servants rifled the palace, and hurried away with the booty; and the royal corpse for three hours lay almost in a state of nudity on the ground. At length the archbishop ordered the body to be interred at Caen: and Herluin, a neighbouring knight, out of compassion, conveyed it at his own expense to that city.

"At the day appointed for the interment, Prince Henry, the Norman prelates, and a multitude of clergy and people assembled in the church of St. Stephen, which the conqueror had founded. The mass had been performed, the corpse was placed on the bier, and the bishop of Evreux had pronounced the panegyric of the deceased, when a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "He whom you have praised, was a robber. The very land on which you stand is mine. By violence he took it from my father; and in the name of God I forbid you to bury him in it." The speaker was Asceline Fitz-Arthur, who had often, but fruitlessly, sought reparation from the justice of William. After some debate the prelates called him to them, paid him sixty shillings for the grave, and promised that he should receive the full value of his land. The ceremony was then continued, and the body of the king deposited in a coffin of stone.* William's character has been drawn with apparent impartiality in the Saxon chronicle, by a contemporary and an Englishman. That the reader may learn the opinion of one who possessed the means of forming an accurate judgment, I shall transcribe the passage, retaining, as far as it may be intelligible, the very phraseology of the original.

"If any one wish to know what manner of man he was, or what worship he had, or of how many lands he were the lord, we will describe him as we have known him: for we looked on him, and some time lived in his herd. King William was a very wise man, and very rich, more worshipful and strong than any of his fore-gangers. He was mild to good men, who loved God: and stark beyond all bounds to those who withstaid his will. On the very stede, where God gave him to win England, he reared a noble monastery and set monks therein, and endowed it well. He was very worshipful. Thrice he bore his king-helmet every year when he was in England; at Easter he bore it at Winchester, at Pentecost at Westminster, and in mid-winter at Gloucester: and then were with him all the rich men all over England: archbishops and diocesan bishops, abbots and earls, thanes and knights. Moreover he was a very stark man, and very savage: so that no man durst do any thing against his will. He had earls in his bonds, who had done against his will: bishops he set off their bishoprics, abbots off their abbotries, and thanes in prisons: and at last he did not spare his own brother Odo. Him he set in prison. Yet among other things we must not forget the good frith† which he made in this land: so that a man, that was good for aught, might travel over the kingdom with his bosom full of gold without molestation: and no man durst slay another man, though he had suffered never so mickle evil from the other. He ruled over England: and by his cunning he was so thoroughly acquainted with it, that there is not a hide of land of which he did not know both who had it, and what was its worth: and that he set down in his writings. Wales was under his weald, and therein he wrought castles: and he wielded the Isle of Man withal: and moreover, he subdued Scotland by his mickle strength. Normandy was his by kiunn: and over the earldom called Mans he ruled: and if he might have lived yet two years, he would have won Ireland by the fame of his power, and without any armament. Yet truly in his time men had mickle suffering, and very many hardships. Castles he caused to be wrought, and poor men to be oppressed. He was so very stark. He took from his subjects many marks of gold, and many hundred pounds of silver: and that he took, some by right, and some by mickle might, for very little need. He had fallen into avarice, and greediness he loved withal. He let his lands to fine as dear as he could; then came some other and bade more than the first had given, and the king let it to him who bade more. Then came a third, and bid yet more, and the king let it into the hands of the man who bade the most. Nor did he reckon how sinfully his reeves got money of poor men, or how many unlawful things they did. For the more men talked of right law, the more they did against the law. He also set many deer friths: and he made laws therewith, that whosoever should slay hart or hind, him man should blind. As he forbade the slaying of harts, so also did he of boars. So much he loved the high deer, as if he had been their father. He also decreed about hares, that they should go free. His rich men moaned, and the poor men murmured: but he was so hard, that he recked not the hatred of them all. For it was need they should follow the king's will withal, if they wished to live, or have lands or goods, or his favour. Alas, that any man should be so moody, and should so puff up himself and think himself above all other men! May Almighty God have mercy on his soul, and grant him forgiveness of his sins."

"To this account may be added a few particulars gleaned from other historians. The king was of ordinary stature, but inclined to corpulency. His countenance wore an air of ferocity, which, when he was agitated by passion, struck terror into every beholder. The story told of his strength at one period of his life, almost exceeds belief. It is said, that sitting on horseback, he could draw the string of a bow which no other man could bend even on foot. Hunting formed his favourite amusement. The reader has seen the censure passed upon him for his deer friths and game laws; nor will he think it undeserved, if he attend to the following instance. Though the king possessed sixty-eight forests, besides parks and chases in different parts of England, he was not satisfied; but for the occasional accommodation of his court, afforested an extensive tract of country lying between the city of Winchester and the sea-coast. The inhabitants were expelled: the cottages and the churches were burnt; and more than thirty square miles of a rich and populous district were withdrawn from cultivation, and converted into a wilderness, to afford sufficient range for the deer, and ample space for the royal diversion. The memory of this act of despotism has been perpetuated in the name of the New Forest, which it retains at the present day, after the lapse of seven hundred and fifty years.

"William's education had left on his mind religious impressions which were never effaced. When, indeed, his power or interest was concerned, he listened to no suggestions but those of ambition or avarice, but on other occasions he displayed a strong sense of religion, and a profound respect for its institutions."

Dr. Lingard concludes this reign with the following paragraph:—

"During William's reign the people of England were exposed to calamities of every description. It commenced with years of carnage and devastation: its progress was marked by a regular system of confiscation and oppression, and this succession of evils was closed with famine and pestilence. In 1086, a summer more rainy and tempestuous than had been experienced in the memory of man, occasioned a total failure of the harvest; and the winter introduced a malignant disease, which attacked one-half of the inhabitants, and is said to have proved fatal to many thousands. Even of those who escaped the infection, or recovered from the disease, numbers perished afterwards from want or unwholesome nourishment. 'Alas!' exclaims an eye-witness, 'how miserable, how rueful a time was that! The wretched victims had nearly perished by the fever; then came the sharp hunger, and destroyed them outright. Who is so hard-hearted as not to weep over such calamities?'"

Some writers have been desirous of refusing to this prince the title of conqueror, in the sense which that term commonly bears; and, on pretence that the word is sometimes in old books applied to such as make an acquisition of territory by any means, they are willing to reject William's title, by right of war, to the crown of England. It is needless to enter into a controversy, which, by the terms of it, must necessarily degenerate into a dispute of words. It suffices to say, that the duke of Normandy's first invasion of the island was hostile; that his subsequent administration was entirely supported by arms; that in the very frame of his laws he made a distinction between the Normans and the English, to the advantage of the former; that he acted in everything as absolute master over the natives, whose interest and affections he totally disregarded; and that if there was an interval when he assumed the appearance of a legal sovereign, the period was very short, and was nothing but a temporary sacrifice, which he, as has been the case with most conquerors, was obliged to make, of his inclination to his present policy. Scarce any of those revolutions which in history and in common language have always been denominated conquests, appear equally violent, or were attended with so sudden an alteration both of power and property. The Roman state, which spread its dominion over Europe, left the rights of individuals in a great measure untouched; and those civilized conquerors, while they made their own country the seat of empire, found that they could draw most advantage from the subjected provinces, by securing to the natives the free enjoyment of their own laws, and of their private possessions. The barbarians, who subdued the Roman empire, though they settled in the conquered countries, yet being accustomed to a rude uncultivated life, found a part only of the land sufficient to supply all their wants; and they were not tempted to seize extensive possessions, which they knew neither how to cultivate nor enjoy. But the Normans and other foreigners, who followed the standard of William, while they made the vanquished kingdom the seat of government, were yet so far advanced in arts as to be acquainted with the advantages of a large property; and having totally subdued the natives, they pushed the rights of conquest (very extensive in the eyes of avarice and ambition, however narrow in those of reason) to the utmost extremity against them. Except the former conquest of England by the Saxons themselves, who were induced, by peculiar circumstances, to proceed even to the extermination of the natives, it would be difficult to find in all history a revolution more destructive, or attended with a more complete subjection of the ancient inhabitants. Contumely seems even to have been wantonly added to oppression; and the natives were universally reduced to such a state of meanness and poverty, that the English name became a term of reproach; and several generations elapsed before one family of Saxon pedigree was raised to any considerable honours, or could so much as attain the rank of baron of the realm. These facts are so apparent from the whole tenour of the English history, that none would have been tempted to deny or elude them, were they not heated by the controversies of faction; while one party was absurdly afraid of those absurd consequences which they saw the other party inclined to draw from this event. But it is evident that the present rights and privileges of the people, who are a mixture of English and Normans, can never be affected by a transaction which passed seven hundred years ago; and as all ancient authors, who lived nearest the time, and best knew the state of the country, unanimously speak of the Norman dominion as a conquest by war and arms, no reasonable man, from the fear of imaginary consequences, will ever be tempted to reject their concurring and undoubted testimony.

King William had issue, besides his three sons who survived him, five daughters, to wit,—Cicily, a nun in the monastery of Feschamp, afterwards abbess in the Holy Trinity at Caen, where she died in 1127. Constantia, married to Alan Fergent, earl of Brittany: she died without issue. Alice, contracted to Harold. Adela, married to Stephen, earl of Blois, by whom she had four sons, William, Theobald, Henry, and Stephen; of whom the elder was neglected on account of the imbecility of his understanding. Agatha, who died a virgin, but was betrothed to the king of Galicia. She died on her journey thither, before she joined her bridegroom.

CHAPTER VIII.

WILLIAM RUFUS.

Accession of William Rufus—Conspiracy against the king—Invasion of Normandy—The Crusades—Acquisition of Normandy—Quarrel with Anselm, the primate—Death, and character of William Rufus.

WILLIAM, surnamed Rufus, or the Red (from the colour of his hair, as some assert), had no sooner procured his father's recommendatory letter to Lanfranc, the primate, than he hastened to take measures for securing to himself the government of England. Sensible that a deed so informal, and so little prepared, which violated Robert's right of primogeniture, might meet with great opposition, he trusted entirely for success to his own celerity; and having left St. Gervas, while William was breathing his last, he arrived in England before intelligence of his father's death had reached that kingdom. Pretending orders from the king, he secured the fortresses of Dover, Pevensey, and Hastings, whose situation rendered them of the greatest importance; and he got possession of the royal treasure at Winchester, amounting to the sum of sixty thousand pounds, by which he hoped to encourage and increase his partisans. The primate, whose rank and reputation in the kingdom gave him great authority, had been intrusted with the care of his education, and had conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and being connected with him by these ties, and probably deeming his pretensions just, declared that he would pay a willing obedience to the last will of the Conqueror, his friend and benefactor. Having assembled some bishops, and some of the principal nobility, he instantly proceeded to the ceremony of crowning the new king; and by this dispatch endeavoured to prevent all faction and resistance. At the same time, Robert, who had been already acknowledged successor to Normandy, took peaceable possession of that duchy.

But though this partition appeared to have been made without any violence or opposition, there remained in England many causes of discontent, which seemed to menace that kingdom with a sudden revolution. The barons, who generally possessed large estates both in England and in Normandy, were uneasy at the separation of those territories; and foresaw, that as it would be impossible for them to preserve long their allegiance to two masters, they must necessarily resign either their ancient patrimony or their new acquisitions. Robert's title to the duchy they esteemed incontestable; his claim to the kingdom plausible; and they all desired that this prince, who alone had any pretensions to unite these states, should be put in possession of both. A comparison also of the personal qualities of the two brothers, led them to give the preference to the elder. The duke was brave, open, sincere, generous: even his predominant faults, his extreme indolence and facility, were not disagreeable to those haughty barons who affected independence, and submitted with reluctance to a vigorous administration in their sovereign. The king, though equally brave, was violent, haughty, tyrannical, and seemed disposed to govern more by the fear than by the love of his subjects. Odo, bishop of Baieux, and Robert, earl of Mortaigne, maternal brothers of the Conqueror, envying the great credit of Lanfranc, which was increased by his late services, enforced all these motives with their partisans, and engaged them in a formal conspiracy to dethrone the king. They communicated their design to Eustace, count of Boulogne, Roger, earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel, Robert de Belesme, his eldest son, William, bishop of Durham, Robert de Moubray, Roger Bigod, Hugh de Grentmesnil; and they easily procured the assent of these potent noblemen. The conspirators, retiring to their castles, hastened to put themselves in a military posture; and expecting to be soon supported by a powerful army from Normandy, they had already begun hostilities in many places.

The king, sensible of his perilous situation, endeavoured to engage the affections of the native English. As that people were now so thoroughly subdued that they no longer aspired to the recovery of their ancient liberties, and were content with the prospect of some mitigation in the tyranny of the Norman princes, they zealously embraced William's cause, upon receiving general promises of good treatment, and of enjoying the licence of hunting in the royal forests. The king was soon in a situation to take the field; and as he knew the danger of delay, he suddenly marched into Kent; where his uncles had already seized the fortresses of Pevensey and Rochester. These places he successively reduced by famine; and though he was prevailed on by the earl of Chester, William de Warrenne, and Robert Fitz Hammon, who had embraced his cause, to spare the lives of the rebels, he confiscated all their estates, and banished them the kingdom. This success gave authority to his negotiations with Roger, earl of Shrewsbury, whom he detached from the confederates: and as his powerful fleet, joined to the indolent conduct of Robert, prevented the arrival of the Norman succours, all the other rebels found no resource but in flight or submission. Some of them received a pardon; but the greater part were attainted; and the king bestowed their estates on the Norman barons who had remained faithful to him.

William, freed from the danger of these insurrections, took little care of fulfilling his promises to the English, who still found themselves exposed to the same oppressions which they had undergone during the reign of the Conqueror, and which were rather augmented by the violent impetuous temper of the present monarch. The death of Lanfranc, who retained great influence over him, gave soon after a full career to his tyranny; and all orders or men found reason to complain of an arbitrary and illegal administration. Even the privileges of the church, held sacred in those days, were a feeble rampart against his usurpations. He seized the temporalities of all the vacant bishoprics and abbeys; he delayed the appointing of successors to those dignities, that he might the longer enjoy the profits of their revenue; he bestowed some of the church lands and property on his captains and favourites; and he openly set to sale such sees and abbeys as he thought proper to dispose of. Though the murmurs of the ecclesiastics, which were quickly propagated to the nation, rose high against this grievance, the terror of William's authority, confirmed by the suppression of the late insurrections, retained every one in subjection, and preserved general tranquillity in England.

The king even thought himself enabled to disturb his brother in the possession of Normandy. The loose and negligent administration of that prince had emboldened the Norman barons to affect a great independency; and their mutual quarrels and devastations had rendered that whole territory a scene of violence and outrage. Two of them, Walter and Odo, were bribed by William to deliver the fortresses of St. Valeri and Albe-marle into his hands: others soon after imitated the example of revolt; while Philip, king of France, who ought to have protected his vassal in the possession of his fief, was, after making some efforts in his favour, engaged by large presents to remain neuter. The duke had also reason to apprehend danger from the intrigues of his brother Henry. This young prince, who had inherited nothing of his father's great possessions, but some of his money, had furnished Robert, while he was making his preparations against England, with the sum of three thousand marks; and, in return for so slender a supply, had been put in possession of the Cotentin, which comprehended near a third of the duchy of Normandy. Robert afterwards, upon some suspicion, threw him into prison; but finding himself exposed to invasion from the king of England, and dreading the conjunction of the two brothers against him, he now gave Henry his liberty, and even made use of his assistance in suppressing the insurrections of his rebellious subjects. Conan, a rich burgess of Rouen, had entered into a conspiracy to deliver that city to William; but Henry, on the detection of his guilt, invited the traitor up to a high tower, and with his own hands flung him from the battlements.

The king appeared in Normandy at the head of an army; and affairs seem to have come to extremity between the brothers; when the nobility on both sides, strongly connected by interest and alliances, interposed and mediated an accommodation. The chief advantage of this treaty accrued to William, who obtained possession of the territory of Eu, the towns of Aumale, Fescamp, and other places: but in return he promised that he would assist his brother in subduing Maine, which had rebelled; and that the Norman barons, attainted in Robert's cause, should be restored to their estates in England. The two brothers also stipulated, that on the demise of either without issue, the survivor should inherit all his dominions; and twelve of the most powerful barons on each side swore, that they would employ their power to ensure the effectual execution of the whole treaty; a strong proof of the great independence and authority of the nobles in those ages.

Prince Henry, disgusted that so little care had been taken of his interests in this accommodation, retired to St. Michael's Mount, a strong fortress on the coast of Normandy, and infested the neighbourhood with his incursions. Robert and William, with their joint forces, besieged him in this place, and had nearly reduced him by the scarcity of water; when the elder, hearing of his distress, granted him permission to supply himself, and also sent him some pipes of wine for his own table. Being reproved by William for this ill-timed generosity; he replied, "What, shall I suffer my brother to die of thirst? Where shall we find another when he is gone?" The king also, during this siege, performed an act of generosity, which was less suitable to his character. Riding out one day alone, to take a survey of the fortress, he was attacked by two soldiers, and dismounted. One of them drew his sword in order to dispatch him; when the king exclaimed, "Hold, knave! I am the king of England." The soldier suspended his blow; and raising the king from the ground, with expressions of respect, received a handsome reward, and was taken into his service. Prince Henry was soon after obliged to capitulate; and being despoiled of all his patrimony, wandered about for some time with very few attendants, and often in great poverty.

The continued intestine discord among the barons was alone in that age destructive: the public wars were commonly short and feeble, produced little bloodshed, and were attended with no memorable event. To this Norman war, which was so soon concluded, there succeeded hostilities with Scotland, which were not of longer duration, Robert here commanded his brother's army, and obliged Malcolm to accept of peace, and do homage to the crown of England. This peace was not more durable. Malcolm, two years after, levying an army, invaded England; and after ravaging Northumberland, he laid siege to Alnwick, where a party of Earl Moubray's troops falling upon him by surprise, a sharp action ensued, in which Malcolm was slain. This incident interrupted for some years the regular succession to the Scottish crown. Though Malcolm left illegitimate sons, his brother Donald, on account of the youth of these princes, was advanced to the throne; but kept no long possession of it. Duncan, natural son of Malcolm, formed a conspiracy against him; and being assisted by William with a small force, made himself master of the kingdom. New broils ensued with Normandy. The frank, open, remiss temper of Robert was ill fitted to withstand the interested rapacious character of William, who, supported by greater power, was still encroaching on his brother's possessions, and instigating his turbulent barons to rebellion against him. The king, having gone over to Normandy to support his partisans, ordered an army of twenty thousand men to be levied in England, and to be conducted to the sea-coast, as if they were instantly to be embarked. Here Ralph Flambard, the king's minister, and the chief instrument of his extortions, exacted ten shillings a-piece (the sum provided for their support during the campaign) from them, in lieu of their service, and then dismissed them into their several counties. This money was so skillfully employed by William, that it rendered him better service than he could have expected from the army. He engaged the French king by new presents to depart from the protection of Robert; and he daily bribed the Norman barons to desert his service; but was prevented from pushing his advantages by an incursion of the Welsh, which obliged him to return to England. He found no difficulty in repelling the enemy; but was not able to make any considerable impression on a country guarded by its mountainous situation. A conspiracy of his own barons, which was detected at this time, appeared a more serious concern, and engrossed all his attention. Robert Moubray, earl of Northumberland, was at the head of this combination; and he engaged in it the Count d'Eu, Richard de Tunbridge, Roger de Lacey, and many others. The purpose of the conspirators was to dethrone the king, and to advance in his stead Stephen, count of Aumale, nephew to the Conqueror. William's dispatch prevented the design from taking effect, and disconcerted the conspirators. Moubray made some resistance; but being taken prisoner, was attainted, and thrown into confinement, where he died about thirty years after. The Count d'Eu denied his concurrence in the plot; and to justify himself fought, in the presence of the court at Windsor, a duel with Geoffrey Bainsard, who accused him. But being worsted in the combat, he was condemned to be castrated, and to have his eyes put out. William de Alder, another conspirator, was supposed to be treated with more rigour when he was sentenced to be hanged.

But the noise of these petty wars and commotions was quite sunk in the tumult of the crusades, which now engrossed the attention of Europe, and have ever since engaged the curiosity of mankind, as the most signal and most durable monument of human folly that has yet appeared in any age or nation. After Mahomet had, by means of his pretended revelations, united the dispersed Arabians under one head, they issued forth from their deserts in great multitudes; and being animated with zeal for their new religion, and supported by the vigour of their new government, they made deep impression on the eastern empire, which was far in the decline, with regard both to military discipline and to civil policy. Jerusalem, by its situation, became one of their most early conquests; and the Christians had the mortification to see the holy sepulchre, and the other places, consecrated by the presence of their religious founder, fallen into the possession of infidels. But the Arabians, or Saracens, were so employed in military enterprises, by which they spread their empire in a few years from the banks of the Ganges to the Straits of Gibraltar, that they had no leisure for theological controversy: and though the Alcoran, the original monument of their faith, seems to contain some violent precepts, they were much less infected with the spirit of bigotry and persecution, than the indolent and speculative Greeks, who were continually refining on the several articles of their religious system. They gave little disturbance to those zealous pilgrims who daily flocked to Jerusalem; and they allowed every man, after paying a moderate tribute, to visit the holy sepulchre, to perform his religious duties, and to return in peace. But the Turcomans, or Turks, a tribe of Tartars who had embraced Mahometanism, having wrested Syria from the Saracens, and having, in the year 1065, made themselves masters of Jerusalem, rendered the pilgrimage much more difficult and dangerous to the Christians. The barbarity of their manners, and the confusions attending their unsettled government, exposed the pilgrims to many insults, robberies, and extortions; and these zealots, returning from their meritorious fatigues and sufferings, filled all Christendom with indignation against the infidels, who profaned the holy city by their presence, and derided the sacred mysteries in the very place of their completion. Gregory VII., among the other vast ideas which he entertained, had formed the design of uniting all the western Christians against the Mahometans; but the egregious and violent invasions of that pontiff on the civil power of princes, had created him so many enemies, and had rendered his schemes so suspicious, that he was not able to make great progress in this undertaking. The work was reserved for a meaner instrument, whose low condition in life exposed him to no jealousy, and whose folly was well calculated to coincide with the prevailing principles of the times.

Peter, commonly called the hermit, a native of Amiens in Picardy, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Being deeply affected with the dangers to which that act of piety now exposed the pilgrims, as well as with the instances of oppression under which the eastern Christians laboured, he entertained the bold, and in all appearance impracticable project of leading into Asia, from the furthest extremities of the west, armies sufficient to subdue those potent and warlike nations which now held the holy city in subjection. He proposed his views to Martin II., who filled the papal chair, and who, though sensible of the advantages which the head of the Christian religion must reap from a religious war, and though he esteemed the blind zeal of Peter a proper means for effecting the purpose, resolved not to interpose his authority till he saw a greater probability of success. He summoned a council at Placentia, which consisted of four thousand ecclesiastics, and thirty thousand seculars; and which was so numerous that no hall could contain the multitude, and it was necessary to hold the assembly in a plain. The harangues of the pope, and of Peter himself, representing the dismal situation of their brethren in the east, and the indignity suffered by the Christian name, in allowing the holy city to remain in the hands of infidels, here found the minds of men so well prepared, that the whole multitude suddenly and violently declared for the war, and solemnly devoted themselves to perform this service, so meritorious, as they believed it, to God and religion.

But though Italy seemed thus to have zealously embraced the enterprise, Martin knew that in order to ensure success it was necessary to enlist the greater and more warlike nations in the same engagement; and having previously exhorted Peter to visit the chief cities and sovereigns of Christendom, he summoned another council at Claremont in Auvergne. The fame of this great and pious design, being now universally diffused, procured the attendance of the greatest prelates, nobles, and princes; and when the pope and the hermit renewed their pathetic exhortations, the whole assembly, as if impelled by an immediate inspiration, not moved by their preceding impressions, exclaimed with one voice, "It is the will of God! It is the will of God!" Words deemed so memorable, and so much the result of a divine influence, that they were employed as the signal of rendezvous and battle in all the future exploits of those adventurers. Men of all ranks flew to arms with the utmost ardour; and an exterior symbol too, a circumstance of chief moment, was here chosen by the devoted combatants. The sign of the cross, which had been hitherto so much revered among Christians, and which, the more it was an object of reproach, among the Pagan world, was the more passionately cherished by them, became the badge of union, and was affixed to their right shoulder, by all who enlisted themselves in this sacred warfare.

Europe was at this time sunk into profound ignorance and superstition: the ecclesiastics had acquired the greatest ascendancy over the human mind: the people, who, being little restrained by honour, and less by law, abandoned themselves to the worst crimes and disorders, knew of no other expiation than the observances imposed on them by their spiritual pastors: and it was easy to represent the holy war as an equivalent for all penances, and an atonement for every violation of justice and humanity. But amidst the abject superstition which now prevailed, the military spirit also had universally diffused itself; and though not supported by art or discipline, was become the general passion of the nations governed by the feudal law. All the great lords possessed the right of peace and war: they were engaged in perpetual hostilities with each other: the open country was become a scene of outrage and disorder: the cities, still mean and poor, were neither guarded by walls nor protected by privileges, and were exposed to every insult: individuals were obliged to depend for safety on their own force, or their private alliances: and valour was the only excellence which was held in esteem, or gave one man the pre-eminence above another. When all the particular superstitions, therefore, were here united in one great object, the ardour for military enterprises took the same direction; and Europe, impelled by its two ruling passions, was loosened, as it were, from its foundations, and seemed to precipitate itself in one united body upon the east.

All orders of men deeming the crusades the only road to heaven, enlisted themselves under these sacred banners, and were impatient to open the way with their sword to the holy city. Nobles, artisans, peasants, even priests, enrolled their names; and to decline this meritorious service was branded with the reproach of impiety, or what perhaps was esteemed still more disgraceful, of cowardice and pusillanimity. The infirm and aged contributed to the expedition by presents and money; and many of them, not satisfied with the merit of this atonement, attended it in person, and were determined, if possible, to breathe their last in sight of that city where their Saviour had died for them. Women themselves, concealing their sex under the disguise of armour, attended the camp; and commonly forgot still more the duty of the sex, by prostituting themselves without reserve to the army. The greatest criminals were forward in a service which they regarded as a propitiation for all crimes; and the most enormous disorders were, during the course of those expeditions, committed by men inured to wickedness, encouraged by example, and impelled by necessity. The multitude of the adventurers soon became so great, that their more sagacious leaders, Hugh, count of Vermondois, brother to the French king, Raymond, count of Toulouse, Godfrey of Bouillon, prince of Brabant, and Stephen, count of Blois, became apprehensive lest the greatness itself of the armament should disappoint its purpose; and they permitted an undisciplined multitude, computed at 300,000 men, to go before them, under the command of Peter the Hermit and Walter the Moneyless. These men took the road towards Constantinople, through Hungary and Bulgaria; and trusting that Heaven, by supernatural assistance, would supply all their necessities, they made no provision for subsistence on their march. They soon found themselves obliged to obtain by plunder what they had vainly expected from miracles; and the enraged inhabitants of the countries through which they passed, gathering together in arms, attacked the disorderly multitude, and put them to slaughter without resistance. The more disciplined armies followed after; and passing the straits of Constantinople, they were mustered in the plains of Asia, and amounted in the whole to the number of 700,000 combatants.

Amidst this universal frenzy which spread itself by contagion throughout Europe, especially in France and Germany, men were not entirely forgetful of their present interests; and both those who went on this expedition, and those who staid behind, entertained schemes of gratifying, by its means, their avarice or their ambition. The nobles who enlisted themselves were moved from the romantic spirit of the age, to hope for opulent establishments in the east, the chief seat of arts and commerce during those ages; and in pursuit of these chimerical projects, they sold at the lowest price their ancient castles and inheritances, which had now lost all value in their eyes. The greater princes, who remained at home, besides establishing peace in their dominions, by giving occupation abroad to the inquietude and martial disposition of their subjects, took the opportunity of annexing to their crown many considerable fiefs, either by purchase or by the extinction of heirs. The pope frequently turned the zeal of the crusaders from the infidels against his own enemies, whom he represented as equally criminal with the enemies of Christ. The convents and other religious societies bought the possessions of the adventurers; and as the contributions of the faithful were commonly intrusted to their management, they often diverted to this purpose what was intended to be employed against the infidels. But no one was a more immediate gainer by this epidemic fury than the king of England, who kept aloof from all connexions with those fanatical and romantic warriors.

Robert, duke of Normandy, impelled by the bravery and mistaken generosity of his spirit, had early enlisted himself in the crusade; but being always unprovided with money, he found that it would be impracticable for him to appear in a manner suitable to his rank and station at the head of his numerous vassals and subjects, who, transported with the general rage, were determined to follow him into Asia. He resolved, therefore, to mortgage, or rather to sell his dominions, which he had not talents to govern; and he offered them to his brother William, for the very unequal sum of ten thousand marks. The bargain was soon concluded: the king raised the money by violent extortions on his subjects of all ranks, even on the convents, who were obliged to melt their plate in order to furnish the quota demanded of them; he was put in possession of Normandy and Maine, and Robert, providing himself with a magnificent train, set out for the Holy Land in pursuit of glory, and in full confidence of securing his eternal salvation.

The smallness of this sum, with the difficulty which William found in raising it, suffices alone to refute the account which is heedlessly adopted by historians, of the enormous revenue of the Conqueror. Is it credible that Robert would consign to the rapacious hands of his brother such considerable dominions for a sum which, according to that account, made not a week's income of his father's English revenue alone? Or that the king of England could not on demand, without oppressing his subjects, have been able to pay him the money? The Conqueror, it is agreed, was frugal as well as rapacious; yet his treasure, at his death, exceeded not sixty thousand pounds, which hardly amounted to his income for two months: another certain refutation of that exaggerated account.

The fury of the crusades, during this age, less infected England than the neighbouring kingdoms; probably because the Norman conquerors, finding their settlement in that kingdom still somewhat precarious, durst not abandon their homes in quest of distant adventures. The selfish interested spirit also of the king, which kept him from kindling in the general flame, checked its progress among its subjects; and as he is accused of open profaneness, and was endued with a sharp wit, it is likely that he made the romantic chivalry of the crusaders the object of his perpetual railery. As an instance of his irreligion, we are told, that he once accepted of sixty marks from a Jew, whose son had been converted to Christianity, and who engaged him by that present to assist him in bringing back the youth to Judaism. William employed both menaces and persuasion for that purpose; but finding the convert obstinate in his new faith, he sent for the father, and told him, that as he had not succeeded, it was not just that he should keep the present; but as he had done his utmost, it was but equitable that he should be paid for his pains; and he would therefore retain only thirty marks of the money. At another time, it is said, he sent for some learned Christian theologians and some rabbis, and bade them fairly dispute the question of their religion in his presence: he was perfectly indifferent between them; had his ears open to reason and conviction; and would embrace that doctrine which, upon comparison, should be found supported by the most solid arguments. If this story be true, it is probable that he meant only to amuse himself by turning both into ridicule: but we must be cautious of admitting everything related by the monkish historians to the disadvantage of this prince: he had the misfortune to be engaged in quarrels with the ecclesiastics, particularly with Anselm, commonly called St. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury; and it is no wonder his memory should be blackened by the historians of that order.

After the death of Lanfranc, the king for several years retained in his own hands the revenues of Canterbury, as he did those of many other vacant bishoprics; but falling into a dangerous sickness, he was seized with remorse, and the clergy represented to him, that he was in danger of eternal perdition, if before his death he did not make atonement for those multiplied impieties and sacrileges of which he had been guilty. He resolved, therefore, to supply instantly the vacancy of Canterbury; and for that purpose he sent for Anselm, a Piedmontese by birth, abbot of Bec, in Normandy, who was much celebrated for his learning and piety. The abbot earnestly refused the dignity, fell on his knees, wept, and entreated the king to change his purpose; and when he found the prince obstinate in forcing the pastoral staff upon him, he kept his fist so fast clenched, that it required the utmost violence of the bystanders to open it, and force him to receive that ensign of spiritual dignity. William soon after recovered; and his passions regaining their wonted vigour, he returned to his former violence and rapine. He detained in prison several persons whom he had ordered to be freed during the time of his penitence; he still preyed upon the ecclesiastical benefices; the sale of spiritual dignities continued as open as ever; and he kept possession of a considerable part of the revenues belonging to the see of Canterbury. But he found in Anselm that persevering opposition which he had reason to expect from the ostentatious humility which that prelate had displayed in refusing his promotion.

The opposition made by Anselm was the more dangerous on account of the character of piety which he soon acquired in England, by his great zeal against all abuses, particularly those in dress and ornament. There was a mode, which, in that age, prevailed throughout Europe, both among men and women, to give an enormous length to their shoes, to draw the toe to a sharp point, and to affix to it the figure of a bird's bill, or some such ornament, which was turned upwards, and which was often sustained by gold or silver chains tied to the knee. The ecclesiastics took exception at this ornament, which they said was an attempt to belie the Scripture, where it is affirmed, that no man can add a cubit to his stature; and they declaimed against it with great vehemence, nay, assembled some synods, who absolutely condemned it. But, such are the strange contradictions in human nature! though the clergy, at that time, could overturn thrones, and had authority sufficient to send above a million of men on their errand to the deserts of Asia, they could never prevail against these long-pointed shoes: on the contrary, that caprice, contrary to all other modes, maintained its ground during several centuries; and if the clergy had not at last desisted from their persecution of it, it might still have been the prevailing fashion in Europe.

But Anselm was more fortunate in decrying the particular mode which was the object of his aversion, and which probably had not taken such fast hold of the affections of the people. He preached zealously against the long hair and curled locks which were then fashionable among the courtiers; he refused the ashes on Ash-Wednesday to those who were so accoutred; and his authority and eloquence had such influence, that the young men universally abandoned that ornament, and appeared in the cropt hair, which was recommended to them by the sermons of the primate. The noted historian of Anselm, who was also his companion and secretary, celebrates highly this effort of his zeal and piety.

When William's profaneness, therefore, returned to him with his health, he was soon engaged in controversies with this austere prelate. There was at that time a schism in the church between Urban and Clement, who both pretended to the papacy; and Anselm, who was abbot of Bec, and had already acknowledged the former, was determined, without the king's consent, to introduce his authority into England. William, who imitating his father's example, had prohibited his subjects from recognising any pope whom he had not previously received, was enraged at this attempt; and summoned a synod at Rockingham, with an intention of deposing Anselm: but the prelate's suffragans declared, that, without the papal authority, they knew of no expedient for inflicting that punishment on their primate. The king was at last engaged by other motives to give the preference to Urban's title; Anselm received the pall from that pontiff; and matters seemed to be accommodated between the king and the primate, when the quarrel broke out afresh from a new cause. William had undertaken an expedition against Wales, and required the archbishop to furnish his quota of soldiers for that service; but Anselm, who regarded the demand as an oppression on the church, and yet durst not refuse compliance, sent them so miserably accoutred, that the king was extremely displeased, and threatened him with a prosecution. Anselm, on the other hand, demanded positively that all the revenues of his see should be restored to him; appealed to Rome against the king's injustice; and affairs came to such extremities, that the primate, finding it dangerous to remain in the kingdom desired and obtained the king's permission to retire beyond sea. All his temporalities were seized; but he was received with great respect by Urban, who considered him as a martyr in the cause of religion, and even menaced the king, on account of his proceedings against the primate and the church, with the sentence of excommunication. Anselm assisted at the council of Bari, where, besides fixing the controversy between the Greek and Latin churches, concerning the procession of the Holy Ghost, the right of election to church preferments was declared to belong to the clergy alone, and spiritual censures were denounced against all ecclesiastics, who did homage to laymen for their sees or benefices, and against all laymen who exacted it. The right of homage, by the feudal customs, was, that the vassal should throw himself on his knees, should put his joined hands between those of his superior, and should in that posture swear fealty to him. But the council declared it execrable, that pure hands, which could create God, and could offer him up as a sacrifice for the salvation of mankind, should be put, after this humiliating manner, between profane hands, which, besides being inured to rapine and bloodshed, were employed day and night in impure purposes, and obscene contacts. Such were the reasons prevalent in that age; reasonings which, though they cannot be passed over in silence, without omitting the most curious, and perhaps, not the least instructive part of history, can scarcely be delivered with the requisite decency and gravity.

The cession of Normandy and Maine by Duke Robert increased the king's territories; but brought him no great increase of power, because of the unsettled state of those countries, the mutinous disposition of the barons, and the vicinity of the French king, who supported them in all their insurrections. Even Helie, lord of la Fleche, a small town in Anjou, was able to give him inquietude; and this great monarch was obliged to make several expeditions abroad, without being able to prevail over so petty a baron, who had acquired the confidence and affections of the inhabitants of Maine. He was, however, so fortunate as at last to take him prisoner in a rencounter; but having released him, at the intercession of the French king and the count of Anjou, he found the province of Maine still exposed to his intrigues and incursions. Helie, being introduced by the citizens into the town of Mans, besieged the garrison in the citadel: William, who was hunting in the New Forest, when he received intelligence of this hostile attempt, was so provoked, that he immediately turned his horse, and galloped to the sea-shore at Dartmouth; declaring, that he would not stop a moment till he had taken vengeance for the offence. He found the weather so cloudy and tempestuous, that the mariners thought it dangerous to put to sea: but the king hurried on board, and ordered them to set sail instantly, exclaiming, "Kings are never drowned!" By this vigour and celerity, he delivered the citadel of Mans from its present danger; and pursuing Helie into his own territories, he laid siege to Majol, a small castle in those parts: but a wound, which he received before this place, obliged him to raise the siege, and he returned to England.

The weakness of the greatest monarchs, during this age, in their military expeditions against their nearest neighbours, appears the more surprising, when we consider the prodigious numbers which even petty princes, seconding the enthusiastic rage of the people, were able to assemble, and to conduct in dangerous enterprises to the remote provinces of Asia. William, earl of Poitiers and duke of Guienne, inflamed with the glory, and not discouraged by the misfortunes, which had attended the former adventurers in the crusades, had put himself at the head of an immense multitude, computed by some historians to amount to sixty thousand horse, and a much greater number of foot,* and he purposed to lead them into the Holy Land against the infidels. He wanted money to forward the preparations requisite for this expedition, and he offered to mortgage all his dominions to William, without entertaining any scruple on account of that rapacious and iniquitous hand, to which he resolved to consign them. The king accepted the offer; and had prepared a fleet and an army, in order to escort the money, and take possession of the rich provinces of Guienne and Poictou; when an accident put an end to his life, and to all his ambitious projects. He was engaged in hunting, the sole amusement, and indeed the chief occupation of princes in those rude times, when society was little cultivated, and the arts afforded, few objects worthy of attention. Walter Tyrrel, a French gentleman, remarkable for his address in archery, attended him in this recreation, of which the New Forest was the scene; and as William had dismounted after a chase, Tyrrel, impatient to show his dexterity, let fly an arrow at a stag, which suddenly started before him. The arrow, glancing from a tree, struck the king in the breast, and instantly slew him; while Tyrrel, without informing any one of the accident, put spurs to his horse, hastened to the sea-shore, embarked for France, and joined the crusade in an expedition to Jerusalem; a penance which he imposed on himself for this involuntary crime. The body of William was found in the forest by the country-people, and was buried without any pomp or ceremony at Winchester. His courtiers were negligent in performing the last duties to a master who was so little beloved; and every one was too much occupied in the interesting object of fixing his successor, to attend the funeral of a dead sovereign.

The memory of this monarch is transmitted to us with little advantage by the churchmen, whom he had offended; and though we may suspect, in general, that their account of his vices is somewhat exaggerated, his conduct affords little reason for contradicting the character which they have assigned him, or for attributing to him any very estimable qualities. He seems to have been a violent and tyrannical prince; a perfidious, encroaching, and dangerous neighbour; an unkind and ungenerous relation. He was equally prodigal and rapacious in the management of his treasury; and if he possessed abilities, he lay so much under the government of impetuous passions, that he made little use of them in his administration; and he indulged, without reserve, that domineering policy, which suited his temper, and which, if supported, as it was in him, with courage and vigour, proves often more successful in disorderly times, than the deepest foresight and most refined artifice.

Such is Hume's statement. The following more minute details are from Lingard:—

* The whole is said to have amounted to three hundred thousand men.

"At the death of the Conqueror the royal treasury at Winchester contained sixty thousand pounds of silver, besides gold and precious stones; and if to this sum we add the annual revenue of the crown, we may safely pronounce William to have been at his succession a most opulent monarch. But no accumulation of wealth, however large, no supply however abundant, could equal the waste of his prodigality. He spurned at restraints; and in his dress and table, in his pleasures and presents, left far behind him the most extravagant of his contemporaries.

"Malmesbury narrates, as a proof of his senseless extravagance, that he refused a pair of hose because they only cost three shillings, and put on a worse pair, when his chamberlain assured him that they had cost a mark.

"Immense sums were lavished in purchasing or rewarding the services of foreigners, who, whatever might be their country or their character, were assured of receiving a gracious welcome from the king of England.

"His favourite instrument of extortion, Ralf, afterwards surnamed Flambard, or devouring torch, was a Norman clergyman of obscure birth, ready wit, dissolute morals, and insatiable ambition. He had followed the court of the Conqueror, and first attracted notice in the capacity of a public informer. From the service of Maurice, bishop of London, he passed to that of William; and the king soon discovered his qualifications, and gradually raised him to the highest distinction in the kingdom, by appointing him to the offices of royal chaplain, treasurer, and justiciary. The minister was sensible that to retain the favour, it was necessary to flatter the vices of his master: and his ingenuity was successfully employed in devising new methods of raising money. The liberty of hunting was circumscribed by additional penalties: to multiply fines, new offences were created: capital punishments were commuted for pecuniary mulcts: and another survey of the kingdom was ordered to raise the land-tax of those estates which had been under-rated in the record of Domesday. By these acts Flambard earned the eulogium which was pronounced on him by the king, that he was the only man, who, to please a master, was willing to brave the vengeance of the rest of mankind.

"William's court was a constant scene of debauchery. In order that he might indulge his passions with less restraint, he refused to marry: the young nobility courted the favour of their sovereign by imitating his example: and in the society of flatterers and prostitutes, the decencies of life and prohibitions of religion were equally exposed to outrage and derision."

The following narration of his death is given also by Lingard from the chroniclers:—

"For some time predictions of his approaching fate had been circulated among the people, and were readily believed by those, whose piety he had shocked by his debaucheries, or whose hatred he had provoked by his rapacity. Nor was he without apprehension himself. On the first of August, 1100, he passed a restless night; and his imagination was so disturbed by dreams, that he sent for servants to watch near his bed. Before sunrise Fitz-Hamen entered the chamber, and related to him the vision of a foreign monk, which was interpreted to presage some calamity to the king. 'The man,' he exclaimed, with a forced smile, 'dreams like a monk. Give him a hundred shillings.' He was, however, unable to conceal the impression which these portents had made on his mind; and, at the request of his friends, devoted the morning to business. At dinner he ate and drank more copiously than usual: his spirits revived, and shortly afterwards he rode out into the forest. There most of his attendants successively left him, separating in pursuit of game; and about sunset he was discovered by some countrymen, lying on the ground and weltering in blood. An arrow, the shaft of which was broken, had entered his breast. The body was conveyed in a cart to Winchester, where it was hastily buried the next morning. Out of respect to his rank a grave was allotted him in the cathedral; but it was deemed indecent to honour with religious rites the obsequies of a prince whose life had been so impious, and whose death was too sudden to encourage a hope that he had found time to repent."

We must digress a moment to remind the reader that Lingard is a strict Roman Catholic, and as such, shields the church in every instance. The natural inference here is, that churchmen are as vindictive as any other set of men, and wreaked on the corse that disrespect they could only feel without displaying during his life. It is a strange but lamentable truth, that churchmen alone carry vengeance beyond the grave.

But to return to his pleasing narrative. "By whose hand the king fell, and whether the arrow was directed against him by accident or design, are questions which cannot be satisfactorily answered. The report which obtained credit at that time was, that William following a wounded deer with his eyes, held his hand near his face to intercept the rays of the sun, and at the same moment an arrow from the bow of Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, glancing from a tree, struck him in the breast. It was added, that the unintentional homicide, spurring his horse to the shore, immediately crossed to the continent; and a pilgrimage which he afterwards made to the Holy Land, was attributed to remorse, and construed into a proof of his guilt. But Tyrrel always denied the charge; and after his return, when he had nothing to hope or fear, deposed upon oath in the presence of Suger, abbot of St. Denis, that he never saw the king on the day of his death, nor entered that part of the forest where he fell. If William perished by treason (a supposition not very improbable), it was politic in the assassin to fix the guilt on one who was no longer in the kingdom. This at least is certain, that no inquiry was made into the cause or the manner of his death: whence we may infer that his successor, if he were not convinced that it would not bear investigation, was too well pleased with an event which raised him to the throne, to trouble himself about the means by which it was effected.

"William was short in person, with flaxen hair, and a ruddy complexion; from which last circumstance (and not from the colour of his hair), he derived the name of Rufus, or the Red. In ordinary conversation his utterance was slow and embarrassed: in the hurry of passion precipitate and unintelligible. He assumed in public a haughty port, rolling his eyes with fierceness on the spectators, and endeavouring by the tone of his voice, and the tenour of his answers, to intimidate those who addressed him. But in private he descended to an equality with his companions, amusing them with his wit, which was chiefly pointed against himself, and seeking to lessen the odium of his excesses, by making them the subjects of laughter.

"He built, at the expense of the neighbouring counties, a wall round the Tower, a bridge over the Thames, and the great hall at Westminster. The latter was finished the year before his death; and when he first visited it after his return from Normandy, he replied to his flatterers, that there was nothing in its dimensions to excite their wonder: it was only the vestibule to the palace which he intended to raise. But in this respect he seems to have followed, not to have created, the taste of the age. During his reign, structures of unusual magnificence arose in every part of the kingdom; and the most opulent proprietors sought to distinguish themselves by the castles which they built, and the monasteries which they founded."

The most laudable foreign enterprise which William undertook, was the sending of Edgar Atheling, three years before his death, into Scotland with a small army, to restore Prince Edgar, the true heir of that kingdom, son of Malcolm, and of Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling; and the enterprise proved successful. It was remarked in that age, that Richard, an elder brother of William's, perished by an accident in the New Forest; Richard, his nephew, natural son of Duke Robert, lost his life in the same place, after the same manner: and all men, upon the king's fate, exclaimed, that as the Conqueror had been guilty of extreme violence, impelling all the inhabitants of that large district to make room for his game, the just vengeance of Heaven was signalized, in the same place, by the slaughter of his posterity. William was killed in the thirteenth year of his reign, and about the fortieth year of his age. As he was never married, he left no legitimate issue.

In the eleventh year of this reign, Magnus, king of Norway, made a descent on the Isle of Anglesea, but was repulsed by Hugh, earl of Shrewsbury. This is the last attempt made by the northern nations upon England. That restless people seem about this time to have learned the practice of tillage, which thenceforth kept them at home, and freed the other nations of Europe from the devastations spread over them by those piratical invaders. This proved one great cause of the subsequent settlement and improvement of the southern nations.

AFTER the adventurers in the holy war were assembled on the banks of the Bosphorus, opposite to Constantinople, they proceeded on their enterprise; but immediately experienced those difficulties which their zeal had hitherto concealed from them, and for which, even if they had foreseen them, it would have been almost impossible to provide a remedy. The Greek emperor, Alexis Comnenus, who had applied to the Western Christians for succour against the Turks, entertained hopes, and those but feeble ones, of obtaining such a moderate supply, as, acting under his command, might enable him to repulse the enemy: but he was extremely astonished to see his dominions overwhelmed, on a sudden, by such an inundation of licentious barbarians, who, though they pretended friendship, despised his subjects as unwarlike, and detested them as heretical. By all the arts of policy, in which he excelled, he endeavoured to divert the torrent; but while he employed professions, caresses, civilities, and seeming services towards the leaders of the crusade, he secretly regarded those imperious allies as more dangerous than the open enemies by whom his empire had been formerly invaded. Having effected that difficult point of disembarking them safely in Asia, he entered into a private correspondence with Soliman, emperor of the Turks; and practised every insidious art, which his genius, his power, or his situation, enabled him to employ, for disappointing the enterprise, and discouraging the Latins from making thenceforward any such prodigious migrations. His dangerous policy was seconded by the disorders inseparable from so vast a multitude, who were not united under one head, and were conducted by leaders of the most independent, intractable spirit, unacquainted with military discipline, and determined enemies to civil authority and submission. The scarcity of provisions, the excesses of fatigue, the influence of unknown climates, joined to the want of concert in their operations, and to the sword of a warlike enemy, destroyed the adventurers by thousands, and would have abated the ardour of men impelled to war by less powerful motives. Their zeal, however, their bravery, and their irresistible force, still carried them forward, and continually advanced them to the great end of their enterprise. After an obstinate siege, they took Nice, the seat of the Turkish empire; they defeated Soliman in two great battles; they made themselves masters of Antioch; and entirely broke the force of the Turks, who had so long retained those countries in subjection. The soldan of Egypt, whose alliance they had hitherto courted, recovered, on the fall of the Turkish power, his former authority in Jerusalem; and he informed them by his ambassadors, that if they came disarmed to that city, they might now perform their religious vows, and that all Christian pilgrims, who should thenceforth visit the holy sepulchre, might expect the same good treatment which they had ever received from his predecessors. The offer was rejected; the soldan was required to yield up the city to the Christians; and on his refusal, the champions of the cross advanced to the siege of Jerusalem, which they regarded as the consummation of their labours. By the detachments which they had made, and the disasters which they had undergone, they were diminished to the number of twenty thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse; but these were still formidable, from their valour, their experience, and the obedience which from past calamities, they had learned to pay to their leaders. After a siege of five weeks, they took Jerusalem by assault; and, impelled by a mixture of military and religious rage, they put the numerous garrison and inhabitants to the sword without distinction. Neither arms defended the valiant, nor submission the timorous: no age or sex was spared: infants on the breast were pierced by the same blow with their mother, who implored for mercy: even a multitude, to the number of ten thousand persons, who had surrendered themselves prisoners, and were promised quarter, were butchered in cool blood by those ferocious conquerors. The streets of Jerusalem were covered with dead bodies; and the triumphant warriors, after every enemy was subdued and slaughtered, immediately turned themselves, with the sentiments of humiliation and contrition, towards the holy sepulchre. They threw aside their arms, still streaming with blood: they advanced with reclined bodies, and naked feet and heads to that sacred monument: they sung anthems to their Saviour, who had there purchased their salvation by his death and agony: and their devotion, enlivened by the presence of the place where he had suffered, so overcame their fury, that they dissolved in tears, and bore the appearance of every soft and tender sentiment. So inconsistent is human nature with itself! And so easily does the most effeminate superstition ally, both with the most heroic courage and with the fiercest barbarity!

This great event happened on the 5th of July in the last year of the eleventh century. The Christian princes and nobles, after choosing Godfrey of Bouillon, king of Jerusalem, began to settle themselves in their new conquests; while some of them returned to Europe, in order to enjoy at home that glory which their valour had acquired them in this popular enterprise. Among these was Robert, duke of Normandy, who, as he had relinquished the greatest dominions of any prince that attended the crusade, had all along distinguished himself by the most intrepid courage, as well as by that affable disposition and unbounded generosity which gain the hearts of soldiers, and qualify a prince to shine in a military life. In passing through Italy, he became acquainted with Sybilla, daughter of the count of Conversana, a young lady of great beauty and merit, whom he espoused: indulging himself in this new passion, as well as fond of enjoying ease and pleasure, after the fatigues of so many rough campaigns, he lingered a twelvemonth in that delicious climate; and though his friends in the north looked every moment for his arrival, none of them knew when they could with certainty expect it. By this delay he lost the kingdom of England, which the great fame he had acquired during the crusades, as well as his undoubted title, both by birth and by the preceding agreement with his deceased brother, would, had he been present, have infallibly secured to him.

Prince Henry was hunting with Rufus in the New Forest, when intelligence of that monarch's death was brought him; and being sensible of the advantage attending the conjuncture, he hurried to Winchester, in order to secure the royal treasure, which he knew to be a necessary implement for facilitating his designs on the crown. He had scarcely reached the place when William de Breteuil, keeper of the treasure, arrived, and opposed himself to Henry's pretensions. This nobleman, who had been engaged in the same party of hunting, had no sooner heard of his master's death, than he hastened to take care of his charge; and he told the prince, that this treasure, as well as the crown, belonged to his elder brother, who was now his sovereign; and that he himself, for his part, was determined, in spite of all other pretensions, to maintain his allegiance to him. But Henry, drawing his sword, threatened him with instant death if he dared to disobey him; and as others of the late king's retinue, who came every moment to Winchester, joined the prince's party, Breteuil was obliged to withdraw his opposition, and to acquiesce in this violence.

Henry, without losing a moment, hastened with the money to London; and having assembled some noblemen and prelates, whom his address, or abilities, or presents, gained to his side, he was suddenly elected, or rather saluted king; and immediately proceeded to the exercise of royal authority. In less than three days after his brother's death, the ceremony of his coronation (which was the same as had been observed in the coronation of the Anglo-Saxon kings) was performed at Westminster by Maurice, bishop of London, who was persuaded to officiate on that occasion; and thus, by his courage and celerity, he intruded himself into the vacant throne. No one had sufficient spirit, or sense of duty, to appear in defence of the absent prince: all men were seduced or intimidated: present possession supplied the apparent defects in Henry's title, which was indeed founded on plain usurpation: and the barons, as well as the people, acquiesced in a claim, which, though it could neither be justified nor comprehended, could now, they found, be opposed through the perils alone of civil war and rebellion.

But as Henry foresaw that a crown, usurped against all rules of justice, would sit unsteady on his head, he resolved, by fair professions at least, to gain the affections of all his subjects. Besides taking the usual coronation-oath to maintain the laws and execute justice, he passed a charter, which was calculated to remedy many of the grievous oppressions which had been complained of during the reigns of his father and brother. He there promised, that, at the death of any bishop or abbot, he never would seize the revenues of the see or abbey during the vacancy, but would leave the whole to be reaped by the successor; and that he would never let to farm any ecclesiastical benefice, nor dispose of it for money. After this concession to the church, whose favour was of so great importance, he proceeded to enumerate the civil grievances which he purposed to redress. He promised that, upon the death of any earl, baron, or military tenant, his heir should be admitted to the possession of his estate, on paying a just and lawful relief; without being exposed to such violent exactions as had been usual during the late reigns: he remitted the wardship of minors, and allowed guardians to be appointed, who should be answerable for the trust: he promised not to dispose of any heiress in marriage, but by the advice of all the barons; and if any baron intended to give his daughter, sister, niece, or kinswoman in marriage, it should only be necessary for him to consult the king, who promised to take no money for his consent, nor ever to refuse permission, unless the person, to whom it was purposed to marry her, should happen to be his enemy: he granted his barons and military tenants the power of bequeathing, by will, their money or personal estates; and if they neglected to make a will, he promised that their heirs should succeed to them: he renounced the right of imposing moneyage, and of levying taxes at pleasure on the farms which the barons retained in their own hands: he made some general professions of moderating fines; he offered a pardon for all offences; and he remitted all debts due to the crown: he required that the vassals of the barons should enjoy the same privileges which he granted to his own barons; and he promised a general confirmation and observance of the laws of King Edward. This is the substance of the chief articles contained in that famous charter.

To give greater authenticity to these concessions, Henry lodged a copy of his charter in some abbey of each county; as if desirous that it should be exposed to the view of all his subjects, and remain a perpetual rule for the limitation and direction of his government: yet it is certain that, after the present purpose was served, he never once thought, during his reign, of observing one single article of it; and the whole fell so much into neglect and oblivion, that, in the following century, when the barons, who had heard an obscure tradition of it, desired to make it the model of the great charter which they exacted from King John, they could with difficulty find a copy of it in the kingdom. But as to the grievances here meant to be redressed, they were still continued in their full extent; and the royal authority, in all those particulars, lay under no manner of restriction. Reliefs of heirs, so capital an article, were never effectually fixed till the time of Magna Charta;* and it is evident that the general promise here given, of accepting a just and lawful relief, ought to have been reduced to more precision, in order to give security to the subject. The oppression of wardship and marriage was perpetuated even till the reign of Charles II. And it appears from Glanville,† the famous justiciary of Henry II., that, in his time, where any man died intestate, an accident which must have been very frequent when the art of writing was so little known, the king, or the lord of the fief, pretended to seize all the moveables, and to exclude every heir, even the children of the deceased: a sure mark of a tyrannical and arbitrary government.

The Normans, indeed, who domineered in England, were, during this age, so licentious a people, that they may be pronounced incapable of any true or regular liberty; which requires such improvement in knowledge and morals as can only be the result of reflection and experience, and must grow to perfection during several ages of settled and established government. They had indeed arms in their hands, which prevented the establishment of a total despotism, and left their posterity sufficient power, whenever they should attain a sufficient degree of reason, to assume true liberty: but their turbulent disposition frequently prompted them to make such use of their arms, that they were more fitted to obstruct the execution of justice, than to stop the career of violence and oppression. The prince, finding that greater opposition was often made to him when he enforced the laws than when he violated them, was apt to render his own will and pleasure the sole rule of government; and on every emergency, to consider more the power of the persons whom he might offend, than the rights of those whom he might injure. The very form of this charter of Henry proves that the Norman barons (for they, rather than the people of England, are chiefly concerned in it) were totally ignorant of the nature of a limited monarchy, and were ill qualified to conduct, in conjunction with their sovereign, the machine of government. It is an act of his sole power, is the result of his free grace, contains some articles which bind others as well as himself, and is therefore unfit to be the deed of any one who possesses not the whole legislative power, and who may not at pleasure revoke all his concessions.

Henry, further to increase his popularity, degraded and committed to prison Ralph Flambard bishop of Durham, who had been the chief instrument of oppression under his brother: but this act was followed by another, which was a direct violation of his own charter, and was a bad prognostic of his sincere intentions to observe it. He kept the see of Durham vacant for five years, and during that time retained possession of all its revenues. Sensible of the great authority which Anselm had acquired by his character of piety, and by the persecutions which he had undergone from William, he sent repeated messages to him at Lyons, where he resided, and invited him to return and take possession of his dignities. On the arrival of the prelate, he proposed to him the renewal of that homage which he had done his brother, and which had never been refused by any English bishop: but Anselm had acquired other sentiments by his journey to Rome, and gave the king an absolute refusal. He objected the decrees of the council of Bari, at which he himself had assisted; and he declared, that so far from doing homage for his spiritual dignity, he would not so much as communicate with any ecclesiastic who paid that submission, or who accepted of investitures from lay men. Henry, who expected, in his present delicate situation, to reap great advantages from the authority and popularity of Anselm, durst not insist on his demand: he only desired that the controversy might be suspended; and that messengers might be sent to Rome, in order to accommodate matters with the pope, and obtain his confirmation of the laws and customs of England.

There immediately occurred an important affair, in which the king was obliged to have recourse to the authority of Anselm. Matilda, daughter of Malcolm III., king of Scotland, and niece to Edgar Atheling, had, on her father's death, and the subsequent revolutions in the Scottish government, been brought to England, and educated under her aunt Christina, in the nunnery of Rumsey. This princess Henry purposed to marry; but as she had worn the veil, though never taken the vows, doubts might arise concerning the lawfulness of the act; and it behoved him to be very careful not to shock, in any particular, the religious prejudices of his subjects. The affair was examined by Anselm, in a council of the prelates and nobles which was summoned at Lambeth: Matilda there proved that she had put on the veil, not with a view of entering into a religious life, but merely in consequence of a custom familiar to the English ladies who protected their chastity from the brutal violence of the Normans, by taking shelter under that habit, which, amidst the horrible licentiousness of the times, was yet generally revered. The council, sensible that even a princess had otherwise no security for her honour, admitted this reason as valid: they pronounced that Matilda was still free to marry; and her espousals with Henry were celebrated by Anselm with great pomp and solemnity. No act of the king's reign rendered him equally popular with his English subjects, and tended more to establish him on the throne. Though Matilda, during the life of her uncle and brothers, was not heir of the Saxon line, she was become very dear to the English on account of her connexions with it: and that people, who before the conquest had fallen into a kind of indifference towards their ancient royal family, had felt so severely the tyranny of the Normans, that they reflected with extreme regret on their former liberty, and hoped for a more equal and mild administration, when the blood of their native princes should be mingled with that of their new sovereigns.

But the policy and prudence of Henry, which, if time had been allowed for these virtues to produce their full effect, would have secured him possession of the crown, ran great hazard of being frustrated by the sudden appearance of Robert, who returned to Normandy about a month after the death of his brother William. He took possession, without opposition, of that duchy; and immediately made preparations for recovering England, of which, during his absence, he had by Henry's intrigues been so unjustly defrauded. The great fame which he had acquired in the East forwarded his pretensions; and the Norman barons, sensible of the consequences, expressed the same discontent at the separation of the duchy and kingdom, which had appeared on the accession of William. Robert de Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury and Arundel, William de la Warrenne, earl of Surrey, Arnulf de Montgomery, Walter Giffard, Robert de Pontefract, Robert de Mallet, Yvo de Gretnesnil, and many others of the principal nobility, invited Robert to make an attempt upon England, and promised, on his landing, to join him with all their forces. Even the seamen were affected with the general popularity of his name, and they carried over to him the greater part of a fleet which had been equipped to oppose his passage. Henry, in this extremity, began to be apprehensive for his life, as well as for his crown; and had recourse to the superstition of the people, in order to oppose their sentiment of justice. He paid diligent court to Anselm, whose sanctity and wisdom he pretended to revere. He consulted him in all difficult emergencies; seemed to be governed by him in every measure; promised a strict regard to ecclesiastical privileges; professed a great attachment to Rome, and a resolution of persevering in an implicit obedience to the decrees of councils and to the will of the sovereign pontiff. By these caresses and declarations he entirely gained the confidence of the primate, whose influence over the people, and authority with the barons, were of the utmost service to him in his present situation. Anselm scrupled not to assure the nobles of the king's sincerity in those professions which he made, of avoiding the tyrannical and oppressive government of his father and brother: he even rode through the ranks of the army, recommended to the soldiers the defence of their prince, represented the duty of keeping their oaths of allegiance, and prognosticated to them the greatest happiness from the government of so wise and just a sovereign. By this expedient, joined to the influence of the earls of Warwick and Mellent, of Roger Bigod, Richard de Redvers, and Robert Fitz-Hamon, powerful barons, who still adhered to the present government, the army was retained in the king's interests, and marched, with seeming union and firmness, to oppose Robert, who had landed with his forces at Portsmouth.

The two armies lay in sight of each other for some days without coming to action; and both princes, being apprehensive of the event, which would probably be decisive, hearkened the more willingly to the counsels of Anselm and the other great men, who mediated an accommodation between them. After employing some negotiation, it was agreed that Robert should resign his pretensions to England, and receive in lieu of them an annual pension of three thousand marks; that if either of the princes died without issue, the other should succeed to his dominions; that the adherents of each should be pardoned, and restored to all their possessions either in Normandy or England; and that neither Robert nor Henry should thenceforth encourage, receive, or protect the enemies of the other.

This treaty, though calculated so much for Henry's advantage, he was the first to violate. He restored, indeed, the estates of all Robert's adherents; but was secretly determined that noblemen so powerful and so ill affected, who had both inclination and ability to disturb his government, should not long remain unmolested in their present opulence and grandeur. He began with the earl of Shrewsbury, who was watched for some time by spies, and then indicted on a charge, consisting of forty-five articles. This turbulent nobleman, knowing his own guilt, as well as the prejudices of his judges, and the power of his prosecutor, had recourse to arms for defence: but being soon suppressed by the activity and address of Henry, he was banished the kingdom, and his great estate confiscated. His ruin involved that of his two brothers, Arnulf de Montgomery, and Roger, earl of Lancaster. The account of Robert de Belesme, earl of Shrewsbury, as given by Lingard, deserves insertion as an instance of the evil of the feudal system, and as a proof of what opportunity it gave to a tyrannical monster to exercise his crimes. "He was the most powerful subject in England, haughty, rapacious, and deceitful. In these vices he might have many equals: in cruelty he rose pre-eminent among the savages of that age. He preferred the death to the ransom of his captives; it was his delight to feast his eyes with the contortions of the victims, men and women, whom he had ordered to be impaled: he is even said to have torn out the eyes of his godson with his own hands, because the father of the boy had committed some trivial offence, and had escaped from his vengeance." Soon after followed the prosecution and condemnation of Robert de Pontefract and Robert de Mallet, who had distinguished themselves among Robert's adherents. William de Warrenne was the next victim: even William, earl of Cornwall, son of the earl of Mortaigne, the king's uncle, having given matter of suspicion against himself lost all the vast acquisitions of his family in England. Though the usual violence and tyranny of the Norman barons afforded a plausible pretence for those prosecutions, and it is probable that none of the sentences pronounced against these noblemen was wholly iniquitous; men easily saw or conjectured that the chief part of their guilt was not the injustice or illegality of their conduct. Robert, enraged at the fate of his friends, imprudently ventured to come into England; and he remonstrated with his brother, in severe terms, against this breach of treaty: but met with so bad a reception, that he began to apprehend danger to his own liberty, and was glad to purchase an escape, by resigning his pension.

The indiscretion of Robert soon exposed him to more fatal injuries. This prince, whose bravery and candour procured him respect while at a distance, had no sooner attained the possession of power and enjoyment of peace, than all the vigour of his mind relaxed; and he fell into contempt among those who approached his person, or were subject to his authority. Alternately abandoned to dissolute pleasures and to womanish superstition, he was so remiss, both in the care of his treasure and the exercise of his government, that his servants pillaged his money with impunity, stole from him his very clothes, and proceeded thence to practise every species of extortion on his defenceless subjects. The barons, whom a severe administration alone could have restrained, gave reins to their unbounded rapine upon their vassals, and inveterate animosities against each other; and all Normandy, during the reign of this benign prince, was become a scene of violence and depredation. The Normans at last, observing the regular government which Henry, notwithstanding his usurped title, had been able to establish in England, applied to him, that he might use his authority for the suppression of these disorders; and they thereby afforded him a pretence for interposing in the affairs of Normandy. Instead of employing his mediation to render his brother's government respectable, or to redress the grievances of the Normans, he was only attentive to support his own partisans, and to increase their number by every art of bribery, intrigue, and insinuation. Having found, in a visit which he made to that duchy, that the nobility were more disposed to pay submission to him than to their legal sovereign, he collected, by arbitrary extortions on England, a great army and treasure, and returned next year to Normandy, in a situation to obtain, either by violence or corruption, the dominion of that province. He took Bayeux by storm after an obstinate siege: he made himself master of Caen by the voluntary submission of the inhabitants; but being repulsed at Falaise, and obliged by the winter season to raise the siege, he returned into England; after giving assurances to his adherents that he would persevere in supporting and protecting them.

Next year he opened the campaign with the siege of Tenchebray; and it became evident, from his preparations and progress, that he intended to usurp the entire possession of Normandy. Robert was at last roused from his lethargy; and being supported by the earl of Mortaigne and Robert de Belesme, the king's inveterate enemies, he raised a considerable army, and approached his brother's camp, with a view of finishing in one decisive battle, the quarrel between them. He was now entered on that scene of action in which alone he was qualified to excel; and he so animated his troops by his example, that they threw the English into disorder, and had nearly obtained the victory; when the flight of Belesme spread a panic among the Normans, and occasioned their total defeat. Henry, besides doing great execution on the enemy, made near ten thousand prisoners; among whom was Duke Robert himself, and all the most considerable barons who adhered to his interests. This victory was followed by the final reduction of Normandy: Rouen immediately submitted to the conqueror: Falaise, after some negotiation, opened its gates, and by this acquisition, besides rendering himself master of an important fortress, he got into his hands Prince William, the only son of Robert: he assembled the states of Normandy; and having received the homage of all the vassals of the duchy, having settled the government, revoked his brother's donations, and dismantled the castles lately built, he returned into England, and carried along with him the duke as prisoner. That unfortunate prince was detained in custody during the remainder of his life, which was no less than twenty-eight years, and he died in the castle of Cardiff in Glamorganshire; happy if, without losing his liberty, he could have relinquished that power which he was not qualified either to hold or exercise. Prince William was committed to the care of Helie de St. Saen, who had married Robert's natural daughter, and who being a man of probity and honour beyond what was usual in those ages, executed the trust with great affection and fidelity. Edgar Atheling, who had followed Robert in the expedition to Jerusalem, and who had lived with him ever since in Normandy, was another illustrious prisoner taken in the battle of Tenchebray. Henry gave him his liberty, and settled a small pension on him, with which he retired; and he lived to a good old age in England, totally neglected and forgotten. This prince was distinguished by personal bravery: but nothing can be a stronger proof of his mean talents in every other respect, than that, notwithstanding he possessed the affections of the English, and enjoyed the only legal title to the throne, he was allowed during the reigns of so many violent and jealous usurpers, to live unmolested, and go to his grave in peace.

A little after Henry had completed the conquest of Normandy, and settled the government of that province, he finished a controversy, which had been long depending between him and the pope, with regard to the investitures in ecclesiastical benefices; and though he was here obliged to relinquish some of the ancient rights of the crown, he extricated himself from the difficulty on easier terms than most princes, who in that age were so unhappy as to be engaged in disputes with the apostolic see. The king's situation, in the beginning of his reign, obliged him to pay great court to Anselm: the advantages which he had reaped from the zealous friendship of that prelate, had made him sensible how prone the minds of his people were to superstition, and what an ascendancy the ecclesiastics had been able to assume over them. He had seen, on the accession of his brother Rufus, that though the rights of primogeniture were then violated, and the inclinations of almost all the barons thwarted, yet the authority of Lanfranc, the primate, had prevailed over all other considerations: his own case, which was still more unfavourable, afforded an instance in which the clergy had more evidently shown their influence and authority. These recent examples, while they made him cautious not to offend that powerful body, convinced him at the same time, that it was extremely his interest to retain the former prerogative of the crown in filling offices of such vast importance, and to check the ecclesiastics in that independence to which they visibly aspired. The choice which his brother, in a fit of penitence had made of Anselm, was so far unfortunate to the king's pretensions, that this prelate was celebrated for his piety and zeal, and austerity of manners; and though his monkish devotion, and narrow principles, prognosticated no great knowledge of the world or depth of policy, he was, on that very account, a more dangerous instrument in the hands of politicians, and retained a greater ascendancy over the bigoted populace. The prudence and temper of the king appear in nothing more conspicuous than in the management of this delicate affair; where he was always sensible that it had become necessary for him to risk his whole crown, in order to preserve the most invaluable jewel of it.

Anselm had no sooner returned from banishment, than his refusal to do homage to the king raised a dispute, which Henry evaded at that critical juncture, by promising to send a messenger, in order to compound the matter with Pascal II., who then filled the papal throne. The messenger, as was probably foreseen, returned with an absolute refusal of the king's demands; and that fortified by many reasons, which were well qualified to operate on the understandings of men in those ages. Pascal quoted the Scriptures, to prove that Christ was the door; and he thence inferred, that all ecclesiastics must enter into the church through Christ alone, not through the civil magistrates, or any profane laymen. "It is monstrous," added the pontiff, "that a son should pretend to beget his father, or a man to create his God: priests are called gods in Scripture, as being the vicars of God: and will you, by your abominable pretensions to grant them their investiture, assume the right of creating them?"*

But how convincing soever these arguments, they could not persuade Henry to resign so important a prerogative; and, perhaps, as he was possessed of great reflection and learning, he thought that the absurdity of a man's creating his God, even allowing priests to be gods, was not urged with the best grace by the Roman pontiff. But as he desired still to avoid, at least to delay, the coming to any dangerous extremity with the church, he persuaded Anselm, that he should be able, by further negotiation, to attain some composition with Pascal; and for that purpose he despatched three bishops to Rome, while Anselm sent two messengers of his own, to be more fully assured of the pope's intentions. Pascal wrote back letters equally positive and arrogant, both to the king and primate; urging to the former, that by assuming the right of investitures, he committed a kind of spiritual adultery with the church, who was the spouse of Christ, and who must not admit of such a commerce with any other person; and insisting with the latter, that the pretension of kings to confer benefices was the source of all simony; a topic which had but too much foundation in those ages.

Henry had now no other expedient than to suppress the letter addressed to himself, and to persuade the three bishops to prevaricate, and assert upon their episcopal faith, that Pascal had assured them in private of his good intentions towards Henry, and of his resolution not to resent any future exertion of his prerogative in granting investitures; though he himself scrupled to give this assurance under his hand, lest other princes should copy the example, and assume a like privilege. Anselm's two messengers, who were monks, affirmed to him, that it was impossible this story could have any foundation: but their word was not deemed equal to that of three bishops; and the king, as if he had finally gained his cause, proceeded to fill the sees of Hereford and Salisbury, and to invest the new bishops in the usual manner. But Anselm, who, as he had good reason, gave no credit to the asseveration of the king's messengers, refused not only to consecrate them, but even to communicate with them; and the bishops themselves, finding how odious they were become, returned to Henry the ensigns of their dignity. The quarrel every day increased between the king and the primate: the former, notwithstanding the prudence and moderation of his temper, threw out menaces against such as should pretend to oppose him in exerting the ancient prerogatives of his crown; and Anselm, sensible of his own dangerous situation, desired leave to make a journey to Rome, in order to lay the case before the sovereign pontiff. Henry, well pleased to rid himself, without violence, of so inflexible an antagonist, readily granted him permission. The prelate was attended to the shore by infinite multitudes, not only monks and clergymen, but people of all ranks, who scrupled not in this manner to declare for their primate against their sovereign, and who regarded his departure as the final abolition of religion and true piety in the kingdom. The king, however, seized all the revenues of his see; and sent William de Warelwast to negotiate with Pascal, and to find some means of accommodation in this delicate affair.

The English minister told Pascal, that his master would rather lose his crown, than part with the right of granting investitures. "And I," replied Pascal, "would rather lose my head than allow him to retain it." Henry secretly prohibited Anselm from returning, unless he resolved to conform himself to the laws and usages of the kingdom; and the primate took up his residence at Lyons, in expectation that the king would at last be obliged to yield the point which was the present object of controversy between them. Soon after, he was permitted to return to his monastery at Bec in Normandy; and Henry, besides restoring to him the revenues of his see, treated him with the greatest respect, and held several conferences with him in order to soften his opposition, and bend him to submission. The people of England, who thought all differences now accommodated, were inclined to blame their primate for absenting himself so long from his charge; and he daily received letters from his partisans, representing the necessity of his speedy return. The total extinction, they told him, of religion and Christianity, was likely to ensue from the want of his fatherly care: the most shocking customs prevailed in England; and the dread of his severity being now removed, unnatural crimes, and the practice of wearing long hair, gain ground among all ranks of men, and these enormities openly appear every where, without sense of shame or fear of punishment.

The policy of the court of Rome has commonly been much admired; and men, judging by success, have bestowed the highest eulogies on that prudence by which a power, from such slender beginnings, could advance, without force of arms, to establish a universal and almost absolute monarchy in Europe. But the wisdom of so long a succession of men who filled the papal throne, and who were of such different ages, tempers, and interests, is not intelligible, and could never have place in nature. The instrument, indeed, with which they wrought, the ignorance and superstition of the people, is so gross an engine, of such universal prevalence, and so little liable to accident or disorder, that it may be successful, even in the most unskilful hands; and scarce any indiscretion can frustrate its operations. While the court of Rome was openly abandoned to the most flagrant disorders, even while it was torn with schisms and factions, the power of the church daily made a sensible progress in Europe; and the temerity of Gregory and caution of Pascal were equally fortunate in promoting it. The clergy, feeling the necessity which they lay under of being protected against the violence of princes, or rigour of the laws, were well pleased to adhere to a foreign head, who, being removed from the fear of the civil authority, could freely employ the power of the whole church, in defending her ancient or usurped properties and privileges, when invaded in any particular country: the monks, desirous of an independence on their diocesans, professed a still more devoted attachment to the triple crown; and the stupid people possessed no science or reason which they could oppose to the most exorbitant pretensions. Nonsense passed for demonstration: the most criminal means were sanctified by the piety of the end: treaties were not supposed to be binding, where the interests of God were concerned: the ancient laws and customs of states had no authority against a divine right: impudent forgeries were received as authentic monuments of antiquity; and the champions of the holy church, if successful, were celebrated as heroes; if unfortunate, were worshipped as martyrs; and all events turned thus out equally to the advantage of clerical usurpations. Pascal himself, the reigning pope, was, in the course of this very controversy concerning investitures, involved in circumstances, and necessitated to follow a conduct which would have drawn disgrace and ruin on any temporal prince that had been so unfortunate as to fall into a like situation. His person was seized by the Emperor Henry V., and he was obliged, by a formal treaty, to resign to that monarch the right of granting investitures, for which they had so long contended. In order to add greater solemnity to this agreement, the emperor and pope communicated together on the same host; one half of which was given to the prince, the other taken by the pontiff: the most tremendous imprecations were publicly denounced on either of them who should violate the treaty: yet no sooner did Pascal recover his liberty, than he revoked all his concessions, and pronounced the sentence of excommunication against the emperor, who, in the end, was obliged to submit to the terms required of him, and to yield up all his pretensions, which he never could resume.

The king of England had very near fallen into the same dangerous situation: Pascal had already excommunicated the earl of Mellent, and the other ministers of Henry, who were instrumental in supporting his pretensions: he daily menaced the king himself with a like sentence; and he suspended the blow only to give him leisure to prevent it by a timely submission. The malcontents waited impatiently for the opportunity of disturbing his government by conspiracies and insurrections: the king's best friends were anxious at the prospect of an incident which would set their religious and civil duties at variance: and the countess of Blois, his sister, a princess of piety, who had great influence over him, was affrightened with the danger of her brother's eternal damnation. Henry, on the other hand, seemed determined to run all hazards, rather than resign a prerogative of such importance, which had been enjoyed by all his predecessors; and it seemed probable, from his great prudence and abilities, that he might be able to sustain his rights, and finally prevail in the contest. While Pascal and Henry thus stood mutually in awe of each other, it was the more easy to bring about an accommodation between them, and to find a medium in which they might agree.

Before bishops took possession of their dignities, they had formerly been accustomed to pass through two ceremonies: they received from the hands of the sovereign a ring and crozier, as symbols of their office: and this was called their investiture: they also made those submissions to the prince which were required of vassals by the rights of the feudal law, and which received the name of homage. And as the king might refuse both to grant the investiture and to receive the homage, though the chapter had, by some canons of the middle age been endowed with the right of election, the sovereign had in reality the sole power of appointing prelates. Urban II. had equally deprived laymen of the rights of granting investiture and of receiving homage: the emperors never were able, by all their wars and negotiations, to make any distinction be admitted between them: the interposition of profane laymen, in any particular, was still represented as impious and abominable: and the church openly aspired to a total independence on the state. But Henry had put England as well as Normandy in such a situation, as gave greater weight to his negotiations; and Pascal was for the present satisfied with his resigning the right of granting investitures, by which the spiritual dignity was supposed to be conferred; and he allowed the bishops to do homage for their temporal properties and privileges. The pontiff was well pleased to have made this acquisition, which, he hoped, would in time involve the whole: and the king, anxious to procure an escape from a very dangerous situation, was content to retain some, though a more precarious authority, in the election of prelates.

After the principal controversy was accommodated, it was not difficult to adjust the other differences. The pope allowed Anselm to communicate with the prelates who had already received investitures from the crown; and he only required of them some submissions for their past misconduct. He also granted Anselm a plenary power of remedying every other disorder, which, he arise from the barbarousness of the country. Such was the idea which the popes then entertained of the English; and nothing can be a stronger proof of the miserable ignorance in which that people were then plunged, than that a man who sat on the papal throne, and who subsisted by absurdities and nonsense, should think himself entitled to treat them as barbarians.

During the course of these controversies, a synod was held at Westminster, where the king, intent only on the main dispute, allowed some canons of less importance to be enacted, which tended to promote the usurpations of the clergy. The celibacy of priests was enjoined, a point which it was still found very difficult to carry into execution; and even laymen were not allowed to marry within the seventh degree of affinity. By this contrivance the pope augmented the profits which he reaped from granting dispensations; and likewise those from divorces, for as the art of writing was then rare, and parish registers were not regularly kept, it was not easy to ascertain the degrees of affinity even among people of rank; and any man who had money sufficient to pay for it, might obtain a divorce, on pretence that his wife was more nearly related to him than was permitted by the canons. The synod also passed a vote, prohibiting the laity from wearing long hair. The aversion of the clergy to this mode was not confined to England. When the king went to Normandy, before he had conquered that province, the bishop of Seez, in a formal harangue, earnestly exhorted him to redress the manifold disorders under which the government laboured, and to oblige the people to poll their hair in a decent form. Henry, though he would not resign his prerogatives to the church, willingly parted with his hair: he cut it in the form which they required of him, and obliged all the courtiers to imitate his example.

The acquisition of Normandy was a great point of Henry's ambition, being the ancient patrimony of his family, and the only territory, which, while in his possession, gave him any weight or consideration on the continent; but the injustice of his usurpation was the source of great inquietude, involved him in frequent wars, and obliged him to impose on his English subjects those many heavy and arbitrary taxes, of which all the historians of that age unanimously complain. His nephew William was but six years of age when he committed him to the care of Helie de St. Saen; and it is probable, that his reason for intrusting that important charge to a man of so unblemished a character, was to prevent all malignant suspicions, in case any accident should befall the life of the young prince. He soon repented of his choice; but when he desired to recover possession of William's person, Helie withdrew his pupil, and carried him to the court of Fulk, count of Anjou, who gave him protection. In proportion as the prince grew up to man's estate, he discovered virtues becoming his birth; and, wandering through different courts of Europe, he excited the friendly compassion of many princes, and raised a general indignation against his uncle, who had so unjustly bereaved him of his inheritance. Lewis the Gross, son of Philip, was at this time king of France, a brave and generous prince, who having been obliged during the lifetime of his father to fly into England, in order to escape the persecutions of his treacherous step-mother, had been protected by Henry, and had thence conceived a personal friendship for him. But these ties were soon dissolved after the accession of Lewis, who found his interests to be in so many particulars opposite to those of the English monarch, and who became sensible of the danger attending the annexation of Normandy to England. He joined, therefore, the counts of Anjou and Flanders in giving disquiet to Henry's government; and this monarch, in order to defend his foreign dominions, found himself obliged to go over to Normandy, where he resided two years. The war which ensued among those princes was attended with no memorable event, and produced only slight skirmishes on the frontiers, agreeably to the weak condition of the sovereigns in that age, whenever their subjects were not roused by some great and urgent occasion. Henry, by contracting his eldest son, William, to the daughter of Fulk, detached that prince from the alliance, and obliged the others to come to an accommodation with him. This peace was not of long duration. His nephew, William, retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, who espoused his cause; and the king of France having soon after, for other reasons, joined the party, a new war was kindled in Normandy, which produced no event more memorable than had attended the former. At last the death of Baldwin, who was slain in an action near Eu, gave some respite to Henry, and enabled him to carry on war with more advantage against his enemies.

Lewis finding himself unable to wrest Normandy from the king by force of arms, had recourse to the dangerous expedient of applying to the spiritual power, and of affording the ecclesiastics a pretence to interpose in the temporal concerns of princes. He carried young William to a general council, which was assembled at Rheims by Pope Calixtus II., presented the Norman prince to them, complained of the manifest usurpation and injustice of Henry, craved the assistance of the church for reinstating the true heir in his dominions, and represented the enormity of detaining in captivity so brave a prince as Robert, one of the most eminent champions of the cross, and who, by that very quality, was placed under the immediate protection of the holy see. Henry knew how to defend the rights of his crown with vigour, and yet with dexterity. He had sent over the English bishops to this synod; but at the same time had warned them that if any further claims were started by the pope or the ecclesiastics, he was determined to adhere to the laws and customs of England, and maintain the prerogatives transmitted to him by his predecessors. "Go," said he to them, "salute the pope in my name; hear his apostolical precepts; but take care to bring none of his new inventions into my kingdom." Finding, however, that it would be easier for him to elude than oppose the efforts of Calixtus, he gave his ambassadors orders to gain the pope and his favourites by liberal presents and promises. The complaints of the Norman prince were thenceforth heard with great coldness by the council; and Calixtus confessed, after a conference which he had the same summer with Henry, and when that prince probably renewed his presents, that, of all men whom he had ever yet been acquainted with, he was beyond comparison the most eloquent and persuasive.

The warlike measures of Lewis proved as ineffectual as his intrigues. He had laid a scheme for surprising Noyon; but Henry having received intelligence of the design, marched to the relief of the place, and suddenly attacked the French at Brenville, as they were advancing towards it. A sharp conflict ensued; where prince William behaved with great bravery, and the king himself was in the most imminent danger. He was wounded in the head by Crispin, a gallant Norman officer, who had followed the fortunes of William; but being rather animated than terrified by the blow, he immediately beat his antagonist to the ground, and so encouraged his troops by the example, that they put the French to total rout, and had very nearly taken their king prisoner. The dignity of the persons engaged in this skirmish rendered it the most memorable action of the war: for, in other respects, it was not of great importance. There were nine hundred horsemen, who fought on both sides; yet were there only three persons slain. The rest were defended by that heavy armour worn by the cavalry in those times. An accommodation soon after ensued between the kings of France and England; and the interests of young William were entirely neglected in it.

Lingard illustrates the manners of the time with the following remarks:—

“In perusing the history of this war, written by the pen of Orderic, the mind is surprised at the opposite instances of barbarism and refinement, of cruelty and humanity, with which it abounds. 1. The number of slain in the celebrated battle of Brenville amounted to no more than three; for, says the historian, Christian knights contend not for revenge but for glory; they seek not to shed the blood but to secure the person of their enemy. Their great object was to throw him on the ground; and when this was effected, whether by a blow or the death of his horse, the knight encased in ponderous armour was unable to help himself, and lay the unresisting prize of his adversary. 2. Offices of civility were exchanged in the midst of hostilities; and the captive who had signalized his courage was often released without ransom by a generous conqueror. The king, after his victory, restored to Lewis his charger, with the trappings of gold and silver; and his son at the same time sent to the son of Robert valuable presents, that the young exile might appear among foreigners with the splendour due to his birth. 3. But their passions were violent and implacable; and in the pursuit of revenge their breasts seemed to be steeled against every sentiment of humanity. Eustace lord of Breteuil, who had married Juliana, one of the king's illegitimate daughters, had solicited the grant of a strong fortress, which was part of the ducal demesne. Henry entertained suspicions of his fidelity, but was unwilling to irritate him by an absolute refusal. It was agreed that two children, the daughters of Eustace and Juliana, should be given to Henry as hostages for the allegiance of their father; and that the son of Harenc, the governor of the castle, should be intrusted to that nobleman as a pledge for the cession of the place at the close of the war. Eustace was, however, dissatisfied: he tore out the eyes of the boy, and sent him back to his father. Harenc, frantic with rage, and impatient of revenge, demanded justice of Henry, who, unable to reach the person, bade him retaliate on the daughters of Eustace. Their innocence, their youth, were of no avail; the barbarian deprived them of their eyes, and amputated their noses; and Henry, with an affectation of stoic indifference, loaded him with presents, and sent him back to resume the command. The task of revenge now devolved on Juliana, who deemed her father the author of the sufferings of her daughters. Unable to keep Breteuil against the royal forces, she retired into the citadel: abandoned by the garrison, she requested a parley with the king; and as he approached the wall, pointed an arrow, and discharged it at his breast. Her want of skill saved her from the guilt of actual parricide; and necessity compelled her to surrender at discretion. Henry punished by insulting her. He closed the gate, removed the draw-bridge, and sent her a peremptory order to quit the castle immediately. Juliana was compelled to let herself down without assistance from the rampart into the broad moat which surrounded the fortress, and to wade through the water which rose to her waist; at each step she had to break the ice around her, and to suffer the taunts and ridicule of the soldiers, who were drawn out to witness this singular spectacle.”

But the public prosperity of Henry was much overbalanced by a domestic calamity which befel him. His only son William had now reached his eighteenth year; and the king, from the facility with which he himself had usurped the crown, dreading that a like revolution might subvert his family, had taken care to have him recognised successor by the states of the kingdom, and had carried him over to Normandy, that he might receive the homage of the barons of that duchy. The king, on his return, set sail from Barfleur, and was soon carried by a fair wind out of sight of land. The prince was detained by some accident; and his sailors, as well as their captain, Thomas Fitz-Stephens, having spent the interval in drinking, were so flustered, that, being in a hurry to follow the king, they heedlessly carried the ship on a rock, where she immediately foundered. William was put into the long-boat, and had got clear of the ship; when hearing the cries of his natural sister, the countess of Perche, he ordered the seamen to row back in hopes of saving her; but the numbers who then crowded in, soon sunk the boat; and the prince with all his retinue perished. Above a hundred and forty young noblemen of the principal families of England and Normandy, were lost on this occasion. A butcher of Rouen was the only person on board who escaped: he clung to the mast, and was taken up next morning by fishermen. Fitz-Stephens also took hold of the mast; but being informed by the butcher that Prince William had perished, he said that he would not survive the disaster; and he plunged himself headlong into the sea. Henry entertained hopes for three days, that his son had put into some distant port of England; but when certain intelligence of the calamity was brought to him, he fainted away; and it was remarked that he never after was seen to smile, nor ever recovered his wonted cheerfulness.

The death of William may be regarded in one respect as a misfortune to the English; because it was the immediate source of those civil wars, which, after the demise of the king, caused such confusion in the kingdom; but it is remarkable, that the young prince had entertained a violent aversion to the natives; and had been heard to threaten, that when he should be king he would make them draw the plough, and would turn them into beasts of burden. To which may be added, he was arrogant and violent, and addicted to the most licentious pursuits. Some chroniclers have not scrupled to charge him with the most infamous dissipation, and represent him as a heartless profligate. Henry's grief may therefore perhaps have arisen more from political than natural feeling. His prepossessions against the English he inherited from his father, who, though he was wont, when it might serve his purpose, to value himself on his birth, as a native of England, showed, in the course of his government, an extreme prejudice against that people. All hopes of preferment, to ecclesiastical as well as civil dignities, were denied them during this whole reign; and any foreigner, however worthless, was sure to have the preference in every competition.

Prince William left no children; and the king had not now any legitimate issue; except one daughter, Matilda, whom in 1110 he had betrothed, though only eight years of age, to the Emperor Henry V., and whom he had then sent over to be educated in Germany.* But as her absence from the kingdom, and her marriage into a foreign family, might endanger the succession, Henry, who was now a widower, was induced to marry in hopes of having male heirs; and he made his addresses to Adelais, daughter of Godfrey duke of Lovaine, and niece of Pope Calixtus, a young princess of an amiable person. But Adelais brought him no children; and the prince, who was most likely to dispute the succession, and even the immediate possession of the crown, recovered hopes of subverting his rival, who had successively seized all his patrimonial dominions. William, the son of Duke Robert, was still protected in the French court; and as Henry's connexions with the count of Anjou were broken off by the death of his son, Fulk joined the party of the unfortunate prince, gave him his daughter in marriage, and aided him in raising disturbances in Normandy. But Henry found the means of drawing off the count of Anjou, by forming anew with him a nearer connexion than the former, and one more material to the interests of that count's family. The emperor, his son-in-law, dying without issue, he bestowed his daughter on Geoffrey, the eldest son of Fulk, and endeavoured to insure her succession by having her recognised heir of all his dominions, and obliging the barons both of Normandy and England to swear fealty to her. He hoped that the choice of this husband would be more agreeable to all his subjects than that of the emperor; as securing them from the danger of falling under the dominion of a great and distant potentate who might bring them into subjection, and reduce their country to the rank of a province; but the barons were displeased, that a step so material to national interests had been taken without consulting them; and Henry had too sensibly experienced the turbulence of their disposition, not to dread the effects of their resentment. It seemed probable that his nephew's party might gain force from the increase of the malecontents: an accession of power which that prince had acquired a little after, tended to render his pretensions still more dangerous. Charles earl of Flanders being assassinated during the celebration of divine service, King Lewis immediately put the young prince in possession of that country, to which he had pretensions in the right of his grandmother Matilda, wife to the Conqueror. But William survived a very little time this piece of good fortune, which seemed to open the way to still further prosperity. He was killed in a skirmish with the landgrave of Alsace, his competitor for Flanders; and his death put an end, for the present, to the jealousy and inquietude of Henry.

The chief merit of this monarch's government consists in the profound tranquillity which he established and maintained throughout all his dominions during the greater part of his reign. The mutinous barons were retained in subjection; and his neighbours, in every attempt which they made upon him, found him so well prepared, that they were discouraged from continuing or renewing their enterprises. In order to repress the incursions of the Welsh, he brought over some Flemings in the year 1111, and settled them in Pembrokeshire, where they long maintained a different language, and customs, and manners from their neighbours. Though his government seems to have been arbitrary in England, it was judicious and prudent; and was as little oppressive as the necessity of his affairs would permit. He wanted not attention to the redress of grievances; and historians mention in particular the levying of purveyance, which he endeavoured to moderate and restrain. The tenants in the king's demesne lands were at that time obliged to supply gratis the court with provisions, and to furnish carriages on the same hard terms, when the king made a progress, as he did frequently, into any of the counties. These exactions were so grievous, and levied in so licentious a manner, that the farmers when they heard of the approach of the court, often deserted their houses, as if an enemy had invaded the country; and sheltered their persons and families in the woods from the insults of the king's retinue. Henry prohibited those enormities, and punished the persons guilty of them by cutting off their hands, legs, and other members. But the prerogative was perpetual: the remedy applied by Henry was temporary; and the violence itself of this remedy, so far from giving security to the people, was only a proof of the ferocity of the government, and threatened a quick return of like abuses.

One great and difficult object of the king's prudence was, the guarding against the encroachments of the court of Rome, and protecting the liberties of the church of England. The pope, in the year 1101, had sent Guy, archbishop of Vienne, as legate into Britain; and though he was the first that for many years had appeared there in that character, and his commission gave general surprise, the king, who was then in the commencement of his reign, and was involved in many difficulties, was obliged to submit to this encroachment on his authority. But in the year 1116, Anselm abbot of St. Sabas, who was coming over with a like legantine commission, was prohibited from entering the kingdom; and Pope Calixtus, who in his turn was then labouring under many difficulties, by reason of the pretensions of Gregory, an antipope, was obliged to promise, that he never would for the future, except when solicited by the king himself, send any legate into England. Notwithstanding this engagement, the pope, as soon as he had suppressed his antagonist, granted the cardinal de Crema a legantine commission over that kingdom; and the king, who, by reason of his nephew's intrigues and invasions, found himself at that time in a dangerous situation, was obliged to submit to the exercise of this commission. A synod was called by the legate at London; where, among other canons, a vote passed, enacting severe penalties on the marriages of the clergy.* The cardinal, in a public harangue, declared it to be an unpardonable enormity, that a priest should dare to consecrate and touch the body of Christ immediately after he had risen from the side of a strumpet; for that was the decent appellation which he gave to the wives of the clergy. But it happened, that the very next night, the officers of justice, breaking into a disorderly house, found the cardinal in bed with a courtesan; an incident which threw such ridicule upon him, that he immediately stole out of the kingdom: the synod broke up; and the canons against the marriage of clergymen were worse executed than ever.

* Henry, by the feudal customs, was entitled to levy a tax for the marrying of his eldest daughter, and he exacted three shillings a hide on all England. Some historians heedlessly make this sum amount to above 800,000 pounds of our present money: but it could not exceed 135,000. Five hides, sometimes less, made a knight's fee, of which there were about 60,000 in England, consequently near 300,000 hides; and at the rate of three shillings a hide, the sum would amount to 45,000 pounds, or 135,000*l.* of our present money. In the Saxon times, there were only computed 243,600 hides in England.

Henry, in order to prevent this alternate revolution of concessions and encroachments, sent William, then archbishop of Canterbury, to remonstrate with the court of Rome against those abuses, and to assert the liberties of the English church. It was a usual maxim with every pope, when he found that he could not prevail in any pretension, to grant to princes or states a power which they had always exercised, to resume at a proper juncture the claim which seemed to be resigned, and to pretend that the civil magistrate had possessed the authority only from a special indulgence of the Roman pontiff. After this manner, the pope, finding that the French nation would not admit his claim of granting investitures, had passed a bull, giving the king that authority; and he now practised a like invention to elude the complaints of the king of England. He made the archbishop of Canterbury his legate, renewed his commission from time to time, and still pretended that the rights which that prelate had ever exercised as metropolitan, were entirely derived from the indulgence of the apostolic see. The English princes, and Henry in particular, who were glad to avoid any immediate contest of so dangerous a nature, commonly acquiesced by their silence in these pretensions of the court of Rome.†

* It is remarkable that Huntingdon, who was a clergyman, as well as others, makes no apology for using such freedom with the fathers of the church; but says that the fact was notorious, and ought not to be concealed.

† The legates a latere, as they were called, were a kind of delegates, who possessed the full power of the pope in all the provinces committed to their charge, and were very busy in extending as well as exercising it. They nominated to all vacant benefices, assembled synods, and were anxious to maintain ecclesiastical privileges, which never could be fully protected without encroachments on the civil power. If there were the least concurrence or opposition, it was always supposed that the civil power was to give way: every deed which had the least pretence of holding any thing spiritual, as marriages, testaments, promissory oaths, were brought into the spiritual court, and could not be canvassed before a civil magistrate. These were the established laws of the church; and where a legate was sent immediately from Rome, he was sure to maintain the papal claims with the utmost rigour. But it was an advantage to the king to have the archbishop of Canterbury appointed legate, because the connexions of that prelate with the kingdom tended to moderate his measures.

As every thing in England remained in tranquillity, Henry took the opportunity of paying a visit to Normandy, to which he was invited, as well by his affection for that country, as by his tenderness for his daughter, the Empress Matilda, who was always his favourite. Some time after, that princess was delivered of a son, who received the name of Henry; and the king, further to ensure her succession, made all the nobility of England and Normandy renew the oath of fealty which they had already sworn to her. The joy of this event, and the satisfaction which he reaped from his daughter's company, who bore successively two other sons, made his residence in Normandy very agreeable to him; and he seemed determined to pass the remainder of his days in that country, when an incursion of the Welsh obliged him to think of returning into England. He was preparing for the journey, but was seized with a sudden illness at St. Dennis le Forment, from eating too plentifully of lampreys, a food which always agreed better with his palate than his constitution. He died in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign, leaving by will his daughter Matilda heir of all his dominions, without making any mention of her husband, Geoffrey, who had given him several causes of displeasure.

This prince was one of the most accomplished that has filled the English throne, and possessed all the great qualities both of body and mind, natural and acquired, which could fit him for the high station to which he attained. His person was manly, his countenance engaging, his eyes clear, serene, and penetrating. The affability of his address encouraged those who might be overawed by the sense of his dignity or of his wisdom; and though he often indulged his facetious humour, he knew how to temper it with discretion, and ever kept at a distance from all indecent familiarities with his courtiers. His superior eloquence and judgment would have given him an ascendancy even had he been born in a private station; and his personal bravery would have procured him respect, though it had been less supported by art and policy. By his great progress in literature, he acquired the name of Beau clerc, or the scholar; but his application to those sedentary pursuits abated nothing of the activity and vigilance of his government: and though the learning of that age was better fitted to corrupt than improve the understanding, his natural good sense preserved itself untainted, both from the pedantry and superstition which were then so prevalent among men of letters. His temper was susceptible of the sentiments as well of friendship as of resentment; and his ambition, though high, might be deemed moderate and reasonable, had not his conduct towards his brother and nephew showed that he was too much disposed to sacrifice to it all the maxims of justice and equity. But the total incapacity of Robert for government afforded his younger brother a reason or pretence for seizing the sceptre both of England and Normandy; and when violence and usurpation are once begun, necessity obliges a prince to continue in the same criminal course, and engages him in measures which his better judgment and sounder principles would otherwise have induced him to reject with warmth and indignation.

King Henry was much addicted to women; and historians mention no less than seven illegitimate sons and six daughters born to him. Hunting was also one of his favourite amusements; and he exercised great rigour against those who encroached on the royal forests, which were augmented during his reign, though their number and extent were already too great. To kill a stag was as criminal as to murder a man: he made all the dogs be mutilated which were kept on the borders of his forests: and he sometimes deprived his subjects of the liberty of hunting on their own lands, or even cutting their own woods. In other respects he executed justice, and that with rigour; the best maxim which a prince in that age could follow.

According to Lingard, "Henry was naturally suspicious; and this disposition had been greatly encouraged by a knowledge of the clandestine attempts of his enemies. On one occasion the keeper of the treasures was convicted of a design on his life; on another, while he was marching through Wales, an arrow from an unknown hand struck him on the breast, but was repelled by the temper of his cuirass. Alarmed by these instances, he always kept on his guard, frequently changed his apartments, and when he retired to rest, ordered sentinels to be stationed at the door, and his sword and shield to be placed near his pillow.

"Henry seldom forgot an injury, though he would disguise his resentment under the mask of friendship. Fraud, and treachery, and violence, were used to ensnare those who had greatly offended him; and their portion was death or blindness, or perpetual imprisonment. A French poet who had satirized him, when captured, had his eyes put out by the king's order. His dissimulation equalled his other faults: Bloet, bishop of Lincoln, who had given unintentional offence by boasting his ability to rival the king in the magnificence of a monastery he was forming, just previous to his disgrace and ruin, being informed that he had been highly commended by the king, replied, 'Then I am undone, for I never knew him praise a man whom he did not intend to ruin.'"

Henry accumulated large treasures, and affected great pomp and magnificence on occasions of ceremony. He provided also for the continued splendour of the monarch by building or repairing the royal palaces. At Woodstock he enclosed a spacious park for deer, and added a menagerie of wild beasts. He also founded three monasteries, and endowed them liberally.

Stealing was first made capital in this reign: false coining, which was then a very common crime, and by which the money had been extremely debased, was severely punished by Henry. Near fifty criminals of this kind were at one time hanged or mutilated; and though these punishments seem to have been exercised in a manner somewhat arbitrary, they were grateful to the people, more attentive to present advantages than jealous of general laws. There is a code which passes under the name of Henry I., but the best antiquaries have agreed to think it spurious. It is, however, a very ancient compilation, and may be useful to instruct us in the manners and customs of the times. We learn from it, that a great distinction was then made between the English and Normans, much to the advantage of the latter. The deadly feuds, and the liberty of private revenge, which had been avowed by the Saxon laws, were still continued, and were not yet wholly illegal.

Among the laws granted on the king's accession, it is remarkable that the re-union of the civil and ecclesiastical courts, as in the Saxon times, was enacted. But this law, like the articles of his charter, remained without effect, probably from the opposition of Archbishop Anselm.

Henry, on his accession, granted a charter to London, which seems to have been the first step towards rendering that city a corporation. By this charter, the city was empowered to keep the farm of Middlesex at three hundred pounds a year, to elect its own sheriff and justiciary, and to hold pleas of the crown, and it was exempted from scot, Dane-gelt, trials by combat, and lodging the king's retinue. These, with a confirmation of the privileges of their court of hustings, wardmotes, and common halls, and their liberty of hunting in Middlesex and Surrey, are the chief articles of this charter.

It is said that this prince, from indulgence to his tenants, changed the rents of his demesnes, which were formerly paid in kind, into money, which was more easily remitted to the exchequer. But the great scarcity of coin would render that commutation difficult to be executed, while at the same time provisions could not be sent to a distant quarter of the kingdom. This affords a probable reason why the ancient kings of England so frequently changed their place of abode: they carried their court from one place to another, that they might consume upon the spot the revenue of their several demesnes.

Dr. Lingard gives the following interesting notice of the rapid improvement of the nation in literary pursuits under the Conqueror and his sons. Lanfranc and Anselm, the archbishop of Canterbury, had proved themselves worthy of their exalted station:—

"Their precepts and examples had awakened the curiosity of the clergy, and kindled an ardour for learning which can hardly be paralleled in the present age. Nor did this enthusiasm perish with its authors; it was kept alive by the honours which were so prodigally lavished on all who could boast of literary acquirements. The sciences which formed the usual course of education were divided into two classes, which still retain the appellations of a more barbarous age, the trivium, comprising grammar, logic, and rhetoric, and the quadrivium, or music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. It was from the works of the Latin writers, which had survived the wreck of the empire, that students sought to acquire the principal portion of their knowledge; but in the science of medicine, and the more abstruse investigations of the mathematics, the ancients were believed to be inferior to the Mahometan teachers; and many an Englishman, during the reign of Henry I., wandered as far as the banks of Ebro, in Spain, that he might listen to the instructions, or translate the works, of the Arabian philosophers.

"The first schools had been established in monasteries and cathedrals, by the zeal of their respective prelates. But now the ancient seminaries began to be neglected for others opened by men who sought for wealth and distinction by the public display of their abilities; and who established their schools wherever there was a prospect of attracting disciples. The new professors were soon animated with a spirit of competition, which, while it sharpened their faculties, perverted the usefulness of their labours. There was no subject on which they would condescend to acknowledge their ignorance. Like their Arabian masters,* discussed with equal warmth matters above their comprehension or beneath their notice. As their schools were open to every hearer, they had to support their peculiar opinions against all the subtlety and eloquence of their rivals; and on many occasions were compelled to argue in despite of common sense, rather than allow themselves to be vanquished. Hence the art of reasoning came to be valued as the first of intellectual acquirements. The student applied assiduously to the logic of Aristotle, and the subtlety of his Arabian commentators: words were substituted in the place of ideas: multiplied and unmeaning distinctions bewildered the understanding; and a system of scholastic disputation was introduced which the celebrated abbot of Clairvaux sarcastically defined to be 'the art of always seeking without ever finding the truth.'

"As the principal ecclesiastics in England were foreigners, they imported the foreign course of studies. Thus Joffrid, abbot of Croyland, procured teachers from Orleans, where he had been educated, and established them at Cotenham, a manor belonging to his convent. His object was to open, with their assistance, a school in the neighbouring town of Cambridge. At first a large barn sufficed for their accommodation: in the second year their disciples were so numerous that separate apartments were allotted to each master. Early in the morning the labours of the day were opened by brother Odo, who taught the children the rules of grammar according to Priscian; at six, Terric read lectures on the logic of Aristotle; nine was the hour allotted to brother William, the expounder of the rhetorical works of Cicero and Quintilian; and before twelve master Gilbert explained to the theological students the difficult passages of the Holy Scriptures." This account, if it be genuine (which Dr. Lingard seems to believe it to be), discloses the real origin of the university of Cambridge. The date given to this institution is 1110.

"There were few among the scholars of Henry's reign who did not occasionally practise the art of composing in Latin verse. A few of them may certainly claim the praise of taste and elegance; but the majority seem to have aspired to no other excellence than that of adulterating the legitimate metre by the admixture of middle and final rhymes. Latin productions were however confined to the perusal and admiration of Latin scholars. The rich and the powerful, those who alone were able to reward the labours of the poet, were acquainted with no other language than their own, the Gallo-Norman, which since the conquest had been introduced into the court of the prince, and the hall of the baron, and was learned and spoken by every candidate for office and power. To amuse and delight these men arose a new race of versifiers, who neglected Latin composition for vernacular poetry. In their origin they were fostered by the patronage of the two queens of Henry, Matilda and Alice. Malmesbury assures us, that every poet hastened to the court of Matilda, at Westminster, to read his verses to that princess, and to partake of her bounty: and the name of Alice is frequently mentioned with honour by contemporary versifiers, Gaimar, Benevit, and Philippe de Thaun. The works of these writers are still extant in manuscript, and show that their authors knew little of the inspiration of poetry. The turgid metaphors, the abrupt transitions, and the rapid movements, so characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon muse, though conceived in bad taste, showed at least indications of native genius; but the narratives of the Gallo-Norman poets are tame, prosaic, and interminable; and their authors seem to have known no beauty but the jingle of rhyme, and to have aimed at no excellence but that of spinning out their story to the greatest possible length. These poems, however, such as they were, delighted those for whom they were written, and, what was still better, brought wealth and popularity to their authors.

"During the reign of Henry, Geoffrey of Monmouth published his history of Britain, which he embellished with numerous tales respecting Arthur and his knights, Merlin and his prophecies, borrowed from the songs and traditions of the ancient Britons. This extraordinary work was accompanied by another of a similar description, the history of Charlemagne and his twelve peers, supposed to be compiled by Archbishop Turpin from the songs of the French trouvères; and about the same time the adventures of Alexander the Great, by the pretended Dares Phrygius, and Dictys Cretensis, were brought by some of the crusaders into Europe. These three works supplied an inexhaustible store of matter for writers in prose and verse; the gests (i. e. the deeds) of Alexander, and Arthur, and Charlemagne, were repeated and embellished in a thousand forms; spells and enchantments, giants, hypogriphs, and dragons, ladies confined in durance by the power of necromancy, and delivered from confinement by the courage of their knights, captivated the imagination; and a new species of writing was introduced which retained its sway for centuries, and was known by the appellation of romance, because it was originally written in the Gallic idiom, an idiom corrupted from the ancient language of Rome."

CHAPTER X.

STEPHEN.

Accession of Stephen—War with Scotland—Insurrection in favour of Matilda—Stephen taken prisoner—Matilda crowned—Stephen released—Restored to the Crown—Continuation of the Civil Wars—Compromise between the King and Prince Henry—Death of the King.

IN the progress and settlement of the feudal law, the male succession to fiefs had taken place some time before the female was admitted; and estates being considered as military benefices, not as property, were transmitted to such only as could serve in the armies, and perform in person the conditions upon which they were originally granted. But when the continuance of rights, during some generations, in the same family, had, in a great measure, obliterated the primitive idea

* Thus we learn from Athelheard, "that if he had studied among the Moors, the causes of earthquakes, eclipses, and tides, he had also been employed in investigating the reasons why plants cannot be produced in fire, why the nose is made to hang over the mouth, why horns are not generated on the human forehead, whether the stars are animals, whether in that hypothesis they have any appetite, with many other questions equally singular and important."

the females were gradually admitted to the possession of feudal property; and the same revolution of principles which procured them the inheritance of private estates, naturally introduced their succession to government and authority. The failure, therefore, of male heirs to the kingdom of England and duchy of Normandy, seemed to leave the succession open, without a rival, to the empress Matilda; and as Henry had made all his vassals in both states swear fealty to her, he presumed that they would not easily be induced to depart at once from her hereditary right, and from their own reiterated oaths and engagements. But the irregular manner in which he himself had acquired the crown might have instructed him, that neither his Norman nor English subjects were as yet capable of adhering to a strict rule of government; and as every precedent of this kind seems to give authority to new usurpations, he had reason to dread, even from his own family, some invasion of his daughter's title, which he had taken such pains to establish.

Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, had been married to Stephen, count of Blois, and had brought him several sons, among whom Stephen and Henry, the two youngest, had been invited over to England by the late king, and had received great honours, riches, and preferment, from the zealous friendship which that prince bore to every one that had been so fortunate as to acquire his favour and good opinion. Henry, who had betaken himself to the ecclesiastical profession, was created abbot of Glastonbury and bishop of Winchester; and though these dignities were considerable, Stephen had, from his uncle's liberality, attained establishments still more solid and durable. The king had married him to Matilda, who was daughter and heir of Eustace, count of Boulogne, and who brought him, besides that feudal sovereignty in France, an immense property in England, which in the distribution of lands had been conferred by the Conqueror on the family of Boulogne. Stephen also by this marriage acquired a new connexion with the royal family of England, as Mary, his wife's mother, was sister to David, the reigning king of Scotland, and to Matilda, the first wife of Henry, and mother of the empress. The king, still imagining that he strengthened the interests of his family by the aggrandisement of Stephen, took pleasure in enriching him by the grant of new possessions; and he conferred on him the great estate forfeited by Robert Mallet in England, and that forfeited by the earl of Mortaigne in Normandy. Stephen, in return, professed great attachment to his uncle, and appeared so zealous for the succession of Matilda, that, when the barons swore fealty to that princess, he contended with Robert, earl of Gloucester, the king's natural son, who should first be admitted to give her this testimony of devoted zeal and fidelity. Meanwhile he continued to cultivate, by every art of popularity, the friendship of the English nation; and the many virtues with which he seemed to be endowed, favoured the success of his intentions. By his bravery, activity, and vigour, he acquired the esteem of the barons; by his generosity, and by an affable and familiar address, unusual in that age among men of his high quality, he obtained the affections of the people, particularly of the Londoners. And though he dared not to take any steps towards his further grandeur, lest he should expose himself to the jealousy of so penetrating a prince as Henry, he still hoped that, by accumulating riches and power, and by acquiring popularity, he might in time be able to open his way to the throne.

No sooner had Henry breathed his last than Stephen, insensible to all the ties of gratitude and fidelity, and blind to danger, gave full reins to his criminal ambition, and trusted that, even without any previous intrigue, the celerity of his enterprise, and the boldness of his attempt, might overcome the weak attachment which the English and Normans in that age bore to the laws and to the rights of their sovereign. He hastened over to England; and though the citizens of Dover, and those of Canterbury, apprised of his purpose, shut their gates against him, he stopped not till he arrived at London, where some of the lower rank, instigated by his emissaries, as well as moved by his general popularity, immediately saluted him king. His next point was to acquire the good will of the clergy; and by performing the ceremony of his coronation, he put himself in possession of the throne, from which he was confident it would not be easy afterwards to expel him. His brother, the bishop of Winchester, was useful to him in these capital articles: having gained Roger, bishop of Salisbury, who, though he owed a great fortune and advancement to the favour of the late king, preserved no sense of gratitude to that prince's family, he applied, in conjunction with that prelate, to William, archbishop of Canterbury, and required him, in virtue of his office, to give the royal unction to Stephen. The primate, who, as all the others, had sworn fealty to Matilda, refused to perform this ceremony; but his opposition was overcome by an expedient equally dishonourable with the other steps by which this revolution was effected. Hugh Bigod, steward of the household, made oath before the primate that the late king on his death-bed had shown a dissatisfaction with his daughter Matilda, and had expressed his intention of leaving the count of Boulogne heir to all his dominions. William, either believing, or feigning to believe, Bigod's testimony, anointed Stephen, and put the crown upon his head; and from this religious ceremony that prince, without any shadow either of hereditary title or consent of the nobility or people, was allowed to proceed to the exercise of sovereign authority. Very few barons attended his coronation; but none opposed his usurpation, however unjust or flagrant. The sentiment of religion, which, if corrupted into superstition, has often little efficacy in fortifying the duties of civil society, was not affected by the multiplied oaths taken in favour of Matilda, and only rendered the people obedient to a prince who was countenanced by the clergy, and who had received from the primate the rite of royal unction and consecration.*

Stephen, that he might further secure his tottering throne, passed a charter, in which he made liberal promises to all orders of men; to the clergy, that he would speedily fill all vacant benefices, and would never levy the rents of any of them during the vacancy; to the nobility, that he would reduce the royal forests to their ancient boundaries, and correct all encroachments; and to the people, that he would remit the tax of Danegelt, and restore the laws of King Edward. The late king had a great treasure at Winchester, amounting to a hundred thousand pounds; and Stephen, by seizing this money, immediately turned against Henry's family the precaution which that prince had employed for their grandeur and security: an event which naturally attends the policy of amassing treasures. By means of this money he insured the compliance, though not the attachment, of the principal clergy and nobility; but not trusting to this frail security, he invited over from the continent, particularly from Britany and Flanders, great numbers of those bravoos or disorderly soldiers, with whom every country in Europe, by reason of the general ill police and turbulent government, extremely abounded.—These mercenary troops guarded his throne by the terrors of the sword; and Stephen, that he might also overawe all malcontents by new and additional terrors of religion, procured a bull from Rome, which ratified his title, and which the pope, seeing this prince in possession of the throne, and pleased with an appeal to his authority in secular controversies, very readily granted him.

Matilda, and her husband Geoffrey, were as unfortunate in Normandy as they had been in England. The Norman nobility, moved by an hereditary animosity against the Angevins, first applied to Theobald count of Blois, Stephen's elder brother, for protection and assistance: but hearing afterwards that Stephen had got possession of the English crown, and having many of them the same reasons as formerly for desiring a continuance of their union with that kingdom, they transferred their allegiance to Stephen, and put him in possession of their government. Lewis the younger, the reigning king of France, accepted the homage of Eustace, Stephen's eldest son, for the duchy; and the more to corroborate his connexions with that family, he betrothed his sister Constantia to the young prince. The count of Blois resigned all his pretensions, and received in lieu of them an annual pension of two thousand marks; and Geoffrey himself was obliged to conclude a truce for two years with Stephen, on condition of the king's paying him, during that time, a pension of five thousand. Stephen, who had taken a journey to Normandy, finished all these transactions in person, and soon after returned to England.

Robert, earl of Gloucester, natural son of the late king, was a man of honour and abilities; and as he was much attached to the interests of his sister Matilda, and zealous for the lineal succession, it was chiefly from his intrigues and resistance that the king had reason to dread a new revolution of government. This nobleman, who was in Normandy when he received the intelligence of Stephen's accession, found himself much embarrassed concerning the measures which he should pursue in that difficult emergency. To swear allegiance to the usurper appeared to him dishonourable, and a breach of his fidelity, Matilda: to refuse giving this pledge of his fidelity, was to banish himself from England, and be totally incapacitated from serving the royal family, or contributing to their restoration. He offered Stephen to do him homage, and to take the oath of fealty; but with an express condition that the king should maintain all his stipulations, and should never invade any of Robert's rights or dignities: and Stephen, though sensible that this reserve, so unusual in itself, and so unbefitting the duty of a subject, was meant only to afford Robert a pretence for a revolt on the first favourable opportunity, was obliged, by the numerous friends and retainers of that nobleman, to receive him on those terms. The clergy, who could scarcely at this time be deemed subjects to the crown, imitated the dangerous example: they annexed to their oaths of allegiance this condition, that they were only bound so long as the king defended the ecclesiastical liberties, and supported the discipline of the church. The barons, in return for their submission, exacted terms still more destructive of public peace, as well as of royal authority: many of them required the right of fortifying their castles, and of putting themselves in a posture of defence; and the king found himself totally unable to refuse his consent to this exorbitant demand. All England was immediately filled with those fortresses, which the noblemen garrisoned either with their vassals, or with licentious soldiers, who flocked to them from all quarters. Unbounded rapine was exercised upon the people for the maintenance of these troops; and private animosities, which had with difficulty been restrained by law, now breaking out without control, rendered England a scene of uninterrupted violence and devastation. Wars between the nobles were carried on with the utmost fury in every quarter; the barons even assumed the right of coining money, and of exercising, without appeal, every act of jurisdiction; and the inferior gentry, as well as the people, finding no defence from the laws during this total dissolution of sovereign authority, were obliged, for their immediate safety, to pay court to some neighbouring chieftain, and to purchase his protection, both by submitting to his exactions, and by assisting him in his rapine upon others. The erection of one castle proved the immediate cause of building many others; and even those who obtained not the king's permission, thought that they were entitled by the great principle of self-preservation, to put themselves on an equal footing with their neighbours, who commonly were also their enemies and rivals. The aristocratical power, which is usually so oppressive in the feudal governments, had now risen to its utmost height during the reign of a prince who, though endowed with vigour and abilities, had usurped the throne without the pretence of a title, and who was necessitated to tolerate in others the same violence to which he himself had been beholden for his sovereignty.

But Stephen was not of a disposition to submit long to these usurpations, without making some effort for the recovery of royal authority. Finding that the legal prerogatives of the crown were resisted and abridged, he was also tempted to make his power the sole measure of his conduct; and to violate all those concessions which he himself had made on his accession, as well as the ancient privileges of his subjects. The mercenary soldiers, who chiefly supported his authority, having exhausted the royal treasure, subsisted by depredations; and every place was filled with the best-grounded complaints against the government. The earl of Gloucester, having now settled with his friends the plan of an insurrection, retired beyond sea, sent the king a defiance, solemnly renounced his allegiance, and upbraided him with the breach of those conditions which had been annexed to the oath of fealty sworn by that nobleman. David, king of Scotland, appeared at the head of an army in defence of his niece's title, and, penetrating into Yorkshire, committed the most barbarous devastations on that country. The fury of his massacres and ravages enraged the northern nobility, who might otherwise have been inclined to join him; and William earl of Albemarle, Robert de Ferrers, William Percy, Robert de Brus, Roger Moubray, Ilbert Lacey, Walter l'Espec, powerful barons in those parts, assembled an army, with which they encamped at Northallerton, and awaited the arrival of the enemy. A great battle was here fought, called the battle of the Standard, from a high crucifix, erected by the English on a waggon, and carried along with the army as a military ensign. The king of Scots was defeated, and he himself, as well as his son Henry, narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the English. This success overawed the malecontents in England, and might have given some stability to Stephen's throne, had he not been so elated with prosperity as to engage in a controversy with the clergy, who were at that time an overmatch for any monarch.

Though the great power of the church in ancient times weakened the authority of the crown, and interrupted the course of the laws, it may be doubted whether, in ages of such violence and outrage, it was not rather advantageous that some limits were set to the power of the sword, both in the hands of the prince and nobles, and that men were taught to pay regard to some principles and privileges. The chief misfortune was, that the prelates on some occasions acted entirely as barons, employed military power against their sovereign or their neighbours, and thereby often increased those disorders which it was their duty to repress. The bishop of Salisbury, in imitation of the nobility, had built two strong castles, one at Sherborne, another at the Devizes, and had laid the foundation of a third at Malmesbury: his nephew Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, had erected a fortress at Newark: and Stephen, who was now sensible from experience of the mischiefs attending these multiplied citadels, resolved to begin with destroying those of the clergy, who by their function seemed less entitled than the barons to such military securities. Making pretence of a fray which had arisen in court between the retinue of the bishop of Salisbury and that of the earl of Britany, he seized both that prelate and the bishop of Lincoln, threw them into prison, and obliged them by menaces to deliver up those places of strength which they had lately erected.

Henry, bishop of Winchester, the king's brother, being armed with a legantine commission, now conceived himself to be an ecclesiastical sovereign no less powerful than the civil; and forgetting the ties of blood which connected him with the king, he resolved to vindicate the clerical privileges, which he pretended were here openly violated. He assembled a synod at Westminster, and there complained of the impiety of Stephen's measures, who had employed violence against the dignitaries of the church, and had not awaited the sentence of a spiritual court, by which alone, he affirmed, they could lawfully be tried and condemned, if their conduct had anywise merited censure or punishment. The synod ventured to send a summons to the king, charging him to appear before them, and to justify his measures; and Stephen, instead of reserating this indignity, sent Aubery de Vere to plead his cause before that assembly. De Vere accused the two prelates of treason and sedition; but the synod refused to try the cause, or examine their conduct, till those castles, of which they had been dispossessed, were previously restored to them. The bishop of Salisbury declared that he would appeal to the pope; and had not Stephen and his partisans employed menaces, and even shown a disposition of executing violence by the hands of the soldiery, affairs had instantly come to extremity between the crown and the mitre.

While this quarrel, joined to so many other grievances, increased the discontents among the people, the empress, invited by the opportunity, and secretly encouraged by the legate himself, landed in England, with Robert earl of Gloucester, and a retinue of a hundred and forty knights. She fixed her residence at Arundel castle, whose gates were opened to her by Adelais the queen dowager, now married to William de Albini earl of Sussex; and she excited by messengers her partisans to take arms in every county of England. Adelais, who had expected that her daughter-in-law would have invaded the kingdom with a much greater force, became apprehensive of danger; and Matilda, to ease her of her fears, removed first to Bristol, which belonged to her brother Robert, thence to Gloucester, where she remained under the protection of Milo, a gallant nobleman in those parts, who had embraced her cause.

With this narration it will be interesting to contrast Lingard's; who, in vivid and dramatic powers of description, surpasses all our other historians. He says, "Stephen soon appeared at the foot of the walls: the princesses were alarmed: the queen pleaded in excuse the duties of hospitality: the empress solicited permission to follow her brother: and such was the weakness or infatuation of the king, that to the astonishment of both friends and foes, he accepted the apology of the one, and granted the request of the other. If we may believe Malmesbury, this measure, so prejudicial to the royal interests, was nothing more than an act of courtesy, which no knight could refuse to his enemy. If we listen to the panegyrist of Stephen, it was the result of a false policy, which taught that the war would be easily suppressed, if it were confined to one corner of the island. He even hints that it was owing to the perfidious councils of the bishop of Winchester. It is certain indeed that Henry of late had reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of his brother: it was rumoured that instead of intercepting the Earl Robert in his flight, he had even sought a private interview with that nobleman, and had bound himself to the interests of Matilda. To his care the empress was intrusted during her journey from Arundel to Bristol."

Soon after Geoffrey Talbot, William Mohun, Ralph Lovel, William Fitz-John, William Fitz-Alan, Paganell, and many other barons, declared for her; and her party, which was generally favoured in the kingdom, seemed every day to gain ground upon that of her antagonist.

Were we to relate all the military events transmitted to us by contemporary and authentic historians, it would be easy to swell our accounts of this reign into a large volume: but those incidents, so little memorable in themselves, and so confused both in time and place, could afford neither instruction nor entertainment to the reader. It suffices to say, that the war was spread into every quarter; and that those turbulent barons, who had already shaken off, in a great measure, the restraint of government, having now obtained the pretence of a public cause, carried on their devastations with redoubled fury, exercised implacable vengeance on each other, and set no bounds to their oppressions over the people. The castles of the nobility were become receptacles of licensed robbers; who, sallying forth day and night, committed spoil on the open country, on the villages, and even on the cities; put the captives to torture, in order to make them reveal their treasures; sold their persons to slavery, and set fire to their houses, after they had pillaged them of everything valuable. The fierceness of their dispositions leading them to commit wanton destruction, frustrated the rapacity of its purpose, and the poverty and persons even of the ecclesiastics, generally so much revered, were at last, from necessity, exposed to the same outrage which had laid waste the rest of the kingdom. The land was left untilled; the instruments of husbandry were destroyed or abandoned; and a grievous famine, the natural result of those disorders, affected equally both parties, and reduced the spoilers, as well as the defenceless people, to the most extreme want and indigence.

Lingard gives the following description of the castles of this period. "The Keep, the lords' residence, was surrounded at a convenient distance by a wall about twelve feet high, surmounted by a parapet, and flanked with towers. Without the wall was excavated a deep moat, over which a drawbridge was thrown, protected by a tower called the barbican, on the external margin of the moat. This formed the outward defence of the place. The keep was a strong square building with walls about ten feet thick and five stories in height. Of these the lowermost consisted of dungeons for the confinement of captives: the second contained the lord's stores: the next served for the accommodation of the garrison: in the fourth were the state rooms of the baron, and the uppermost was divided into sleeping apartments for his family. The only portal or entrance was fixed in the second or third story, and generally led through a small tower into the body of the keep. The ascent was by a flight of steps fixed in the wall, and carefully fortified to prevent the entrance of an enemy. About the middle stood a strong gate, which it was necessary to force open: on the landing place was a draw-bridge: and then came the door itself protected by a herse or portcullis, which ran in a groove, and was studded with spikes of iron. It is not surprising that fortresses of this description should have withstood the efforts of the most powerful monarchs before the invention of cannon."

After several fruitless negotiations and treaties of peace, which interrupted these destructive hostilities, there happened at last an event which seemed to promise some end of the public calamities.

We must again prefer Lingard's narration to that of Hume: had he added to this art of agreeable description the philosophic penetration and judgment of the latter, he would have been an unrivalled historian.

"At length in an evil hour Stephen was persuaded to besiege the castle of Lincoln, which had been surprised by Ranulf, earl of Chester, a nobleman who had offered his services to both the king and the empress, and who had been equally mistrusted by both. Confiding his wife and family to the faith of the garrison, Ranulf escaped through the besieging army, and flew to implore the assistance of the earl of Gloucester. With ten thousand men Robert hastened to surprise the king; but when he had swum across the Trent, found the royal army drawn up to receive him. Stephen, with the most trusty of his adherents, had dismounted, and placed himself at the foot of his standard; each flank was protected by a small squadron of horse, under the command of noblemen of suspicious fidelity. At the first shock the cavalry fled: the mass of infantry, animated by the presence of the king, firmly withstood the efforts of the multitude by which it was surrounded. Stephen fought with the energy of despair; his battle-axe was broken; his sword was shivered; a stone brought him to the ground; and William de Kains, seizing him by the helmet, claimed him as his prisoner. Still he struggled with his opponents, and refused to surrender to any man but his cousin of Gloucester. The earl took possession of the captive, and presented him to Matilda. The conduct of that princess does little honour to her humanity, Stephen was loaded with chains, and confined in the castle of Bristol, though to justify such rigour, it was pretended that he had drawn it upon himself by his repeated attempts to escape."

Stephen's party was entirely broken by the captivity of their leader, and the barons came in daily from all quarters, and did homage to Matilda. The princess, however, amidst all her prosperity, knew that she was not secure of success, unless she could gain the confidence of the clergy; and as the conduct of the legate had been of late very ambiguous, and showed his intentions to have rather aimed at humbling his brother, than totally ruining him, she employed every endeavour to fix him in her interests. She held a conference with him in an open plain near Winchester; where she promised upon oath that if he would acknowledge her for sovereign, would recognise her title as the sole descendant of the late king, and would again submit to the allegiance which he, as well as the rest of the kingdom, had sworn to her, he should in return be entire master of the administration, and in particular should, at his pleasure, dispose of all vacant bishoprics and abbeys. Earl Robert, her brother, Brian Fitz-Count, Milo of Gloucester, and other great men, became guarantees for her observing these engagements; and the prelate was at last induced to promise her allegiance, but that was still burdened with the express condition, that she should on her part fulfil her promises. He then conducted her to Winchester, led her in procession to the cathedral, and with great solemnity, in the presence of many bishops and abbots, denounced curses against all those who cursed her, poured out blessings on those who blessed her, granted absolution to such as were obedient to her, and excommunicated such as were rebellious. Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, soon after came also to court, and swore allegiance to the empress.

Matilda, that she might further insure the attachment of the clergy, was willing to receive the crown from their hands; and instead of assembling the states of the kingdom, the measure which the constitution, had it been either fixed or regarded, seemed necessarily to require, she was content, that the legate should summon an ecclesiastical synod, and that her title to the throne should there be acknowledged. The legate, addressing himself to the assembly, told them, that in the absence of the empress, Stephen his brother had been permitted to reign, and, previously to his ascending the throne, had seduced them by many fair promises of honouring and exalting the church, of maintaining the laws, and of reforming all abuses: that it grieved him to observe how much that prince had in every particular been wanting to his engagements; public peace was interrupted, crimes were daily committed with impunity, bishops were thrown into prison and forced to surrender their possessions, abbeys were put to sale, churches were pillaged, and the most enormous disorders prevailed in the administration: that he himself, in order to procure a redress of these grievances, had formerly summoned the king before a council of bishops; but instead of inducing him to amend his conduct, had rather offended him by that expedient: that, how much soever misguided, that prince was still his brother, and the object of his affections; but his interests, however, must be regarded as subordinate to those of their heavenly Father, who had now rejected him, and thrown him into the hands of his enemies: that it principally belonged to the clergy to elect and ordain kings; he had summoned them together for that purpose; and having invoked the divine assistance, he now pronounced Matilda the only descendant of Henry, their late sovereign, queen of England. The whole assembly, by their acclamations or silence, gave, or seemed to give, their assent to this declaration.*

The only laymen summoned to this council, which decided the fate of the crown, were the Londoners; and even these were required not to give their opinion, but to submit to the decrees of the synod. The deputies of London, however, were not so passive: they insisted that their king should be delivered from prison; but were told by the legate, that it became not the Londoners, who were regarded as noblemen in England, to take part with those barons, who had basely forsaken their lord in battle, and who had treated the holy church with contumely. It is with reason that the citizens of London assumed so much authority, if it be true, what is related by Fitz-Stephen, a contemporary author, that that city could at this time bring into the field no less than 80,000 combatants.†

London, notwithstanding its great power, and its attachment to Stephen, was at length obliged to submit to Matilda; and her authority, by the prudent conduct of Earl Robert, seemed to be established over the whole kingdom: but affairs remained not long in this situation. That princess, besides the disadvantages of her sex, which weakened her influence over a turbulent and martial people, was of a passionate, imperious spirit, and knew not how to temper with affability the harshness of a refusal. Stephen's queen, seconded by many of the nobility, petitioned for the liberty of her husband; and offered, that, on this condition, he should renounce the crown, and retire into a convent. The legate desired that Prince Eustace, his nephew, might inherit Boulogne and the other patrimonial estates of his father: the Londoners applied for the establishment of King Edward's laws, instead of those of King Henry, which, they said, were grievous and oppressive. All these petitions were rejected in the most haughty and peremptory manner.

The legate, who had probably never been sincere in his compliance with Matilda's government, availed himself of the ill humour excited by this imperious conduct, and secretly instigated the Londoners to a revolt. A conspiracy was entered into to seize the person of the empress; and she saved herself from the danger by a precipitate retreat. She fled to Oxford: soon after she went to Winchester; whither the legate, desirous to save appearances, and watching the opportunity to ruin her cause, had retired. But having assembled all his retainers, he openly joined his force to that of the Londoners, and to Stephen's mercenary troops, who had not yet evacuated the kingdom; and he besieged Matilda in Winchester. The princess, being hard pressed by famine, made her escape; but in the flight, Earl Robert, her brother, fell into the hands of the enemy.* This nobleman, though a subject, was as much the life and soul of his own party, as Stephen was of the other; and the empress, sensible of his merit and importance, consented to exchange the prisoners on equal terms. The civil war was again kindled with greater fury than ever.

Earl Robert, finding the successes on both sides nearly balanced, went over to Normandy, which, during Stephen's captivity, had submitted to the earl of Anjou; and he persuaded Geoffrey to allow his eldest son Henry, a young prince of great hopes, to take a journey into England, and appear at the head of his partisans. This expedient, however produced nothing decisive. Stephen took Oxford after a long siege.

The account of Matilda's escape is thus given by Lingard:—

"It was a severe frost, and the ground was covered with snow. Attended by three knights, clothed in white, she issued at a very early hour from a portal: the nearest sentinel, who had been previously bribed, conducted her in silence between the posts of the enemy: the ice bore her across the Thames; she reached Abingdon on foot, and thence rode with expedition to Wallingford."

Stephen was defeated by Earl Robert at Wilton; and the empress, though of a masculine spirit, yet being harassed with a variety of good and bad fortune, and alarmed with continual dangers to her person and family, at last retired into Normandy, whither she had sent her son some time before. The death of her brother, which happened nearly about the same time, would have proved fatal to her interests, had not some incidents occurred, which checked the course of Stephen's prosperity. This prince, finding that the castles built by the noblemen of his own party encouraged the spirit of independence, and

* W. Malmes. This author, a judicious man, was present, and says, that he was very attentive to what passed. This speech, therefore, may be regarded as entirely genuine.

† Were this account to be depended upon, London must at that time have contained near 400,000 inhabitants, which is above double the number it contained at the death of Queen Elizabeth. But these loose calculations, or rather guesses, deserve very little credit. Peter of Blois, a contemporary writer, and a man of sense, says there were then only 40,000 inhabitants in London, which is much more likely. What Fitz-Stephen says of the prodigious riches, splendour, and commerce of London, proves only the great poverty of the other towns in the kingdom, and indeed of all the northern parts of Europe.

were little less dangerous than those which remained in the hands of the enemy; endeavoured to extort from them a surrender of those fortresses; and he alienated the affections of many of them by this equitable demand. The church also, which his brother had brought over to his side, had, after some interval, joined the other party. Eugenius III. had mounted the papal throne; the bishop of Winchester was deprived of the legantine commission, which was conferred on Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, the enemy and rival of the former legate. That pontiff also having summoned a general council at Rheims in Champagne, instead of allowing the church of England, as had been usual, to elect its own deputies, nominated five English bishops to represent that church, and required their attendance in the council. Stephen, who notwithstanding his present difficulties, was jealous of the rights of his crown, refused them permission to attend; and the pope, sensible of his advantage in contending with a prince who reigned by a disputed title, took revenge by laying all Stephen's party under an interdict. The discontents of the royalists, at being thrown into this situation, were augmented by a comparison with Matilda's party, who enjoyed all the benefits of the sacred ordinances; and Stephen was at last obliged, by making proper submissions to the see of Rome, to remove the reproach from his party.

The weakness of both sides, rather than any decrease of mutual animosity, having produced a tacit cessation of arms in England, many of the nobility, Roger de Moubray, William de Warenne, and others, finding no opportunity to exert their military ardour at home, enlisted themselves in a new crusade, which with surprising success, after former disappointments and misfortunes, was now preached by St. Bernard. But an event soon after happened which threatened a revival of hostilities in England. Prince Henry, who had reached his sixteenth year, was desirous of receiving the honour of knighthood; a ceremony which every gentleman in that age passed through before he was admitted to the use of arms, and which was deemed requisite for the greatest princes. He intended to receive his admission from his great uncle, David king of Scotland; and for that purpose he passed through England with a great retinue, and was attended by the most considerable of his partisans. He remained some time with the king of Scotland; made incursions into England; and by his dexterity and vigour in all manly exercises, by his valour in war, and his prudent conduct in every occurrence, he roused the hopes of his party, and gave symptoms of those great qualities which he afterwards displayed when he mounted the throne of England. Soon after his return to Normandy, he was, by Matilda's consent, invested in that duchy; and upon the death of his father Geoffrey, which happened in the subsequent year, he took possession both of Anjou and Maine, and concluded a marriage, which brought him a great accession of power, and rendered him extremely formidable to his rival. Eleanor, the daughter and heir of William duke of Guienne, and earl of Poitou, had been married sixteen years to Lewis VII. king of France, and had attended him in a crusade, which that monarch conducted against the infidels: but having there lost the affections of her husband, and even fallen under some suspicion of gallantry with a handsome Saracen, Lewis, more delicate than polite, procured a divorce from her, and restored her those rich provinces which by her marriage she had annexed to the crown of France. Young Henry, neither discouraged by the inequality of years, nor by the reports of Eleanor's gallantry, made successful courtship to that princess, and espousing her six weeks after her divorce, got possession of all her dominions as her dowry. The lustre which he received from this acquisition, and the prospect of his rising fortune, had such an effect in England, that when Stephen, desirous to insure the crown to his son Eustace, required the archbishop of Canterbury to anoint that prince as his successor, the primate refused compliance, and made his escape beyond sea, to avoid the violence and resentment of Stephen.

Henry, informed of these dispositions in the people, made an invasion on England: having gained some advantage over Stephen at Malmesbury, and having taken that place, he proceeded thence to throw succours into Wallingford, to which the king had advanced with a superior army to besiege. A decisive action was every day expected; when the great men of both sides, terrified at the prospect of further bloodshed and confusion, interposed with their good offices, and set on foot a negotiation between the rival princes. The death of Eustace, during the course of the treaty, facilitated its conclusion: an accommodation was settled, by which it was agreed, that Stephen should possess the crown during his lifetime, that justice should be administered in his name, even in the provinces which had submitted to Henry, and that this latter prince should, on Stephen's demise, succeed to the kingdom, and William, Stephen's son, to Boulogne and his patrimonial estate. After all the barons had sworn to the observance of this treaty, and done homage to Henry, as to the heir of the crown, that prince evacuated the kingdom; and the death of Stephen, which happened the next year, after a short illness, prevented all those quarrels and jealousies, which were likely to have ensued in so delicate a situation.

England suffered great miseries during the reign of this prince: but his personal character, allowing for the temerity and injustice of his usurpation, appears not liable to any great exception; and he seems to have been well qualified, had he succeeded by a just title, to have promoted the happiness and prosperity of his subjects. He was possessed of industry, activity, and courage, to a great degree; though not endowed with a sound judgment, he was not deficient in abilities; he had the talent of gaining men's affections; and, notwithstanding his precarious situation, he never indulged himself in the exercise of any cruelty or revenge. His advancement to the throne procured him neither tranquillity nor happiness; and though the situation of England prevented the neighbouring states from taking any durable advantage of her confusions, her intestine disorders were to the last degree ruinous and destructive. The court of Rome was also permitted, during those civil wars, to make further advances in her usurpations; and appeals to the pope, which had always been strictly prohibited by the English laws, became now common in every ecclesiastical controversy.

Lingard says, the principal cause of the calamities of this reign "may be traced to the castles which covered the face of the country. Wherever one of these fortresses was erected, several others, for the purpose of protection, immediately arose around it. But some took not the trouble to build; they seized and fortified the nearest churches. Thus the abbey of Ramsey was converted into a castle.

"In addition to those which existed at Stephen's accession, no fewer than a hundred and twenty-six were fortified during his reign. The owners, secure within their walls and moats, conceived themselves freed from all restraints of justice and law. They plundered the lands in the neighbourhood, carried off the inhabitants, and confined in dungeons the most respectable of their captives. There every species of torture was employed to extort from the sufferers an enormous ransom, or a discovery of the place in which their property was concealed. Some were suspended by the feet in a volume of smoke; others were hanged up by the thumbs, while plates of heated metal were applied to the soles of the feet. Hunger and thirst, knotted cords twisted with violence round the temples, and pressure in a large trunk, the bottom of which was strewed with broken stones, were favourite modes of torture; but Philip Gay, a kinsman of the earl of Gloucester, had the merit of inventing a new and more formidable contrivance, which was afterwards adopted by several of these petty tyrants. This was the "Sachenteg," or culprit's halter; a heavy engine of iron studded with sharp points, and made to encircle the neck, and press upon the shoulders, so that the sufferer could neither sit, stand, nor lie, without the most acute pain. It sometimes happened that the cruelty of these barbarians wrought its own punishment. The husbandmen fled from the neighbourhood of the castle: the lands were left barren; and, as provisions could only be procured by force, the garrison was reduced to the verge of famine. The fugitives usually retired to some of the ecclesiastical establishments, where they built their miserable hovels against the walls of the church, and begged a scanty pittance of bread from the charity of the clergy or monks. But even here they could not promise themselves security. The curses, which were perpetually denounced against the invaders of ecclesiastical property, were despised; and the churches themselves, with those who served them, were swept away by the lawless and sacrilegious banditti. Such was the desolation of the land, say two contemporary historians, that villages and towns were left destitute of inhabitants; and in many parts a man might ride a whole day without discovering on his route one human being."

HENRY. II.

State of Europe—of France—First acts of Henry's Government—Disputes between the civil and ecclesiastical powers—Thomas a Becket, archbishop of Canterbury—Quarrel between the king and Becket—Constitutions of Clarendon—Banishment of Becket—Compromise with him—His return from banishment—His murder—Grief and submission of the king.

THE extensive confederacies, by which the European potentates are now at once united and set in opposition to each other, and which, though they are apt to diffuse the least spark of dissension throughout the whole, are at least attended with this advantage, that they prevent any violent revolutions or conquests in particular states, were totally unknown in ancient ages; and the theory of foreign politics in each kingdom formed a speculation much less complicated and involved than at present. Commerce had not yet bound together the most distant nations in so close a chain: wars finished in one campaign and often in one battle, were little affected by the movements of remote states: the imperfect communication among the kingdoms, and their ignorance of each other's situation, made it impracticable for a great number of them to combine in one project or effort: and above all, the turbulent spirit and independent situation of the barons or great vassals in each state, gave so much occupation to the sovereign, that he was obliged to confine his attention chiefly to his own state and his own system of government, and was more indifferent about what passed among his neighbours. Religion alone, not politics, carried abroad the views of princes; while it either fixed their thoughts on the Holy Land, whose conquest and defence were deemed a point of common honour and interest, or engaged them in intrigues with the Roman pontiff, to whom they had yielded the direction of ecclesiastical affairs, and who was every day assuming more authority than they were willing to allow him.

Before the conquest of England by the duke of Normandy, this island was as much separated from the rest of the world in politics as in situation; and except from the inroads of the Danish pirates, the English happily confined at home, had neither enemies nor allies on the continent. The foreign dominions of William connected them with the king and great vassals of France; and while the opposite pretensions of the pope and emperor in Italy produced a continual intercourse between Germany and that country, the two great monarchs of France and England formed, in another part of Europe, a separate system, and carried on their wars and negotiations, without meeting either with opposition or support from the others.

On the decline of the Carolingian race, the nobles in every province of France, taking advantage of the weakness of the sovereign, and obliged to provide each for his own defence, against the ravages of the Norman freebooters, had assumed, both in civil and military affairs, an authority almost independent, and had reduced within very narrow limits the prerogative of their princes. The accession of Hugh Capet, by annexing a great fief to the crown, had brought some addition to the royal dignity; but this fief though considerable for a subject, appeared a narrow basis of power for a prince who had been placed at the head of so great a community. The royal demesnes consisted only of Paris, Orleans, Estampes, Compiègne, and a few places scattered over the northern provinces: in the rest of the kingdom, the prince's authority was rather nominal than real: the vassals were accustomed, nay, entitled, to make war without his permission, on each other: they were even entitled, if they conceived themselves injured, to turn their arms against their sovereign: they exercised all civil jurisdiction, without appeal, over their tenants and inferior vassals: their common jealousy of the crown easily united them against any attempt on their exorbitant privileges; and as some of them had attained the power and authority of great princes, even the smallest baron was sure of immediate and effectual protection. Besides six ecclesiastical peerages, which, with the other immunities of the church, cramped extremely the general execution of justice, there were six lay peerages, Burgundy, Normandy, Guienne, Flanders, Toulouse, and Champagne, which formed very extensive and puissant sovereignties. And though the combination of all those princes and barons could, on urgent occasions, muster a mighty power; yet was it very difficult to set that great machine in movement; it was almost impossible to preserve harmony in its parts; a sense of common interest alone could, for a time, unite them under their sovereign against a common enemy; but if the king attempted to turn the force of the community against any mutinous vassal, the same sense of common interest made the others oppose themselves to the success of his pretensions. Lewis the Gross, the last sovereign, marched at one time to his frontiers against the Germans at the head of an army of two hundred thousand men; but a petty lord of Corbeil, of Puiset, of Couci, was able at another period, to set that prince at defiance, and to maintain open war against him.

The authority of the English monarch was much more extensive within his kingdom, and the disproportion much greater between him and the most powerful of his vassals. His demesnes and revenue were large compared to the greatness of his state: he was accustomed to levy arbitrary exactions on his subjects: his courts of judicature extended their jurisdiction into every part of the kingdom: he could crush by his power, or by a judicial sentence, well or ill founded, any obnoxious baron: and though the feudal institution which prevailed in his kingdom had the same tendency as in other states, to exalt the aristocracy and depress the monarchy, it required, in England, according to its present constitution, a great combination of the vassals to oppose their sovereign lord, and there had not hitherto arisen any baron so powerful as of himself to levy war against the prince, and afford protection to the inferior barons.

While such were the different situations of France and England, and the latter enjoyed so many advantages above the former; the accession of Henry II., a prince of great abilities, possessed of so many rich provinces on the continent, might appear an event dangerous, if not fatal, to the French monarchy, and sufficient to break entirely the balance between the states. He was master in the right of his father, of Anjou and Touraine; in that of his mother, of Normandy and Maine; in that of his wife, of Guienne, Poitou, Saintogne, Auvergne, Perigord, Angoumois, the Limousin. He soon after annexed Britany to his other states, and was already possessed of the superiority over that province, which, on the first cession of Normandy to Rollo the Dane, had been granted by Charles the Simple in vassalage to that formidable ravager. These provinces composed above a third of the whole French monarchy, and were much superior in extent and opulence to those territories which were subjected to the immediate jurisdiction and government of the king. The vassal was here more powerful than his liege lord: the situation which had enabled

Hugh Capet to depose the Carlovingian princes, seemed to be renewed, and that with much greater advantage on the side of the vassal: and when England was added to so many provinces, the French king had reason to apprehend, from this conjuncture, some great disaster to himself and to his family: but, in reality, it was this circumstance, which appeared so formidable, that saved the Capetian race, and by its consequences exalted them to that pitch of grandeur which they at present enjoy.

The limited authority of the prince in the feudal constitutions, prevented the king of England from employing with advantage the force of so many states, which were subjected to his government; and these different members, disjoined in situation, and disagreeing in laws, language, and manners, were never thoroughly cemented into one monarchy. He soon became, both from his distant place of residence, and from the incompatibility of interests, a kind of foreigner to his French dominions; and his subjects on the continent considered their allegiance as more naturally due to their superior lord, who lived in their neighbourhood, and who was acknowledged to be the supreme head of their nation. He was always at hand to invade them; their immediate lord was often at too great a distance to protect them; and any disorder in any part of his dispersed dominions gave advantages against him. The other powerful vassals of the French crown were rather pleased to see the expulsion of the English, and were not affected with that jealousy which could have arisen from the oppression of a co-vassal who was of the same rank with themselves. By this means, the king of France found it more easy to conquer those numerous provinces from England, than to subdue a duke of Normandy or Guienne, a count of Anjou, Maine, or Poitou. And after reducing such extensive territories, which immediately incorporated with the body of the monarchy, he found greater facility in uniting to the crown the other great fiefs which still remained separate and independent.

But as these important consequences could not be foreseen by human wisdom, the king of France remarked with terror the rising grandeur of the house of Anjou or Plantagenet; and, in order to retard its progress, he had ever maintained a strict union with Stephen, and had endeavoured to support the tottering fortunes of that bold usurper. But after this prince's death it was too late to think of opposing the succession of Henry, or preventing the performance of those stipulations which, with the unanimous consent of the nation, he had made with his predecessor. The English, harassed with civil wars, and disgusted with the bloodshed and depredations which, during the course of so many years, had attended them, were little disposed to violate their oaths, by excluding the lawful heir from the succession of their monarchy. Many of the most considerable fortresses were in the hands of his partisans; the whole nation had had occasion to see the noble qualities with which he was endowed, and to compare them with the mean talents of William, the son of Stephen; and as they were acquainted with his great power, and were rather pleased to see the accession of so many foreign dominions to the crown of England, they never entertained the least thoughts of resisting them. Henry himself, sensible of the advantages attending his present situation, was in no hurry to arrive in England; and being engaged in the siege of a castle on the frontiers of Normandy, when he received intelligence of Stephen's death, he made it a point of honour not to depart from his enterprise, till he had brought it to an issue. He then set out on his journey, and was received in England with the acclamations of all orders of men, who swore with pleasure the oath of fealty and allegiance to him.

The first act of Henry's government corresponded to the high idea entertained of his abilities, and prognosticated the re-establishment of justice and tranquillity, of which the kingdom had so long been bereaved. He immediately dismissed all those mercenary soldiers who had committed great disorders in the nation; and he sent them abroad, together with William of Ypres, their leader, the friend and confidant of Stephen. He revoked all the grants made by his predecessor, even those which necessity had extorted from the empress Matilda; and that princess, who had resigned her rights in favour of Henry, made no opposition to a measure so necessary for supporting the dignity of the crown. He repaired the coin, which had been extremely debased during the reign of his predecessor; and he took proper measures against the return of a like abuse. He was rigorous in the execution of justice, and in the suppression of robbery and violence; and that he might restore authority to the laws, he caused all the new-erected castles to be demolished, which had proved so many sanctuaries to freebooters and rebels. The earl of Albemarle, Hugh Mortimer, and Roger the son of Milo of Gloucester, were inclined to make some resistance to this salutary measure; but the approach of the king with his forces soon obliged them to submit.

Everything being restored to full tranquillity in England, Henry went abroad in order to oppose the attempts of his brother Geoffrey, who during his absence had made an incursion into Anjou and Maine, had advanced some pretensions to those provinces, and had got possession of a considerable part of them.* On the king's appearance, the people returned to their allegiance; and Geoffrey, resigning his claim for an annual pension of a thousand pounds, departed and took possession of the county of Nantz, which the inhabitants, who had expelled Count Hoel their prince, had put into his hands. Henry returned to England the following year: the incursions of the Welsh then provoked him to make an invasion upon them; where the natural fastnesses of the country occasioned him great difficulties, and even brought him into danger. His vanguard being engaged in a narrow pass, was put to rout: Henry de Essex, the hereditary standard-bearer, seized with a panic, threw down the standard, took to flight, and exclaimed that the king was slain: and had not the prince immediately appeared in person, and led on his troops with great gallantry, the consequence might have proved fatal to the whole army. For this misbehaviour, Essex was afterwards accused of felony by Robert de Montfort; was vanquished in single combat; his estate was confiscated; and he himself was thrust into a convent. The submissions of the Welsh procured them an accommodation with England.

The martial disposition of the princes in that age engaged them to head their own armies in every enterprise, even the most frivolous; and their feeble authority made it commonly impracticable for them to delegate, on occasion, the command to their generals. Geoffrey, the king's brother, died soon after he had acquired possession of Nantz: though he had no other title to that county than the voluntary submission or election of the inhabitants two years before, Henry laid claim to the territory as devolved to him by hereditary right, and he went over to support his pretensions by force of arms. Conan, duke or earl of Britany (for these titles are given indifferently by historians to those princes), pretended that Nantz had been lately separated by rebellion from his principality, to which of right it belonged; and immediately on Geoffrey's death he took possession of the disputed territory. Lest Lewis the French king should interpose in the controversy, Henry paid him a visit; and so allured him by caresses and civilities, that an alliance was contracted between them; and they agreed that young Henry, heir to the English monarchy, should be affianced to Margaret of France; though the former was only five years of age, the latter was still in her cradle. Henry, now secure of meeting with no interruption on this side, advanced with his army into Britany; and Conan, in despair of being able to make resistance, delivered up the county of Nantz to him. The able conduct of the king procured him further and more important advantages from this incident. Conan, harassed with the turbulent disposition of his subjects, was desirous of procuring to himself the support of so great a monarch; and he betrothed his daughter and only child, yet an infant, to Geoffrey the king's third son, who was of the same tender years. The duke of Britany died about seven years after; and Henry being mesne lord, and also natural guardian to his son and daughter-in-law, put himself in possession of that principality, and annexed it for the present to his other great dominions.

The king had a prospect of making still further acquisitions; and the activity of his temper suffered no opportunity of that kind to escape him. Philippa, duchess of Guienne, mother of Queen Eleanor, was the only issue of William IV. count of Toulouse; and would have inherited his dominions, had not that prince, desirous of preserving the succession in the male line, conveyed the principality to his brother Raymond de St. Gilles, by a contract of sale which was in that age regarded as fictitious and illusory. By this means the title to the county of Toulouse came to be disputed between the male and female heirs; and the one or the other, as opportunities favoured them, had obtained possession. Raymond, grandson of Raymond de St. Gilles, was the reigning sovereign; and on Henry's reviving his wife's claim, this prince had recourse for protection to the king of France, who was so much concerned in policy to prevent the further aggrandizement of the English monarch. Lewis himself, when married to Eleanor, had asserted the justice of her claim, and had demanded possession of Toulouse, but his sentiments changing with his interest, he now determined to defend by his power and authority the title of Raymond. Henry found that it would be requisite to support his pretensions against potent antagonists; and that nothing but a formidable army could maintain a claim which he had in vain asserted by arguments and manifestos.

* William of Newbridge (who is copied by later historians) asserts, that Geoffrey had some title to the counties of Maine and Anjou. He pretends that Count Geoffrey, his father, had left him these dominions by a secret will, and had ordered that his body should not be buried till Henry should swear to the observance of it, which he, ignorant of the contents, was induced to do. But besides that this story is not very likely in itself, and savours of monkish fiction, it is found in no other ancient writer, and is contradicted by some of them, particularly the monk of Marmoutier, who had better opportunities than Newbridge of knowing the truth.

An army, composed of feudal vassals, was commonly very intractable and undisciplined, both because of the independent spirit of the persons who served in it, and because the commands were not given, either by the choice of the sovereign or from the military capacity and experience of the officers. Each baron conducted his own vassals: his rank was greater or less, proportioned to the extent of his property: even the supreme command under the prince was often attached to birth: and as the military vassals were obliged to serve only forty days at their own charge; though, if the expedition were distant, they were put to great expense; the prince reaped little benefit from their attendance. Henry, sensible of these inconveniences, levied upon his vassals in Normandy, and other provinces which were remote from Toulouse, a sum of money in lieu of their service; and this commutation, by reason of the great distance, was still more advantageous to his English vassals. He imposed, therefore, a scutage of 120,000 pounds on the knights' fees, a commutation to which, though it was unusual, and the first perhaps to be met with in history,* the military tenants willingly submitted; and with this money he levied an army which was more under his command, and whose service was more durable and constant. Assisted by Berenger count of Barcelona, and Trincaval count of Nismes, whom he had gained to his party, he invaded the county of Toulouse; and after taking Verdun, Castlenau, and other places, he besieged the capital of the province, and was likely to prevail in the enterprise; when Lewis, advancing before the arrival of his main body, threw himself into the place with a small reinforcement. Henry was urged by some of his ministers to prosecute the siege, to take Lewis prisoner, and to impose his own terms in the pacification; but he either thought it so much his interest to maintain his feudal principles, by which his foreign dominions were secured, or bore so much respect to his superior lord, that he declared he would not attack a place defended by him in person; and he immediately raised the siege. He marched into Normandy to protect that province against an incursion which the count of Dreux, instigated by King Lewis his brother, had made upon it. War was now openly carried on between the two monarchs, but produced no memorable event: it soon ended in a cessation of arms, and was followed by a peace, which was not, however, attended with any confidence or good correspondence between those rival princes. The fortress of Gisors, being part of the dowry stipulated to Margaret of France, had been consigned by agreement to the knights templars, on condition that it should be delivered into Henry's hands after the celebration of the nuptials. The king, that he might have a pretence for immediately demanding the place, ordered the marriage to be solemnized between the prince and princess, though both infants; and he engaged the grand-master of the templars, by large presents, as was generally suspected, to put him in possession of Gisors. Lewis, resenting this fraudulent conduct, banished the templars, and would have made war upon the king of England, had it not been for the mediation and authority of Pope Alexander III. who had been chased from Rome by the anti-pope Victor IV. and resided at that time in France. That we may form an idea of the authority possessed by the Roman pontiff during those ages, it may be proper to observe that the two kings had, the year before, met the pope at the castle of Torci, on the Loir; and they gave him such marks of respect, that both dismounted to receive him, and holding each of them one of the reins of his bridle, walked on foot by his side, and conducted him in that submissive manner into the castle. "A spectacle," cries Baronius in an ecstasy, "to God, angels, and men; and such as had never before been exhibited to the world!"

Henry, soon after he had accommodated his differences with Lewis by the pope's mediation, returned to England; where he commenced an enterprise, which, though required by sound policy, and even conducted in the main with prudence, bred him great disquietude, involved him in danger, and was not concluded without some loss and dishonour.

The usurpations of the clergy, which had at first been gradual, were now become so rapid, and had mounted to such a height, that the contest between the regale and pontificale was really arrived at a crisis in England; and it became necessary to determine whether the king or the priests, particularly the archbishop of Canterbury, should be sovereign of the kingdom. The aspiring spirit of Henry, which gave inquietude to all his neighbours, was not likely long to pay a tame submission to the encroachments of subjects; and as nothing opens the eyes of men so readily as their interest, he was in no danger of falling, in this respect, into that abject superstition which retained his people in subjection. From the commencement of his reign, in the government of his foreign dominions, as well as of England, he had shown a fixed purpose to repress clerical usurpations, and to maintain those prerogatives which had been transmitted to him by his predecessors. During the schism of the papacy between Alexander and Victor, he had determined, for some time, to remain neuter: and when informed that the archbishop of Rouen and the bishop of Mans, had, from their own authority, acknowledged Alexander as legitimate pope, he was so enraged, that though he spared the archbishop on account of his great age, he immediately issued orders for overthrowing the houses of the bishop of Mans and archdeacon of Rouen*;

* The sum scarcely appears credible; as it would amount to much above half the rent of the whole land. Gervase is indeed a contemporary author; but churchmen are often guilty of strange mistakes of that nature, and are commonly but little acquainted with the public revenues. The Norman chronicle says, that Henry raised only sixty Angevin shillings on each knight's fee in his foreign dominions: this is only a fourth of the sum which Gervase says he levied on England: an inequality nowise probable. A nation may by degrees be brought to bear a tax of fifteen shillings in the pound, but a sudden and precarious tax can never be imposed to that amount, without a very visible necessity, especially in an age so little accustomed to taxes. In the succeeding reign the rent of a knight's fee was computed at four pounds a year. There were sixty thousand knights' fees in England.

* This conduct appears violent and arbitrary; but was suitable to the strain of administration in those days. His father, Geoffrey, though represented as a mild prince, set and it was not till he had deliberately examined the matter, by those views which usually enter into the councils of princes, that he allowed that pontiff to exercise authority over any of his dominions. In England, the mild character and advanced years of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, together with his merits in refusing to put the crown on the head of Eustace, son of Stephen, prevented Henry, during the life-time of that primate, from taking any measures against the multiplied encroachments of the clergy: but after his death, the king resolved to exert himself with more activity; and that he might be secure against any opposition, he advanced to that dignity Becket, his chancellor, on whose compliance he thought he could entirely depend.

Thomas a Becket, the first man of English descent who, since the Norman conquest, had, during the course of a whole century, risen to any considerable station, was born of reputable parents in the city of London; and being endowed with both industry and capacity, he early insinuated himself into the favour of Archbishop Theobald, and obtained from that prelate some preferments and offices. By their means he was enabled to travel for improvement to Italy, where he studied the civil and canon law at Bologna; and on his return he appeared to have made such proficiency in knowledge, that he was promoted by his patron to the archdeaconry of Canterbury, an office of considerable trust and profit. He was afterwards employed with success by Theobald in transacting business at Rome; and on Henry's accession he was recommended to that monarch as worthy of farther preferment. Henry, who knew that Becket had been instrumental in supporting that resolution of the archbishop, which had tended so much to facilitate his own advancement to the throne, was already prepossessed in his favour, and finding on further acquaintance, that his spirit and abilities entitled him to any trust, he soon promoted him to the dignity of chancellor, one of the first civil offices in the kingdom. The chancellor, in that age, besides the custody of the great seal, had possession of all vacant prelacies and abbeys; he was the guardian of all such minors and pupils as were the king's tenants; all baronies which escheated to the crown were under his administration; he was entitled to a place in council, even though he was not particularly summoned; and as he exercised also the office of secretary of state, and it belonged to him to countersign all commissions, writs, and letters-patent, he was a kind of prime minister, and was concerned in the dispatch of every business of importance. Besides exercising this high office, Becket, by favour of the king or archbishop, was made provost of Beverley, dean of Hastings, and constable of the Tower: he was put in possession of the honours of Eye and Berkham, large baronies that had escheated to the crown: and to complete his grandeur, he was intrusted with the education of prince Henry, the king's eldest son, and heir of the monarchy. The him an example of much greater violence. When Geoffrey was master of Normandy, the chapter of Seez presumed, without his consent, to proceed to the election of a bishop; upon which he ordered all of them, with the bishop elect, to be castrated, and made all their testicles be brought him in a platter. In the war of Toulouse, Henry laid a heavy and an arbitrary tax on all the churches within his domi-pomp of his retinue, the sumptuousness of his furniture, the luxury of his table, the munificence of his presents, corresponded to these great preferments; or rather exceeded any thing that England had ever before seen in any subject. His historian and secretary, Fitz-Stephens, mentions, among other particulars, that his apartments were every day in winter covered with clean straw or hay, and in summer with green rushes or boughs, lest the gentlemen who paid court to him, and who could not, by reason of their great number, find a place at table, should soil their fine clothes by sitting on a dirty floor.* A great number of knights were retained in his service; the greatest barons were proud of being received at his table; his house was a place of education for the sons of the chief nobility; and the king himself frequently vouchsafed to partake of his entertainments. As his way of life was splendid and opulent, his amusements and occupations were gay, and partook of the cavalier spirit, which, as he had only taken deacon's orders, he did not think unbefitting his character. He employed himself at leisure hours in hunting, hawking, gaming, and horsemanship; he exposed his person in several military actions; he carried over, at his own charge, seven hundred knights to attend the king in his wars at Toulouse; in the subsequent wars on the frontiers of Normandy he maintained, during forty days, twelve hundred knights, and four thousand of their train; and in an embassy to France, with which he was intrusted, he astonished that court by the number and magnificence of his retinue.

"The reader will be amused (says Lingard) with the following account of the manner in which the chancellor travelled through France. Whenever he entered a town, the procession was led by two hundred and fifty boys, singing national airs: then came his hounds in couples: and these were succeeded by eight waggons, each drawn by five horses, and attended by five drivers in new frocks. Every waggon was covered with skins, and protected by two guards, and a fierce mastiff either chained below, or at liberty above. Two of them were loaded with barrels of ale to be given to the populace: one carried the furniture of the chancellor's chapel, another of his bed-chamber, a fifth of his kitchen, and a sixth his plate and wardrobe: the remaining two were appropriated to the use of his attendants. These were followed by twelve sumpter horses, on each of which rode a monkey, with the groom behind on his knees. Next came the esquires bearing the shields, and leading the chargers of their knights, then other esquires, gentlemen's sons, falconers, officers of the household, knights and clergymen, riding two and two, and last of all the chancellor himself in familiar converse with a few friends. As he passed, the natives were heard to exclaim: 'What manner of man must the king of England be, when his chancellor travels in such state!'"

Henry, besides committing all his more important business to Becket's management, honoured him with his friendship and intimacy; and whenever he was disposed to relax himself by sports of any kind, he admitted his chancellor to the party. An instance of their familiarity is mentioned by Fitz-Stephens, which, as it shows the manners of the age, it may not be improper to relate. One day, as the king and the chancellor were riding together in the streets of London, they observed a beggar who was shivering with cold. Would it not be very praise-worthy, said the king, to give that poor man a warm coat in this severe season? It would surely, replied the chancellor; and you do well, sir, in thinking of such good actions. Then he shall have one presently, cried the king: and seizing the skirt of the chancellor's coat, which was scarlet, and lined with ermine, began to pull it violently. The chancellor defended himself for some time; and they had both of them like to have tumbled off their horses in the street, when Becket, after a vehement struggle, let go his coat; which the king bestowed on the beggar, who, being ignorant of the quality of the persons, was not a little surprised at the present.

* John Baldwin held the manor of Oterafsee in Aylesbury, of the king in soccage, by the service of finding litter for the king's bed, viz. in summer, grass or herbs, and two grey geese; and in winter, straw and three eels, thrice in the year, if the king should come thrice in the year to Aylesbury.

Becket, who by his complaisance and good-humour had rendered himself agreeable, and by his industry and abilities, useful to his master, appeared to him the fittest person for supplying the vacancy made by the death of Theobald. As he was well acquainted with the king's intentions of retrenching, or rather confining within the ancient bounds, all ecclesiastical privileges, and always showed a ready disposition to comply with them, Henry, who never expected any resistance from that quarter, immediately issued orders for electing him archbishop of Canterbury. But this resolution, which was taken contrary to the opinion of Matilda, and many of the ministers, drew after it very unhappy consequences; and never prince of so great penetration appeared in the issue to have so little understood the genius and character of his minister.

No sooner was Becket installed in this high dignity, which rendered him for life the second person in the kingdom, with some pretensions of aspiring to be the first, than he totally altered his demeanor and conduct, and endeavoured to acquire the character of sanctity, of which his former busy and ostentatious course of life might, in the eyes of the people, have naturally bereaved him. Without consulting the king, he immediately returned into his hands the commission of chancellor; pretending that he must thenceforth detach himself from secular affairs, and be solely employed in the exercise of his spiritual function; but in reality, that he might break off all connexions with Henry, and apprise him, that Becket, as primate of England, was now become entirely a new personage. He maintained, in his retinue, and attendants alone, his ancient pomp and lustre, which was useful to strike the vulgar: in his own person he affected the greatest austerity and most rigid mortification, which he was sensible would have an equal or a greater tendency to the same end. He wore sack-cloth next his skin, which, by his affected care to conceal it, was necessarily the more remarked by all the world: he changed it so seldom, that it was filled with dirt and vermin: his usual diet was bread; his drink water, which he even rendered further unpalatable by the mixture of unsavory herbs: he tore his back with the frequent discipline which he inflicted on it: he daily on his knees washed, in imitation of Christ, the feet of thirteen beggars, whom he afterwards dismissed with presents. He gained the affections of the monks by his frequent charities to the convents and hospitals; every one who made profession of sanctity was admitted to his conversation, and returned full of panegyrics on the humility, as well as on the piety and mortification of the holy primate: he seemed to be perpetually employed in reciting prayers and pious lectures, or in perusing religious discourses: his aspect wore the appearance of seriousness, and mental recollection, and secret devotion: and all men of penetration plainly saw that he was meditating some great design, and that the ambition and ostentation of his character had turned itself towards a new and more dangerous object.

Becket waited not till Henry should commence those projects against the ecclesiastical power, which he knew had been formed by that prince: he was himself the aggressor, and endeavoured to overawe the king by the intrepidity and boldness of his enterprises. He summoned the earl of Clare to surrender the barony of Tunbridge, which ever since the conquest had remained in the family of that nobleman; but which, as it had formerly belonged to the see of Canterbury, Becket pretended his predecessors were prohibited by the canons to alienate. The earl of Clare, besides the lustre which he derived from the greatness of his own birth, and the extent of his possessions, was allied to all the principal families in the kingdom; his sister, who was a celebrated beauty, had further extended his credit among the nobility, and was even supposed to have gained the king's affections; and Becket could not better discover, than by attacking so powerful an interest, his resolution of maintaining with vigour the rights, real or pretended, of his see.

William de Eynsford, a military tenant of the crown, was patron of a living which belonged to a manor that held of the archbishop of Canterbury: but Becket, without regard to William's right, presented, on a new and legal pretext, one Laurence to that living, who was violently expelled by Eynsford. The primate making himself, as was usual in spiritual courts, both judge and party, issued in a summary manner the sentence of excommunication against Eynsford, who complained to the king that he who held in capite of the crown should, contrary to the practice established by the Conqueror, and maintained ever since by his successors, be subjected to that terrible sentence, without the previous consent of the sovereign. Henry, who had now broken off all personal intercourse with Becket, sent him, by a messenger, his orders to absolve Eynsford; but received for answer, that it belonged not to the king to inform him whom he should absolve and whom excommunicate: and it was not till after many remonstrances and menaces, that Becket, though with the worst grace imaginable, was induced to comply with the royal mandate.

Henry, though he found himself grievously mistaken in the character of the person whom he had promoted to the primacy, determined not to desist from his former intention of retrenching clerical usurpations. He was entirely master of his extensive dominions: the prudence and vigour of his administration, attended with perpetual success, had raised his character above that of any of his predecessors: the papacy seemed to be weakened by a schism, which divided all Europe; and he rightly judged, that if the present favourable opportunity were neglected, the crown must, from the prevalent superstition of the people, be in danger of falling into an entire subordination under the mitre.

The union of the civil and ecclesiastical power serves extremely, in every civilized government, to the maintenance of peace and order; and prevents those mutual encroachments which, as there can be no ultimate judge between them, are often attended with the most dangerous consequences. Whether the supreme magistrate, who unites these powers, receives the appellation of prince or prelate, is not material: the superior weight which temporal interests commonly bear in the apprehensions of men above spiritual, renders the civil part of his character most prevalent: and in time prevents those gross impostures and bigoted persecutions, which in all false religions are the chief foundation of clerical authority. But during the progress of ecclesiastical usurpations, the state, by the resistance of the civil magistrate, is naturally thrown into convulsions; and it behoves the prince, both for his own interest, and for that of the public, to provide in time sufficient barriers against so dangerous and insidious a rival. This precaution had hitherto been much neglected in England, as well as in other Catholic countries; and affairs at last seemed to have come to a dangerous crisis: a sovereign of the greatest abilities was now on the throne: a prelate of the most inflexible and intrepid character was possessed of the primacy: the contending powers appeared to be armed with their full force, and it was natural to expect some extraordinary event to result from their conflict.

Among their other inventions to obtain money, the clergy had inculcated the necessity of penance as an atonement for sin; and having again introduced the practice of paying them large sums as a commutation, or species of atonement for the remission of those penances, the sins of the people, by these means, had become a revenue to the priests; and the king computed that by this invention alone they levied more money upon his subjects than flowed, by all the funds and taxes, into the royal exchequer. That he might ease the people of so heavy and arbitrary an imposition, Henry required that a civil officer of his appointment should be present in all ecclesiastical courts, and should for the future give his consent to every composition which was made with sinners for their spiritual offences.

The ecclesiastics in that age had renounced all immediate subordination to the magistrate: they openly pretended to an exemption in criminal accusations from a trial before courts of justice; and were gradually introducing a like exemption in civil causes: spiritual penalties alone could be inflicted on their offences: and as the clergy had extremely multiplied in England, and many of them were consequently of very low characters, crimes of the deepest dye, murders, robberies, adulteries, rapes, were daily committed with impunity by the ecclesiastics. It had been found, for instance, on inquiry, that no less than a hundred murders had, since the king's accession, been perpetrated by men of that profession, who had never been called to account for these offences; and holy orders were become a full protection for all enormities. A clerk in Worcestershire, having debauched a gentleman's daughter, had at this time proceeded to murder the father; and the general indignation against this crime moved the king to attempt the remedy of an abuse which was become so palpable, and to require that the clerk should be delivered up and receive condign punishment from the magistrate. Becket insisted on the privileges of the church; confined the criminal in the bishop's prison, lest he should be seized by the king's officers; maintained that no greater punishment could be inflicted on him than degradation; and when the king demanded, that immediately after he was degraded he should be tried by the civil power, the primate asserted that it was iniquitous to try a man twice upon the same accusation, and for the same offence.

Henry, laying hold of so plausible a pretence, resolved to push the clergy with regard to all their privileges, which they had raised to an enormous height, and to determine at once those controversies which daily multiplied between the civil and the ecclesiastical jurisdictions. He summoned an assembly of all the prelates of England; and he put to them this concise and decisive question, Whether or not they were willing to submit to the ancient laws and customs of the kingdom? The bishops unanimously replied, that they were willing, saving their own order; a device by which they thought to elude the present urgency of the king's demand, yet reserve to themselves, on a favourable opportunity, the power of resuming all their pretensions. The king was sensible of the artifice, and was provoked to the highest indignation. He left the assembly with visible marks of his displeasure: he required the primate instantly to surrender the honours and castles of Eye and Berkham: the bishops were terrified, and expected still further effects of his resentment. Becket alone was inflexible; and nothing but the interposition of the pope's legate and almoner, Philip, who dreaded a breach with so powerful a prince at so unseasonable a juncture, could have prevailed on him to retract the saving clause, and give a general and absolute promise of observing the ancient customs.

But Henry was not content with a declaration in these general terms: he resolved, ere it was too late, to define expressly those customs with which he required compliance, and to put a stop to clerical usurpations before they were fully consolidated, and could plead antiquity, as they already did a sacred authority, in their favour. The claims of the church were open and visible. After a gradual and insensible progress during many centuries, the mask had at last been taken off, and several ecclesiastical councils, by their canons, which were pretended to be irrevocable and infallible, had positively defined those privileges and immunities, which gave such general offence, and appeared so dangerous to the civil magistrate. Henry therefore deemed it necessary to define with the same precision the limits of the civil power; to oppose his legal customs to their divine ordinances; to determine the exact boundaries of the rival jurisdictions; and for this purpose he summoned a general council of the nobility and prelates at Clarendon, to whom he submitted this great and important question.

The barons were all gained to the king's party, either by the reasons which he urged, or by his superior authority: the bishops were overawed by the general combination against them: and the following laws, commonly called the "Constitutions of Clarendon," were voted without opposition by this assembly. It was enacted that all suits concerning the advowson and presentation of churches should be determined in the civil courts: that the churches belonging to the king's see should not be granted in perpetuity without his consent: that clerks accused of any crime should be tried in the civil courts: that no person, particularly no clergyman of any rank, should depart the kingdom without the king's license: that excommunicated persons should not be bound to give security for continuing in their present place of abode: that laics should not be accused in spiritual courts, except by legal and reputable promoters and witnesses: that no chief tenant of the crown should be excommunicated, nor his lands be put under an interdict, except with the king's consent: that all appeals in spiritual causes should be carried from the archdeacon to the bishop, from the bishop to the primate, from him to the king; and should be carried no further without the king's consent: that if any lawsuit arose between a layman and a clergyman concerning a tenant, and it be disputed whether the land be a lay or an ecclesiastical fee, it should first be determined by the verdict of twelve lawful men to what class it belonged; and if it be found to be a lay-fee, the cause should finally be determined in the civil courts: that no inhabitant in demesne should be excommunicated for non-appearance in a spiritual court, till the chief officer of the place where he resides be consulted, that he may compel him by the civil authority to give satisfaction to the church: that the archbishops, bishops, and other spiritual dignitaries, should be regarded as barons of the realm; should possess the privileges, and be subjected to the burdens belonging to that rank; and should be bound to attend the king in his great councils, and assist at all trials, till the sentence either of death or loss of members, be given against the criminal. that the revenue of vacant sees should belong to the king; the chapter, or such of them as he pleases to summon, should sit in the king's chapel till they made the new election with his consent, and that the bishop-elect should do homage to the crown: that if any baron or tenant in capite should refuse to submit to the spiritual courts, the king should employ his authority in obliging him to make such submissions; if any of them throw off his allegiance to the king, the prelates should assist the king with their censures in reducing him: that goods forfeited to the king should not be protected in churches nor churchyards: that the clergy should no longer pretend to the right of enforcing payment of debts contracted by oath or promise; but should leave these lawsuits equally with others, to the determination of the civil courts: and that the sons of villains should not be ordained clerks, without the consent of their lord.

These articles, to the number of sixteen, were calculated to prevent the chief abuses which had prevailed in ecclesiastical affairs, and to put an effectual stop to the usurpations of the church, which, gradually stealing on, had threatened the total destruction of the civil power. Henry, therefore, by reducing those ancient customs of the realm to writing, and by collecting them in a body, endeavoured to prevent all future dispute with regard to them; and by passing so many ecclesiastical ordinances in a national and civil assembly, he fully established the superiority of the legislature above all papal decrees or spiritual canons, and gained a signal victory over the ecclesiastics. But as he knew that the bishops, though over-awed by the present combination of the crown and the barons, would take the first favourable opportunity of denying the authority which had enacted these constitutions; he resolved that they should all set their seal to them, and give a promise to observe them. None of the prelates dared to oppose his will, except Becket, who, though urged by the earls of Cornwall and Leicester, the barons of principal authority in the kingdom, obstinately withheld his assent. At last, Richard de Hastings, grand prior of the templars in England, threw himself on his knees before him; and with many tears entreated him, if he paid any regard either to his own safety or that of the church, not to provoke, by a fruitless opposition, the indignation of a great monarch, who was resolutely bent on his purpose, and who was determined to take full revenge on every one that should dare to oppose him. Becket, finding himself deserted by all the world, even by his own brethren, was at last obliged to comply; and he promised, legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve, to observe the constitutions; and he took an oath to that purpose. The king, thinking that he had now finally prevailed in this great enterprise, sent the constitutions to Pope Alexander, who then resided in France; and he required that pontiff's ratification of them: but Alexander, who, though he had owed the most important obligations to the king, plainly saw that these laws were calculated to establish the independency of England on the papacy, and of the royal power on the clergy, condemned them in the strongest terms; abrogated, annulled, and rejected them. There were only six articles, the least important, which, for the sake of peace, he was willing to ratify.

Becket, when he observed that he might hope for support in an opposition, expressed the deepest sorrow for his compliance; and endeavoured to engage all the other bishops in a confederacy to adhere to their common rights, and to the ecclesiastical privileges, in which he represented the interest and honour of God to be so deeply concerned. He redoubled his austerities, in order to punish himself for his criminal consent to the constitutions of Clarendon: he proportioned his discipline to the enormity of his supposed offence: and he refused to exercise any part of his archiepiscopal function, till he should receive absolution from the pope; which was readily granted him. Henry, informed of his present dispositions, resolved to take vengeance for this refractory behaviour, and he attempted to crush him, by means of that very power which Becket made such merit in supporting. He applied to the pope, that he should grant the commission of legate in his dominions to the archbishop of York; but Alexander, as politic as he, though he granted the commission, annexed a clause, that it should not empower the legate to execute any act in prejudice of the archbishop of Canterbury: and the king, finding how fruitless such an authority would prove, sent back the commission by the same messenger that brought it.

The primate, however, who finding himself still exposed to the king's indignation, endeavoured twice to escape secretly from the kingdom; but was as often detained by contrary winds: and Henry hastened to make him feel the effects of an obstinacy, which he deemed so criminal. He instigated John, mareschal of the exchequer, to sue Becket in the archiepiscopal court for some lands, part of the manor of Pageham; and to appeal thence to the king's court for justice. On the day appointed for trying the cause, the primate sent four knights to represent certain irregularities in John's appeal; and at the same time to excuse himself, on account of sickness, for not appearing personally that day in the court. This slight offence (if it even deserve the name) was represented as a grievous contempt; the four knights were menaced, and with difficulty escaped being sent to prison, as offering falsehoods to the court; and Henry, being determined to prosecute Becket to the utmost, summoned at Northampton a great council, which he purposed to make the instrument of his vengeance against the inflexible prelate.

The king had raised Becket from a low station to the highest offices, had honoured him with his countenance and friendship, had trusted to his assistance in forwarding his favourite project against the clergy; and when he found him become of a sudden his most rigid opponent, while every one beside complied with his will, rage at the disappointment, and indignation against such signal ingratitude, transported him beyond all bounds of moderation; and there seems to have entered more of passion than of justice, or even of policy, in this violent prosecution. The barons, notwithstanding, in the great council, voted whatever sentence he was pleased to dictate to them; and the bishops themselves, who undoubtedly bore a secret favour to Becket, and regarded him as the champion of their privileges, concurred with the rest in the design of oppressing their primate. In vain did Becket urge, that his court was proceeding with the utmost regularity and justice in trying the mareschal's cause; which, however, he said, would appear from the sheriff's testimony to be entirely unjust and iniquitous: that he himself had discovered no contempt of the king's court; but, on the contrary, by sending four knights to excuse his absence, had virtually acknowledged its authority: that he also, in consequence of the king's summons, personally appeared at present in the great council, ready to justify his cause against the mareschal, and to submit his conduct to their inquiry and jurisdiction: that even should it be found that he had been guilty of non-appearance, the laws had affixed a very slight penalty to that offence: and that as he was an inhabitant of Kent, where his archiepiscopal palace was seated, he was by law entitled to some greater indulgence than usual in the rate of his fine. Notwithstanding these pleas, he was condemned as guilty of a contempt of the king's court, and as wanting in the fealty which he had sworn to his sovereign; all his goods and chattels were confiscated; and that this triumph over the church might be carried to the utmost, Henry, bishop of Winchester, the prelate who had been so powerful in the former reign, was, in spite of his remonstrances, obliged, by order of the court, to pronounce the sentence against him. The primate submitted to the decree; and all the prelates, except Folliot, bishop of London, who paid court to the king by this singularity, became sureties for him. It is remarkable, that several Norman barons voted in this council; and we may conclude, with some probability, that a like practice had prevailed in many of the great councils summoned since the conquest. For the contemporary historian who has given us a full account of these transactions, does not mention this circumstance as anywise singular; and Becket, in all his subsequent remonstrances, with regard to the severe treatment which he had met with, never founds any objection on an irregularity, which to us appears very palpable and flagrant. So little precision was there at that time in the government and constitution.

The king was not content with this sentence, however violent and oppressive. Next day, he demanded of Becket the sum of three hundred pounds, which the primate had levied upon the honours of Eye and Berkham, while in his possession. Becket, after premising that he was not obliged to answer to this suit, because it was not contained in his summons; after remarking that he had expended more than that sum in the repairs of those castles, and of the royal palace at London; expressed, however, his resolution, that money should not be any ground of quarrel between him and his sovereign: he agreed to pay the sum; and immediately gave sureties for it. In the subsequent meeting, the king demanded five hundred marks, which, he affirmed, he had lent Becket during the war at Toulouse; and another sum to the same amount, for which that prince had been surety for him to a Jew. Immediately after these two claims, he preferred a third of still greater importance: he required him to give in the accounts of his administration while chancellor, and to pay the balance due from the revenues of all the prelacies, abbeys, and baronies, which had, during that time, been subjected to his management. Becket observed, that, as this demand was totally unexpected, he had not come prepared to answer it; but he required a delay, and promised in that case to give satisfaction. The king insisted upon sureties; and Becket desired leave to consult his suffragans in a case of such importance.

It is apparent from the known character of Henry, and from the usual vigilance of his government, that when he promoted Becket to the see of Canterbury, he was, on good grounds, well pleased with his administration in the former high office with which he had intrusted him; and that, even if that prelate had dissipated money beyond the income of his place, the king was satisfied that his expenses were not blameable, and had in the main been calculated for his service. Two years had since elapsed; no demand had, during that time, been made upon him; it was not till the quarrel arose concerning ecclesiastical privileges, that the claim was started, and the primate was, of a sudden, required to produce accounts of such intricacy and extent before a tribunal which had shown a determined resolution to ruin and oppress him. To find sureties, that he should answer so boundless and uncertain a claim, which in the king's estimation amounted to 44,000 marks, was impracticable; and Becket's suffragans were extremely at a loss what counsel to give him in such a critical emergency. By the advice of the bishop of Winchester he offered two thousand marks as a general satisfaction for all demands: but this offer was rejected by the king. Some prelates exhorted him to resign his see, on condition of receiving an acquittal: others were of opinion, that he ought to submit himself entirely to the king's mercy; but the primate, thus pushed to the utmost, had too much courage to sink under oppression: he determined to brave all his enemies, to trust to the sacredness of his character for protection, to involve his cause with that of God and religion, and to stand the utmost efforts of royal indignation.

After a few days spent in deliberation, Becket went to church, and said mass, where he had previously ordered, that the introit to the communion service should begin with these words, "Princes sat and spake against me;" the passage appointed for the martyrdom of St. Stephen, whom the primate thereby tacitly pretended to resemble in his sufferings for the sake of righteousness. He went thence to court arrayed in his sacred vestments: as soon as he arrived within the palace-gate, he took the cross into his own hands, bore it aloft as his protection, and marched in that posture into the royal apartments. The king, who was in an inner room, was astonished at this parade, by which the primate seemed to menace him and his court with the sentence of excommunication; and he sent some of the prelates to remonstrate with him on account of such audacious behaviour. The prelates complained to Becket, that, by subscribing himself to the constitutions of Clarendon, he had seduced them to imitate his example; and that now, when it was too late, he pretended to shake off all subordination to the civil power, and appeared desirous of involving them in the guilt which must attend any violation of those laws, established by their consent, and ratified by their subscriptions. Becket replied, that he had indeed subscribed the constitutions of Clarendon, legally, with good faith, and without fraud or reserve; but in these words was virtually implied a salvo for the rights of their order, which being connected with the cause of God and his church, could never be relinquished by their oaths and engagements: that if he and they had erred in resigning the ecclesiastical privileges, the best atonement they could now make was to retract their consent, which, in such a case, could never be obligatory, and to follow the pope's authority, who had solemnly annulled the constitutions of Clarendon, and had absolved them from all oaths which they had taken to observe them: that a determined resolution was evidently embraced to oppress the church; the storm had first broken upon him for a slight offence, and which too was falsely imputed to him; he had been tyrannically condemned to a grievous penalty: a new and unheard-of claim was since started, in which he could expect no justice; and he plainly saw that he was the destined victim, who, by his ruin, must prepare the way for the abrogation of all spiritual immunities: that he strictly inhibited them, who were his suffragans, from assisting at any such trial, or giving their sanction to any sentence against him; he put himself and his see under the protection of the supreme pontiff, and appealed to him against any penalty which his iniquitous judges might think proper to inflict upon him: and that, however terrible the indignation of so great a monarch as Henry, his sword could only kill the body; while that of the church, entrusted into the hands of the primate, could kill the soul, and throw the disobedient into infinite and eternal perdition.

Appeals to the pope, even in ecclesiastical causes, had been abolished by the constitutions of Clarendon, and were become criminal by law: but an appeal in a civil cause, such as the king's demand upon Becket, was a practice altogether new and unprecedented; it tended directly to the subversion of the government, and could receive no colour of excuse, except from the determined resolution, which was but too apparent in Henry and the great council, to effectuate, without justice, but under colour of law, the total ruin of the inflexible primate. The king having now obtained a pretext so much more plausible for his violence, would probably have pushed the affair to the utmost extremity against him; but Becket gave him no leisure to conduct the prosecution. He refused so much as to hear the sentence, which the barons, sitting apart from the bishops, and joined to some sheriffs and barons of the second rank,* had given upon the king's claim: he departed from the palace; asked Henry's immediate permission to leave Northampton; and upon meeting with a refusal, he withdrew secretly; wandered about in disguise for some time; and at last took shipping, and arrived safely at Gravelines.

Lingard gives the following somewhat different and more detailed account of Becket's attendance in answer to the king's citation. "As he entered, the king with his barons retired into a neighbouring apartment, and was soon after followed by the bishops. The primate left alone with his clerks in the spacious hall, seated himself on a bench, and with calm and intrepid dignity awaited their decision. The council chamber was a scene of noise and confusion. The courtiers, to please the prince, strove to distinguish themselves by the intemperance of their language. Henry, in the vehemence of his passion, inveighed, one while against the insolence of Becket, at another against the pusillanimity and ingratitude of his favourites: till even the most active of the prelates, who had raised the storm, began to view with horror the probable consequences. Roger of York contrived to retire; and as he passed through the hall, bade his clerks follow him, that they might not witness the effusion of blood. Next came the bishop of Exeter, who threw himself at the feet of the primate, and besought him to have pity on himself, and the episcopal order: for the king had threatened with death the first man who should speak in his favour. 'Flee then,' replied the archbishop, 'thou canst not understand the things that are of God.' Soon afterwards appeared the rest of the bishops. Hilary of Chichester spoke in their name: 'You were,' he said, 'our primate: but by opposing the royal customs you have broken your oath of fealty to the king. A perjured archbishop has no right to our obedience. From you then we appeal to the pope, and summon you to answer us before him.'—'I hear,' was his only reply.

"The bishops seated themselves along the opposite side of the hall, and a solemn silence ensued. At length the door (of the council chamber) opened, and the earl of Leicester, at the head of the barons, bade him hear his sentence. 'My sentence!' interrupted the archbishop; 'son and earl, hear me first. You know with what fidelity I served the king, how reluctantly, to please him, I accepted my present office, and in what manner I was declared by him free from all secular claims. For what happened before my consecration, I ought not to answer, nor will I. Know moreover that you are my children in God. Neither law nor reason allows you to judge your father. I therefore decline your tribunal, and refer my quarrel to the decision of the pope. To him I appeal : and shall now under the protection of the Catholic church, and the apostolic see, depart.' As he walked along the hall, some of the courtiers threw at him knots of straw which they took from the floor. A voice called him traitor. At the word he stopped, and hastily turning round, rejoined : ' Were it not that my order forbids me, that coward should repent of his insolence.' At the gate he was received with acclamations of joy by the clergy and people, and was conducted in triumph to his lodgings.

" It was generally believed that if the archbishop had remained at Northampton, that night would have proved his last. Alarmed by frequent hints from his friends, he petitioned to retire beyond the sea, and was told that he might expect an answer the following morning. This unnecessary delay increased his apprehensions. To deceive the vigilance of the spies that beset him, he ordered a bed to be prepared in the church, and in the dusk of the evening, accompanied by two clerks and a servant on foot, escaped by the north gate. After fifteen days of perils and adventures, brother Christian (that was the name he assumed) landed at Gravelines in Flanders."

The violent and unjust persecution of Becket had a natural tendency to turn the public favour on his side, and to make men overlook his former ingratitude towards the king, and his departure from all oaths and engagements, as well as the enormity of those ecclesiastical privileges, of which he affected to be the champion. There were many other reasons which procured him countenance and protection in foreign countries. Philip earl of Flanders, and Lewis king of France, jealous of the rising greatness of Henry, were well pleased to give him disturbance in his government; and forgetting that this was the common cause of princes, they affected to pity extremely the condition of the exiled primate; and the latter even honoured him with a visit at Soissons, in which city he had invited him to fix his residence. The pope, whose interests were more immediately concerned in supporting him, gave a cold reception to a magnificent embassy which Henry sent to accuse him; while Becket himself, who had come to Sens in order to justify his cause before the sovereign pontiff, was received with the greatest marks of distinction. The king, in revenge, sequestered the revenues of Canterbury; and by a conduct which, had there been at that time any regular check on royal authority, might be esteemed arbitrary, and was tyrannically unjust, he banished all the primate's relations and domestics, to the number of four hundred, whom he obliged to swear, before their departure, that they would instantly join their patron. But this policy, by which Henry endeavoured to reduce Becket sooner to necessity, lost its effect: the pope, when they arrived beyond sea, absolved them from their oath, and distributed them among the convents in France and Flanders: a residence was assigned to Becket himself in the convent of Pontigny, where he lived for some years in great magnificence, partly from a pension granted him on the revenues of that abbey, partly from remittances made him by the French monarch.

The more to ingratiate himself with the pope, Becket resigned into his hands the see of Canterbury, to which he affirmed, he had been uncanonically elected by the authority of the royal mandate, and Alexander, in his turn, besides investing him anew with that dignity, pretended to abrogate, by a bull, the sentence which the great council of England had passed against him. Henry, after attempting in vain to procure a conference with the pope, who departed soon after for Rome, whither the prosperous state of his affairs now invited him, made provisions against the consequences of that breach which impended between his kingdom and the apostolic see. He issued orders to his justiciaries, inhibiting, under severe penalties, all appeals to the pope or archbishop; forbidding any one to receive any mandates from them, or apply in any case to their authority; declaring it treasonable to bring from either of them an interdict upon the kingdom, and punishable in secular clergymen by the loss of their eyes and by castration, in regulars by amputation of their feet, and in laics with death; and menacing with sequestration and banishment the persons themselves, as well as their kindred, who should pay obedience to any such interdict: and he further obliged all his subjects to swear to the observance of those orders. These were edicts of the utmost importance, affected the lives and properties of all the subjects, and even changed, for the time, the national religion, by breaking off all communications with Rome: yet were they enacted by the sole authority of the king, and were derived entirely from his will and pleasure.

The spiritual powers, which, in the primitive church, were, in a great measure, dependent on the civil, had by a gradual progress reached an equality and independence; and though the limits of the two jurisdictions were difficult to ascertain or define, it was not impossible, but by moderation on both sides, government might still have been conducted in the imperfect and irregular manner which distinguished the period. But as the ignorance of the age encouraged the ecclesiastics daily to extend their privileges, and even to advance maxims totally incompatible with civil government, Henry had thought it high time to put an end to their pretensions, and formally, in a public council, to fix those powers which belonged to the civil magistrate, and which he was for the future determined to maintain. In this attempt he was led to re-establish customs, which, though ancient, were beginning to be abolished by a contrary practice, and which were more strongly opposed by the prevailing opinions and sentiments of the age. Principle, therefore, stood on the one side, power on the other; and if the English had been actuated by conscience, more than by present interest, the controversy must soon, by the general defection of Henry's subjects, have been decided against him. Becket, in order to forward this event, filled all places with exclamations against the violence which he had suffered. He compared himself to Christ, who had been condemned by a lay tribunal, and who was crucified anew in the present oppressions under which his church laboured: he took it for granted, as a point incontestable, that his cause was the cause of God: he assumed the character of champion for the patrimony of the Divinity: he pretended to be the spiritual father of the king and all the people of England; he even told Henry, that kings reign solely by the authority of the church. and though he had thus torn off the veil more openly on the one side, than that prince had on the other, he seemed still, from the general favour borne him by the ecclesiastics, to have all the advantage in the argument. The king, that he might employ the weapons of temporal power remaining in his hands, suspended the payment of Peter-pence; he made advances towards an alliance with the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, who was at that time engaged in violent wars with Pope Alexander; he discovered some intentions of acknowledging Pascal III., the present anti-pope, who was protected by that emperor; and by these expedients he endeavoured to terrify the enterprising though prudent pontiff from proceeding to extremities against him.

But the violence of Becket, still more than the nature of the controversy, kept affairs from remaining long in suspense between the parties. That prelate, instigated by revenge, and animated by the present glory attending his situation, pushed matters to a decision, and issued a censure, excommunicating the king's chief ministers by name, and comprehending in general all those who favoured or obeyed the constitutions of Clarendon: these constitutions he abrogated and annulled; he absolved all men from the oaths which they had taken to observe them; and he suspended the spiritual thunder over Henry himself, only that the prince might avoid the blow by a timely repentance.

The situation of Henry was so unhappy, that he could employ no expedient for saving his ministers from this terrible censure, but by appealing to the pope himself, and having recourse to a tribunal whose authority he had himself attempted to abridge in this very article of appeals, and which, he knew, was so deeply engaged on the side of his adversary. But even this expedient was not likely to be long effectual. Becket had obtained from the pope a legantine commission over England; and in virtue of that authority, which admitted of no appeal, he summoned the bishops of London, Salisbury, and others to attend him, and ordered, under pain of excommunication, the ecclesiastics, sequestered on his account, to be restored in two months to all their benefices. But John of Oxford, the king's agent with the pope, had the address to procure orders for suspending this sentence; and he gave the pontiff such hopes of a speedy reconciliation between the king and Becket, that two legates, William of Pavia and Otho, were sent to Normandy, where the king then resided, and they endeavoured to find expedients for that purpose. But the pretensions of the parties were, as yet, too opposite to admit of an accommodation: the king required, that all the constitutions of Clarendon should be ratified: Becket, that, previously to any agreement, he and his adherents should be restored to their possessions: and as the legates had no power to pronounce a definitive sentence on either side, the negotiation soon after came to nothing. The cardinal of Pavia also, being much attached to Henry, took care to protect the negotiation; to mitigate the pope, by the accounts which he sent of that prince's conduct; and to procure him every possible indulgence from the see of Rome. About this time the king had also the address to obtain a dispensation for the marriage of his third son Geoffrey, with the heiress of Britany; a concession, which, considering Henry's demerits towards the church, gave great scandal both to Becket, and to his zealous patron the king of France.

The intricacies of the feudal law had, in that age, rendered the boundaries of power between the prince and his vassals, and between one prince and another, as uncertain as those between the crown and the mitre; and all wars took their origin from disputes, which, had there been any tribunal possessed of power to enforce their decrees, ought to have been decided only before a court of judicature. Henry, in prosecution of some controversies, in which he was involved with the count of Auvergne, a vassal of the duchy of Guienne, had invaded the territories of that nobleman; who had recourse to the king of France, his superior lord, for protection, and thereby kindled a war between the two monarchs. But this war was, as usual, no less feeble in its operations, than it was frivolous in its cause and object; and after occasioning some mutual depredations, and some insurrections among the barons of Poictou and Guienne, was terminated by a peace. The terms of this peace were rather disadvantageous to Henry, and prove that that prince had, by reason of his contest with the church, lost the superiority which he had hitherto maintained over the crown of France: an additional motive to him for accommodating those differences.

The pope and the king began at last to perceive, that, in the present situation of affairs, neither of them could expect a final and decisive victory over the other, and that they had more to fear than to hope from the duration of the controversy. Though the vigour of Henry's government had confirmed his authority in all his dominions, his throne might be shaken by a sentence of excommunication; and if England itself could, by its situation, be more easily guarded against the contagion of superstitious prejudices, his French provinces at least, whose communication was open with the neighbouring states, would be much exposed, on that account, to some great revolution or convulsion. He could not, therefore, reasonably imagine that the pope, while he retained such a check upon him, would formally recognise the constitutions of Clarendon, which both put an end to papal pretensions in England, and would give an example to other states of asserting a like independency. Pope Alexander, on the other hand, being still engaged in dangerous wars with the Emperor Frederick, might justly apprehend, that Henry, rather than relinquish claims of such importance, would join the party of his enemy; and as the trials hitherto made of the spiritual weapons by Becket had not succeeded in his expectation, and everything had remained quiet in all the king's dominions, nothing seemed impossible to the capacity and vigilance of so great a monarch. The disposition of minds, on both sides, resulting from these circumstances, produced frequent attempts towards an accommodation; but as both parties knew that the essential articles of the dispute could not then be terminated, they entertained a perpetual jealousy of each other, and were anxious not to lose the least advantage in the negotiation. The nuncios Gratian and Vivian, having received a commission to endeavour a reconciliation, met with the king in Normandy; and after all differences seemed to be adjusted, Henry offered to sign the treaty with a salvo to his royal dignity; which gave such umbrage to Becket, that the negotiation, in the end, became fruitless, and the excommunications were renewed against the king's ministers. Another negotiation was conducted at Moutmirail, in presence of the king of France and the French prelates; where Becket also offered to make his submissions, with a salvo to the honour of God, and the liberties of the church; which, for a like reason, was extremely offensive to the king, and rendered the treaty abortive. A third conference under the same mediation was broken off by Becket's insisting on a like reserve in his submissions; and even in a fourth treaty, when all the terms were adjusted, and when the primate expected to be introduced to the king, and to receive the kiss of peace, which it was usual for princes to grant in those times, and which was regarded as a sure pledge of forgiveness, Henry refused him that honour; under pretence, that during his anger, he had made a rash vow to that purpose. This formality served, among such jealous spirits, to prevent the conclusion of the treaty; and though the difficulty was attempted to be overcome by a dispensation which the pope granted to Henry from his vow, that prince could not be prevailed on to depart from the resolution which he had taken.

In one of these conferences, at which the French king was present, Henry said to that monarch: "There have been many kings of England, some of greater, some of less authority than myself: there have also been many archbishops of Canterbury, holy and good men, and entitled to every kind of respect: let Becket but act towards me with the same submission which the greatest of his predecessors have paid to the least of mine, and there shall be no controversy between us." Lewis was so struck with this state of the case, and with an offer which Henry made to submit his cause to the French clergy, that he could not forbear condemning the primate, and withdrawing his friendship from him during some time: but the bigotry of that prince, and their common animosity against Henry, soon produced a renewal of their former good correspondence.

All difficulties were at last adjusted between the parties; and the king allowed Becket to return, on conditions which may be esteemed both honourable and advantageous to that prelate. He was not required to give up any rights of the church, or resign any of those pretensions which had been the original ground of the controversy. It was agreed that all these questions should be buried in oblivion; but that Becket and his adherents should, without making further submission, be restored to all their livings, and that even the possessors of such benefices as depended on the see of Canterbury, and had been filled during the primate's absence, should be expelled, and Becket have liberty to supply the vacancies. In return for concessions which entrenched so deeply on the honour and dignity of the crown, Henry reaped only the advantage of seeing his ministers absolved from the sentence of excommunication pronounced against them, and of preventing the interdict, which, if these hard conditions had not been complied with, was ready to be laid on all his dominions. It was easy to see how much he dreaded that event, when a prince of so high a spirit could submit to terms so dishonourable in order to prevent it. So anxious was Henry to accommodate all differences, and to reconcile himself fully with Becket, that he took the most extraordinary steps to flatter his vanity, and even, on one occasion, condescended so far as to hold the stirrup of that haughty prelate while he mounted.

Of this celebrated piece of courtesy or policy which took place in a spacious meadow near Freitville, on the borders of Touraine, Lingard gives the following account:—

"As soon as Becket appeared, the king spurring forward his horse, with his cap in his hand, prevented his salutation; and, as if no dissension had ever divided them, discoursed with him apart, with all that easy familiarity which had distinguished their former friendship. In the course of their conversation, Henry exclaimed: 'As for the men who have betrayed both you and me, I will make them such return, as the deserts of traitors require!' At these words the archbishop descended from his horse, and threw himself at the feet of his sovereign; but the king laid hold of the stirrup, and insisted that he should remount, saying, 'In short, my lord archbishop, let us renew our ancient affection for each other; only show me honour before those who are now viewing our behaviour.' Then returning to his attendants, he observed: 'I find the archbishop in the best dispositions towards me, were I otherwise towards him, I should be the worst of men.'"

But the king attained not even that temporary tranquillity which he had hoped to reap from these expedients. During the heat of his quarrel with Becket, while he was every day expecting an interdict to be laid on his kingdom, and a sentence of excommunication to be fulminated against his person, he had thought it prudent to have his son, Prince Henry, associated with him in the royalty, and to make him be crowned king by the hands of Roger archbishop of York. By this precaution he both ensured the succession of that prince, which, considering the many past irregularities on that point, could not but be esteemed somewhat precarious; and he preserved at least his family on the throne, if the sentence of excommunication should have the effect which he dreaded, and should make his subjects renounce their allegiance to him. Though this design was conducted with expedition and secrecy, Becket, before it was carried into execution, had got intelligence of it; and being desirous of obstructing all Henry's measures, as well as anxious to prevent this affront to himself, who pretended to the sole right, as archbishop of Canterbury, to officiate in the coronation, he had inhibited all the prelates of England from assisting at this ceremony, had procured from the pope a mandate to the same purpose, and had incited the king of France to protest against the coronation of young Henry, unless the princess, daughter of that monarch, should at the same time receive the royal unction. There prevailed in that age an opinion, which was akin to its other superstitions, that the royal unction was essential to the exercise of royal power: it was therefore natural both for the king of France, careful of his daughter's establishment, and for Becket, jealous of his own dignity, to demand, in the treaty with Henry, some satisfaction in this essential point. Henry, after apologizing to Lewis for the omission with regard to Margaret, and excusing it on account of the secrecy and dispatch requisite for conducting that measure, promised that the ceremony should be renewed in the persons both of the prince and princess: and he assured Becket, that besides receiving the acknowledgments of Roger and the other bishops for the seeming affront put on the see of Canterbury, the primate should, as a further satisfaction, recover his rights by officiating in this coronation. But the violent spirit of Becket, elated by the power of the church, and by the victory which he had already obtained over his sovereign, was not content with this voluntary compensation, but resolved to make the injury, which he pretended to have suffered, a handle for taking revenge on all his enemies. On his arrival in England he met the archbishop of York, and the bishops of London and Salisbury, who were on their journey to the king in Normandy: he notified to the archbishop the sentence of suspension, and to the two bishops that of excommunication, which, at his solicitation, the pope had pronounced against them. Reginald de Warrenne, and Gervase de Cornhill, two of the king's ministers who were employed on their duty in Kent, asked him, on hearing of this bold attempt, whether he meant to bring fire and sword into the kingdom? But the primate, heedless of the reproof, proceeded, in the most ostentatious manner, to take possession of his diocese. In Rochester, and all the towns through which he passed, he was received with the shouts and acclamations of the populace. As he approached Southwark, the clergy, the laity, men of all ranks and ages, came forth to meet him, and celebrated with hymns of joy his triumphant entrance. And though he was obliged, by order of the young prince, who resided at Woodstock, to return to his diocese, he found that he was not mistaken when he reckoned upon the highest veneration of the public towards his person and his dignity. He proceeded, therefore, with the more courage to dart his spiritual thunders: he issued the sentence of excommunication against Robert de Broc and Nigel de Sackville, with many others, who either had assisted at the coronation of the prince, or been active in the late persecution of the exiled clergy. This violent measure, by which he in effect denounced war against the king himself, is commonly ascribed to the vindictive disposition and imperious character of Becket; but as this prelate was also a man of acknowledged abilities, we are not, in his passions alone, to look for the cause of his conduct, when he proceeded to these extremities against his enemies. His sagacity had led him to discover all Henry's intentions; and he proposed, by this bold and unexpected assault, to prevent the execution of them.

The king, from his experience of the dispositions of his people, was become sensible that his enterprise had been too bold in establishing the constitutions of Clarendon, in defining all the branches of the royal power, and in endeavouring to extort from the church of England, as well as from the pope, an express avowal of these disputed prerogatives. Conscious also of his own violence in attempting to break or subdue the inflexible primate, he was not displeased to undo that measure which had given his enemies such advantage against him; and he was contented that the controversy should terminate in that ambiguous manner, which was the utmost that princes in those ages could hope to attain in their disputes with the see of Rome. Though he dropped for the present the prosecution of Becket, he still reserved to himself the right of maintaining, that the constitutions of Clarendon, the original ground of the quarrel, were both the ancient customs and the present law of the realm: and though he knew that the papal clergy asserted them to be impious to themselves, as well as abrogated by the sentence of the sovereign pontiff, he intended, in spite of their clamours, steadily to put those laws in execution, and to trust to his own abilities, and to the course of events, for success in that perilous enterprise. He hoped that Becket's experience of a six years' exile would, after his pride was fully gratified by his restoration, be sufficient to teach him more reserve in his opposition: or if any controversy arose, he expected thenceforth to engage in a more favourable cause, and to maintain with advantage, while the primate was now in his power, the ancient and undoubted customs of the kingdom against the usurpations of the clergy. But Becket determined not to betray the ecclesiastical privileges by his connivance, and apprehensive lest a prince of such profound policy, if allowed to proceed in his own way, might probably in the end prevail, resolved to take all the advantage which his present victory gave him, and to disconcert the cautious measures of the king, by the vehemence and rigour of his own conduct. Assured of support from Rome, he was little intimidated by dangers, which his courage taught him to despise, and which, even if attended with the most fatal consequences, would serve only to gratify his ambition and thirst of glory.

When the suspended and excommunicated prelates arrived at Baieux, where the king then resided, and complained to him of the violent proceedings of Becket, he instantly perceived the consequences; was sensible that his whole plan of operations was overthrown; foresaw that the dangerous contest between the civil and spiritual powers, a contest which he himself had first roused, but which he had endeavoured by all his late negotiations and concessions, to appease, must come to an immediate and decisive issue; and he was thence thrown into the most violent commotion. The archbishop of York remarked to him, that so long as Becket lived, he could never expect to enjoy peace or tranquillity: the king himself, being vehemently agitated, burst forth into an exclamation against his servants, whose want of zeal, he said, had so long left him exposed to the enterprises of that ungrateful and imperious prelate. Four gentlemen of his household, Reginald Fitzurse, William Tracy, Hugh de Moreville, and Richard Brito, taking these passionate expressions to be a hint for Becket's death, immediately communicated their thoughts to each other; and swearing to avenge their prince's quarrel, secretly withdrew from court. Some menacing expressions which they had dropped, gave a suspicion of their design; and the king dispatched a messenger after them, charging them to attempt nothing against the person of the primate. But these orders arrived too late to prevent their fatal purpose. The four assassins, though they took different roads to England, arrived nearly about the same time at Saltwoode near Canterbury.

According to Lingard, "The next day about two in the afternoon, (of Dec. 29, 1170,) the knights abruptly entered the archbishop's apartment, and neglecting his salutation, seated themselves on the floor. It seems to have been their wish to begin by intimidation: but if they hoped to succeed, they knew little of the intrepid spirit of their opponent. Pretending to have received their commission from Henry, they ordered the primate to absolve the excommunicated prelates. He replied with firmness and occasionally with warmth, that if he had published the papal letters, it was with the royal permission: that the case of the archbishop of York had been reserved to the pontiff: but that he was willing to absolve the others on condition that they previously took the accustomed oath of submitting to the determination of the church. It was singular that of the four knights, three had, in the days of his prosperity, spontaneously sworn fealty to him. Alluding to this circumstance, he said as they were quitting the room, 'Knowing what formerly passed between us, I am surprised you should come to threaten me in my own house.'—'We will do more than threaten,' was their reply.

"When they were gone, his attendants loudly expressed their alarm: he alone remained cool and collected, and neither in his tone nor gesture betrayed the slightest symptom of apprehension. In this moment of suspense the voices of the monks singing vespers in the choir struck their ears; and it occurred to some one that the church was a place of greater security than the palace. The archbishop, though he hesitated, was borne along by the pious importunity of his friends: but when he heard the gates close behind him, he instantly ordered them to be reopened, saying that the temple of God was not to be fortified like a castle. He had passed through the north transept, and was ascending the steps of the choir, when the knights with twelve companions, all in complete armour, burst into the church. As it was almost dark, he might, if he had pleased, have concealed himself among the crypts, or under the roof: but he turned to meet them, followed by Edward Grim, his cross-bearer, the only one of his attendants who had not fled. To the vociferations of Hugh of Horsea, a military sub-deacon, 'Where is the traitor?' no answer was returned: but when Fitzurse asked, 'Where is the archbishop?' he replied, 'Here I am, the archbishop, but no traitor. Reginald, I have granted thee many favours. What is thy object now? if you seek my life, I command you in the name of God not to touch one of my people.' When he was told that he must instantly absolve the bishops, he answered 'Till they offer satisfaction, I will not.'—'Then die!' exclaimed the assassin, aiming a blow at his head. Grim interposed his arm, which was broken, but the force of the stroke bore away the primate's cap, and wounded him on the crown. As he felt the blood trickling down his face he joined his hands, and bowed his head, saying: 'In the name of Christ and for the defence of his church I am ready to die.' In this posture, turned towards his murderers, without a groan and without a motion, he awaited a second stroke which threw him on his knees: the third laid him on the floor at the foot of St. Bennet's altar. The upper part of his skull was broken in pieces: and Hugh of Horsea placing his foot on the archbishop's neck, with the point of his sword drew out the brains, and strewed them over the pavement."

This was the tragical end of Thomas a Becket, a prelate of the most lofty, intrepid, and inflexible spirit, who was able to cover to the world, and probably to himself, the enterprises of pride and ambition, under the disguise of sanctity, and of zeal for the interests of religion: an extraordinary personage, surely, had he been allowed to remain in his first station, and had directed the vehemence of his character to the support of law and justice; instead of being engaged, by the prejudices of the times, to sacrifice all private duties and public connexions to ties which he imagined or represented as superior to every civil and political consideration. But no man who enters into the genius of that age can reasonably doubt of this prelate's sincerity. The spirit of superstition was so prevalent, that it infallibly caught every careless reasoner, much more every one whose interest, and honour, and ambition, were engaged to support it. All the wretched literature of the times was enlisted on that side: some faint glimmerings of common sense might sometimes pierce through the thick cloud of ignorance, or, what was worse, the illusions of perverted science, which had blotted out the sun, and enveloped the face of nature: but those who preserved themselves untainted by the general contagion, proceeded on no principles which they could pretend to justify: they were more indebted to their total want of instruction, than to their knowledge, if they still retained some share of understanding: folly was possessed of all the schools, as well as all the churches; and her votaries assumed the garb of philosophers, together with the ensigns of spiritual dignities. Throughout that large collection of letters which bears the name of St. Thomas, we find, in all the retainers of that aspiring prelate, no less than in himself, a most entire and absolute conviction of the reason and piety of their own party, and a disdain of their antagonists: nor is there less cant and grimace in their style, when they address each other, than when they compose manifestos for the perusal of the public. The spirit of revenge, violence, and ambition, which accompanied their conduct, instead of forming a presumption of hypocrisy, are the surest pledges of their sincere attachment to a cause which so much flattered these domineering passions.

Henry, on the first report of Becket's violent measures, had purposed to have him arrested, and had already taken some steps towards the execution of that design: but the intelligence of his murder threw the prince into great consternation; and he was immediately sensible of the dangerous consequences which he had reason to apprehend from so unexpected an event. An archbishop of reputed sanctity assassinated before the altar, in the exercise of his functions, and on account of his zeal in maintaining ecclesiastical privileges, must attain the highest honours of martyrdom; while his murderer would be ranked among the most bloody tyrants that ever were exposed to the hatred and detestation of mankind. Interdicts and excommunications, weapons in themselves so terrible, would, he foresaw, be armed with double force, when employed in a cause so much calculated to work on the human passions, and so peculiarly adapted to the eloquence of popular preachers and declaimers. In vain would he plead his own innocence, and even his total ignorance of the fact: he was sufficiently guilty, if the church thought proper to esteem him such: and his concurrence in Becket's martyrdom, becoming a religious opinion, would be received with all the implicit credit which belonged to the most established articles of faith. These considerations gave the king the most unaffected concern; and as it was extremely his interest to clear himself from all suspicion, he took no care to conceal the depth of his affliction. He shut himself up from the light of day, and from all commerce with his servants: he even refused, during three days, all food and sustenance: the courtiers, apprehending dangerous effects from his despair, were at last obliged to break in upon his solitude; and they employed every topic of consolation, induced him to accept of nourishment, and occupied his leisure in taking precautions against the consequences which he so justly apprehended from the murder of the primate.

The point of chief importance to Henry was to convince the pope of his innocence; or, rather to persuade him that he would reap greater advantages from the submissions of England, than from proceeding to extremities against that kingdom. The archbishop of Rouen, the bishops of Worcester and Evreux, with five persons of inferior quality, were immediately dispatched to Rome, and orders were given them to perform their journey with the utmost expedition. Though the name and authority of the court of Rome were so terrible in the remote countries of Europe, which were sunk in profound ignorance, and were entirely unacquainted with its character and conduct; the pope was so little revered at home, that his inveterate enemies surrounded the gates of Rome itself, and even controlled his government in that city; and the ambassador who, from a distant extremity of Europe, carried to him the humbler or rather abject submissions of the greatest potentate of the age, found the utmost difficulty to make their way to him, and to throw themselves at his feet. It was at length agreed that Richard Barre, one of their number, should leave the rest behind, and run all the hazards of the passage, in order to prevent the fatal consequences which might ensue from any delay in giving satisfaction to his holiness. He found, on his arrival, that Alexander was already wrought up to the greatest rage against the king, that Becket's partisans were daily stimulating him to revenge, that the king of France had exhorted him to fulminate the most dreadful sentence against England, and that the very mention of Henry's name before the sacred college was received with every expression of horror and execration. The Thursday before Easter was now approaching, when it is customary for the pope to denounce annual curses against all his enemies; and it was expected that Henry should, with all the preparations peculiar to the discharge of that sacred artillery, be solemnly comprehended in the number. But Barre found means to appease the pontiff, and to deter him from a measure which, if it failed of success, could not afterwards be easily recalled: the anathemas were only levelled in general against all the actors, accomplices, and abettors of Becket's murder. The abbot of Valasse, and the archdeacons of Salisbury and Lisieux, with others of Henry's ministers, who soon after arrived, besides asserting that prince's innocence, made oath before the whole consistory, that he would stand to the pope's judgment in the affair, and make every submission that should be required of him. The terrible blow was thus artfully eluded; the cardinals Albert and Theodin were appointed legates to examine the cause, and were ordered to proceed to Normandy for that purpose; and though Henry's foreign dominions were already laid under an interdict by the archbishop of Sens, Becket's great partisan, and the pope's legate in France, the general expectation, that the monarch would easily exculpate himself from any concurrence in the guilt, kept every one in suspense, and prevented all the bad consequences which might be dreaded from that sentence.

The clergy, meanwhile, though their rage was happily diverted from falling on the king, were not idle in magnifying the sanctity of Becket; in extolling the merits of his martyrdom; and in exalting him above all that devoted tribe who in several ages had, by their blood, cemented the fabric of the temple. Other saints had only borne testimony by their sufferings to the general doctrines of Christianity; but Becket had sacrificed his life to the power and privileges of the clergy; and this peculiar merit challenged, and not in vain, a suitable acknowledgment to his memory. Endless were the panegyrics on his virtues; and the miracles wrought by his reliques were more numerous, more nonsensical, and more impudently attested, than those which ever filled the legend of any confessor or martyr. Two years after his death he was canonized by Pope Alexander; a solemn jubilee was established for celebrating his merits; his body was removed to a magnificent shrine, enriched with presents from all parts of Christendom; pilgrimages were performed to obtain his intercession with Heaven; and it was computed, that in one year above a hundred thousand pilgrims arrived at Canterbury, and paid their devotions at his tomb. It is indeed a mortifying reflection to those who are actuated by the love of fame, so justly denominated the last infirmity of noble minds, that the wisest legislator, and most exalted genius that ever reformed or enlightened the world, can never expect such tributes of praise as are lavished on the memory of pretended saints, whose whole conduct was probably to the last degree odious or contemptible, and whose industry was entirely directed to the pursuit of objects pernicious to mankind. It is only a conqueror, a personage no less entitled to our hatred, who can pretend to the attainment of equal renown and glory.

It may not be amiss to remark, before we conclude the subject of Thomas a Becket, that the king, during his controversy with that prelate, was on every occasion more anxious than usual to express his zeal for religion, and to avoid all appearance of a profane negligence on that head. He gave his consent to the imposition of a tax on all his dominions for the delivery of the Holy Land, now threatened by the famous Saladin: this tax amounted to two-pence a pound for one year, and a penny a pound for the four subsequent. Almost all the princes of Europe laid a like imposition on their subjects, which received the name of Saladin's tax. During this period, there came over from Germany about thirty heretics of both sexes, under the direction of one Gerard; simple ignorant people, who could give no account of their faith, but declared themselves ready to suffer for the tenets of their master. They made only one convert in England, a woman as ignorant as themselves; yet they gave such umbrage to the clergy, that they were delivered over to the secular arm, and were punished, by being burned on the forehead, and then whipped through the streets. They seemed to exult in their sufferings, and as they went along sung the beatitude, "Blessed are ye, when men hate you, and persecute you." After they were whipped, they were thrust out almost naked in the midst of winter, and perished through cold and hunger; no one daring or being willing to give them the least relief. We are ignorant of the particular tenets of these people: for it would be imprudent to rely on the representations left of them by the clergy, who affirmed that they denied the efficacy of the sacraments, and the unity of the church. It is probable that their departure from the standard of orthodoxy was still more subtle and minute. They seem to have been the first that ever suffered for heresy in England.

As soon as Henry found that he was in no immediate danger from the thunders of the Vatican, he undertook an expedition against Ireland; a design which he had long projected, and by which he hoped to recover his credit, somewhat impaired by his late transactions with the hierarchy.

THE following account of Ireland previous to the expedition of Henry is extracted from Lingard:—

“That the ancient inhabitants of Ireland were chiefly of Celtic origin, is evident from the language still spoken by their descendants. Of their manners, policy, and religion, we may safely judge from analogy. There can be no doubt that they lived in the same rude and uncivilized state, in which their neighbours were discovered by the legions of Rome, and the teachers of Christianity. Books indeed have been published, which minutely describe the revolutions of Erin from a period anterior to the deluge: but it is evident that the more early portion of the Irish history of Keating rests on the same baseless authority as the British history of Geoffrey, of bardic fictions, and traditional genealogies. These, perhaps before, but most probably after, the introduction of Christianity, were committed to writing: new embellishments were added by the fancy of copyists and reciters: and a few additional links, the creation of one or two imaginary personages, connected the first settlers in Ireland with the founders of the tower of Babel. Nor were such fables the peculiar growth of the soil of Erin. The Frank and the Norman, the Briton and the Saxon, found no more difficulty than the Irishman in tracing back their progenitors to the ark; and pointing out the very grandson of Noah, from whom each was lineally descended. Hence if there were aught of truth in the traditions of these nations, it soon became so blended with fiction, that at the present day to distinguish one from the other must prove a hopeless as well as useless undertaking.

“Though the gospel had been preached in Ireland at a more early period, the general conversion of the natives had been reserved for the zeal of St. Patrick. This celebrated missionary was born in a village between Dumbarton and Glasgow, which has since assumed the name of Killpatrick. He commenced his labours in the year

432, and after a life of indefatigable exertion, died at an advanced age in 493. His disciples appear to have inherited the spirit of their teacher: churches and monasteries were successively founded: and every species of learning known at the time, was assiduously cultivated. It was the peculiar happiness of these ecclesiastics to escape the visits of the barbarians, who in the fifth and sixth centuries depopulated and dismembered the western empire. When science was almost extinguished on the continent, it still emitted a faint light from the remote shores of Erin: strangers from Britain, Gaul, and Germany, resorted to the Irish schools; and Irish missionaries established monasteries and imparted instruction on the banks of the Danube, and amid the snows of the Apennines. During this period, and under such masters, the natives were gradually reclaimed from ignorance and pursuits of savage life: but their civilization was retarded by the opposite influence of their national institutions: it was finally arrested by the invasions of the Northmen; who from the year 748, during more than two centuries, almost annually visited the island. These savages traversed it in every direction; went through their usual round of plunder, bloodshed, and devastation; and at last occupying the sea-coasts, formed settlements at the mouths of the navigable rivers. The result was the same in Ireland as in Britain and Gaul. Hunted by the invaders into the forests, and compelled to earn a precarious subsistence by stealth and rapine, the natives forgot the duties of religion, lost their relish for the comforts of society, and quickly relapsed into the habits and vices of barbarism.

“The national institutions to which I have just alluded as hostile to the progress of civilization were tanistry and gavelkind. 1. (Tanistry): the inhabitants were divided into numerous septs, each of which obeyed the paternal authority of its canfinny or chief. The canfinnies however seldom enjoyed independence. The weak were compelled to submit to the control of their more powerful neighbours, who assumed the titles of kings; and among the kings themselves there always existed an aid-riagh or chief monarch, who if he did not exercise, at least claimed, the sovereignty over the whole island. The law of tanistry regulated the succession to all these dignities from the highest to the lowest. It carefully excluded the sons from inheriting the authority of their father: and the tanist, the heir apparent, was elected by the suffrages of the sept during the life-time of the ruling chieftain. The eldest of the name and family had indeed the best title to this distinction: but his capacity and deserts were previously submitted to examination; and the charge of crime, or cowardice, or deformity, might be urged as an insuperable objection to his appointment. If the reigning family could not supply a fit person, the new tanist was selected from the next branch in the sept: and thus every individual could flatter himself that in the course of a few generations the chieftainry might fall to the lot of his own posterity. Such a custom, however, could not fail to create intestine quarrels, which instead of waiting the tardy decision of the triennial assembly of the states, were generally terminated by the passions and swords of the parties. The elections were often attended with bloodshed: sometimes the ambition of the tanist refused to wait the natural death of his superior: frequently the son of the deceased chieftain attempted to seize by violence the dignity to which he was forbidden to aspire by the custom of his country. Hence every sept and every kingdom was divided by opposite interests; and the successful candidate, instead of applying to the improvement of his subjects, was compelled to provide for his own security by guarding against the wiles, the treachery, and swords, of his rivals.

"2. Gavelkind is that species of tenure, by which lands descend to all the sons equally, and without any consideration of primogeniture. It prevailed in former ages among all the British tribes; and some relics of it in an improved form remain in England even at the present day. Among the Irish it existed as late as the reign of James I; and still retained the rude features of the original institution. While it excluded all the females, both the widow and the daughters, from the possession of land, it equally admitted all the males without distinction of spurious or legitimate birth. Yet these did not succeed to the individual lands held by their father. At the death of each possessor the landed property of the sept was thrown into one common mass: a new division was made by the equity or caprice of the canfinny, and their respective portions were assigned to the different heads of families in the order of seniority. It is evident that such a tenure must have opposed an insuperable bar to agricultural improvement, and to the influence of agriculture, in multiplying the comforts of civilized life. It could only exist among a people principally addicted to pasturage, and to whom the prospect of migrating to a more favourable situation, made a transient, preferable to a permanent, interest in the soil. Accordingly Davis tells us, that even in his time, the districts, in which gavelkind was still in force, 'seemed to be all one wilderness.'

"When the natives, after a long struggle, assumed the ascendancy over the Danes, the restoration of tranquillity was prevented by the ambition of their princes, who during more than a hundred years, contended for the sovereignty of the island. It was in vain that the pontiffs repeatedly sent or appointed legates to establish the discipline of the canons, and reform the immorality of the nation: that the celebrated St. Malachy added the exertions of his zeal; and that the Irish prelates, in their synods, published laws, and pronounced censures. The efficacy of these measures was checked by the turbulence of the princes and the obstinacy of the people: it was entirely suspended by the subsequent invasion of the English. The state of Ireland has been delineated by Girald, who twice visited the island, once in the company of his brother, a military adventurer, and afterwards as the chaplain or secretary of John, the youngest of Henry's sons. In three books on the topography, and two on the subjugation of Ireland, he has left us the detail of all that he had heard, read, and saw. That the credulity of the Welshman was often deceived by fables, is evident; nor is it improbable that his partiality might occasionally betray him into unfriendly and exaggerated statements; yet the accuracy of his narrative in the more important points is confirmed by the whole tenor of Irish and English history, and by its accordance with the accounts which the abbot of Clairvaux had received from St. Malachy and his disciples. The ancient division of the island into five provinces or kingdoms,* was still retained; but the nominal sovereignty over the whole, which for several generations had been possessed by the O'Neils, had of late been assumed by different chieftains, and was now claimed by the O'Connors, kings of Connaught. The sea-ports, inhabited chiefly by the descendants of the Ostmen, were places of some trade. Dublin is styled the rival of London; and the wines of Languedoc were imported in exchange for hides. But the majority of the natives shunned the towns, and lived in huts in the country. They preferred pasturage to agriculture. Restraint and labour were deemed by them the worst of evils: liberty and indolence the most desirable of blessings. The children owed little to the care of their parents; but shaped by the hand of nature, they acquired, as they grew up, elegant forms, which, aided by a lofty stature and florid complexion, excited the admiration of the invaders. Their clothing was scanty, fashioned after a manner, which to the eye of Girald, appeared barbarous, and spun from the wool of their sheep, sometimes dyed, but generally in its natural state. In battle they measured the valour of the combatants by their contempt for artificial assistance; and when they beheld the English knights covered with iron, hesitated not to pronounce them devoid of real courage. Their own arms were a short lance, or two javelins, with a hatchet of steel, called a 'sparthe.' This the invaders found to be a most formidable weapon. It was wielded with one hand, but with such address and impetuosity, as generally to penetrate the best-tempered armour. To bear it was the distinction of freemen; and as it was always in the hand, it was frequently made the instrument of revenge. They constructed their houses of timber and wicker work with an ingenuity which extorted the praise of the English. Their churches were generally built of the same materials; and when Archbishop Malachy began to build one of stone, the very attempt excited an insurrection of the people, who reproached him with abandoning the customs of his country, and introducing those of Gaul. In temper the natives are described as irascible and inconstant, warmly attached to their friends, faithless and vindictive to their enemies. Music was the acquirement in which they principally sought to excel; and the Welshman, with all his partiality for his own country, has the honesty to assign to the Irish the superiority on the harp." To which may be added (what Lingard himself confirms in a subsequent note), that they were unboundedly licentious, and far removed from the habits and decencies of civilized life.

The ambition of Henry had, very early in his reign, been moved by the intestine dissensions of Ireland, to attempt its subjection; and a pretence was only wanting to invade a people who, being always confined to their own island, had never given any reason of complaint to any of their neighbours. For this purpose, he had recourse to Rome, which assumed a right to dispose of kingdoms and empires; and not foreseeing the dangerous disputes, which he was one day to maintain with that see, he helped, for the present, or rather for an imaginary convenience, to give sanction to claims which were now become dangerous to all sovereigns. Adrian III., who then filled the papal chair, was by birth an Englishman; and being on that account more disposed to oblige Henry, he was easily persuaded to act as master of the world, and to make without any hazard or expense, the acquisition of a great island to his spiritual jurisdiction. The Irish had, by precedent missions from the Britons, been imperfectly converted to Christianity; and, what the pope regarded as the surest mark of their imperfect conversion, they followed the doctrines of their first teachers, and had never acknowledged any subjection to the see of Rome. Adrian, therefore, in the year 1156, issued a bull in favour of Henry; in which, after premising that this prince had ever shown an anxious care to enlarge the church of God on earth, and to increase the number of his saints and elect in heaven; he represents his design of subduing Ireland as derived from the same pious motives: he considers his care of previously applying for the apostolic sanction as a sure earnest of success and victory; and having established it as a point incontestable, that all Christian kingdoms belong to the patrimony of St. Peter, he acknowledges it to be his own duty to sow among them the seeds of the gospel, which might in the last day fructify to their eternal salvation: he exhorts the king to invade Ireland, in order to extirpate the vice and wickedness of the natives, and oblige them to pay yearly, from every house, a penny to the see of Rome: he gives him entire right and authority over the island, commands all the inhabitants to obey him as their sovereign, and invests with full power all such godly instruments as he should think proper to employ in an enterprise thus calculated for the glory of God and the salvation of the souls of men. Henry, though armed with this authority, did not immediately put his design in execution; but being detained by more interesting business on the continent, waited for a favourable opportunity of invading Ireland.

Dermot Macmorragh, king of Leinster, had, by his licentious tyranny, rendered himself odious to his subjects, who seized with alacrity the first occasion that offered of throwing off the yoke, which was become grievous and oppressive to them. This prince had formed a design on Dovergilda, wife of Ororic prince of Breffny; and taking advantage of her husband's absence, who, being obliged to visit a distant part of his territory, had left his wife secure, as he thought, in an island surrounded by a bog; he suddenly invaded the place and carried off the princess. This exploit, though usual among the Irish, and rather deemed a proof of gallantry and spirit, provoked the resentment of the husband; who, having collected forces, and being strengthened by the alliance of Roderic king of Connaught, invaded the dominions of Dermot, and expelled him his kingdom. The exiled prince had recourse to Henry, who was at this time in Guienne, craved his assistance in restoring to him his sovereignty, and offered, on that event, to hold his kingdom in vassalage under the crown of England. Henry, whose views were already turned towards making acquisitions in Ireland, readily accepted the offer; but being at that time embarrassed by the rebellions of his French subjects, as well as by his disputes with the see of Rome, he declined for the present embarking in the enterprise, and gave Dermot no further assistance than letters patent, by which he empowered all his subjects to aid the Irish prince in the recovery of his dominions.

Dermot, supported by this authority, came to Bristol; and after endeavouring, though for some time in vain, to engage adventurers in the enterprise, he at last formed a treaty with Richard, surnamed Strongbow, earl of Strigul. This nobleman, who was of the illustrious house of Clare, had impaired his fortune by expensive pleasures; and being ready for any desperate undertaking, he promised assistance to Dermot, on condition that he should espouse Eva daughter of that prince, and be declared heir to all his dominions. While Richard was assembling his succours, Dermot went into Wales; and meeting with Robert Fitz-Stephens, constable of Abertivi, and Maurice Fitz-Gerald, he also engaged them in his service, and obtained their promise of invading Ireland. Being now assured of succour, he returned privately to his own state; and lurking in the monastery of Ferneze, which he had founded (for this ruffian was also a founder of monasteries), he prepared everything for the reception of his English allies.

The troops of Fitz-Stephens were first ready. That gentleman landed in Ireland with thirty knights, sixty squires, and three hundred archers; but this small body being brave men, not unacquainted with discipline, and completely armed, a thing almost unknown in Ireland, struck a great terror into the barbarous inhabitants, and seemed to menace them with some signal revolution. The conjunction of Maurice de Pendergast, who, about the same time, brought over ten knights and sixty archers, enabled Fitz-Stephens to attempt the siege of Wexford, a town inhabited by the Danes; and after gaining an advantage, he made himself master of the place. Soon after, Fitzgerald arrived with ten knights, thirty esquires, and a hundred archers; and being joined by the former adventurers, composed a force which nothing in Ireland was able to withstand. Roderic, the chief monarch of the island, was foiled in different actions; the prince of Ossory was obliged to submit, and give hostages for his peaceable behaviour; and Dermot, not content with being restored to his kingdom of Leinster, projected the dethroning of Roderic, and aspired to the sole dominion over the Irish.

In prosecution of these views, he sent over a messenger to the earl of Strigul, challenging the performance of his promise, and displaying the mighty advantages which might now be reaped, by a reinforcement of warlike troops from England. Richard, not satisfied with the general allowance given by Henry to all his subjects, went to that prince, then in Normandy; and having obtained a cold or ambiguous permission, prepared himself for the execution of his designs. He first sent over Raymond, one of his retinue, with ten knights and seventy archers, who, landing near Waterford, defeated a body of three thousand Irish that had ventured to attack him; and as Richard himself, who brought over two hundred horse, and a body of archers, joined, a few days after, the victorious English, they made themselves masters of Waterford, and proceeded to Dublin, which was taken by assault. Roderic, in revenge, cut off the head of Dermot's natural son, who had been left as a hostage in his hands; and Richard, marrying Eva, became soon after, by the death of Dermot, master of the kingdom of Leinster, and prepared to extend his authority over all Ireland. Roderic and the other Irish princes were alarmed at the danger; and com-binning together, besieged Dublin with an army of thirty thousand men: but Earl Richard, making a sudden sally at the head of ninety knights, with their followers, put this numerous army to the rout, chased them off the field, and pursued them with great slaughter. None in Ireland now dared to oppose themselves to the English.

Henry, jealous of the progress made by his own subjects, sent orders to recall all the English, and he made preparations to attack Ireland in person: but Richard and the other adventurers found means to appease him, by making him the most humble submissions, and offering to hold all their acquisitions in vassalage to his crown. That monarch landed in Ireland at the head of five hundred knights, besides other soldiers: he found the Irish so dispirited by their late misfortunes, that, in a progress which he made through the island, he had no other occupation than to receive the homage of his new subjects. He left most of the Irish chieftains or princes in possession of their ancient territories; bestowed some land on the English adventurers; gave Earl Richard the commission of seneschal of Ireland; and after a stay for a few months, returned in triumph to England. By these trivial exploits, scarcely worth relating, except for the importance of the consequences, was Ireland annexed to the English crown.

The low state of commerce and industry during those ages, made it impracticable for princes to support regular armies, which might retain a conquered country in subjection; and the extreme barbarism and poverty of Ireland could still less afford means of bearing the expense. The only expedient by which a durable conquest could then be made or maintained, was by pouring in a multitude of new inhabitants, dividing among them the lands of the vanquished, establishing them in all offices of trust and authority, and thereby transforming the ancient inhabitants into a new people. By this policy, the northern invaders of old, and of late the duke of Normandy, had been able to fix their dominion, and to erect kingdoms, which remained stable on their foundations, and were transmitted to the posterity of the first conquerors. But the state of Ireland rendered that island so little inviting to the English, that only a few of desperate fortunes could be persuaded, from time to time, to transport themselves thither; and instead of reclaiming the natives from their uncultivated manners, they were gradually assimilated to the ancient inhabitants, and degenerated from the customs of their own nation. It was also found requisite to bestow great military and arbitrary powers on the leaders, who commanded a handful of men amidst such hostile multitudes; and law and equity, in a little time, became as much unknown in the English settlements, as they had ever been among the Irish tribes. Palatines were erected in favour of the new adventurers; independent authority conferred; the natives, never fully subdued, still retained their animosity against the conquerors; their hatred was retaliated by like injuries; and from these causes, the Irish, during the course of four centuries, remained still savage and untractable: it was not till the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, that the island was fully subdued; nor till that of her successor, that it gave hopes of becoming a useful conquest to the English nation. How far these expectations have ever been realized, may be judged of by the present wretched state of that ill-governed and injured country. For centuries brute force has been expended in endeavouring to crush the native spirit, which, like that of all generous barbarians, has only been strengthened by such a savage and stupid policy.

Besides that the apparent submission of the Irish left Henry no further occupation in that island, he was recalled from it by another incident, which was of the last importance to his interest and safety. The two legates, Albert and Theodin, to whom was committed the trial of his conduct in the murder of Archbishop Becket, were arrived in Normandy; and being impatient of delay, sent him frequent letters, full of menaces, if he protracted any longer making his appearance before them. He hastened therefore to Normandy, and had a conference with them at Savigny, where their demands were so exorbitant, that he broke off the negotiation, threatened to return to Ireland, and bade them do their worst against him. They perceived that the season was now past for taking advantage of that tragical incident; which, had it been hotly pursued by interdicts and excommunications, was capable of throwing the whole kingdom into combustion. But the time which Henry had happily gained had contributed to appease the minds of men: the event could not now have the same influence as when it was recent; and as the clergy every day looked for an accommodation with the king, they had not opposed the pretensions of his partisans, who had been very industrious in representing to the people his entire innocence in the murder of the primate, and his ignorance of the designs formed by the assassins. The legates, therefore, found themselves obliged to lower their terms; and Henry was so fortunate as to conclude an accommodation with them. He declared upon oath, before the relics of the saints, that so far from commanding or desiring the death of the archbishop, he was extremely grieved when he received intelligence of it: but as the passion which he had expressed on account of that prelate's conduct, had probably been the occasion of his murder, he stipulated the following conditions, as an atonement for the offence: he promised, that he should pardon all such as had been banished for adhering to Becket, and should restore them to their livings; that the see of Canterbury should be reinstated in all its ancient possessions; that he should pay the templars a sum of money sufficient for the subsistence of two hundred knights during a year in the Holy Land; that he should himself take the cross at the Christmas following, and, if the pope required it, serve three years against the infidels, either in Spain or Palestine; that he should not insist on the observance of such customs, derogatory to ecclesiastical privileges, as had been introduced in his own time; and that he should not obstruct appeals to the pope in ecclesiastical causes, but should content himself with exacting sufficient security from such clergymen as left his dominions to prosecute an appeal; that they should attempt nothing against the rights of his crown. Upon signing these concessions, Henry received absolution from the legates, and was confirmed in the grant of Ireland made by Pope Adrian; and nothing proves more strongly the great abilities of this monarch, than his extricating himself, on such easy terms, from so difficult a situation. He had always insisted, that the laws established at Clarendon contained not any new claims, but the ancient customs of the kingdom; and he was still at liberty, notwithstanding the articles of this agreement, to maintain his pretensions. Appeals to the pope were indeed permitted by that treaty; but as the king was also permitted to exact reasonable securities from the parties, and might stretch his demands on this head as far as he pleased, he had it virtually in his power to prevent the pope from reaping any advantage by this seeming concession. And on the whole, the constitutions of Clarendon remained still the law of the realm; though the pope and his legates seem so little to have conceived the king's power to lie under any legal limitations, that they were satisfied with his departing, by treaty, from one of the most momentous articles of these constitutions, without requiring any repeal by the states of the kingdom.

Henry, freed from this dangerous controversy with the ecclesiastics and with the see of Rome, seemed now to have reached the pinnacle of human grandeur and felicity, and to be equally happy in his domestic situation and in his political government. A numerous progeny of sons and daughters gave both lustre and authority to his crown, prevented the dangers of a disputed succession, and repressed all pretensions of the ambitious barons. The king's precaution also, in establishing the several branches of his family, seemed well calculated to prevent all jealousy among the brothers, and to perpetuate the greatness of his family. He had appointed Henry, his eldest son, to be his successor in the kingdom of England, the duchy of Normandy, and the counties of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine; territories which lay contiguous, and which, by that means, might easily lend to each other mutual assistance both against intestine commotions and foreign invasions. Richard, his second son, was invested in the duchy of Guienne and county of Poitou; Geoffrey, his third son, inherited in right of his wife, the duchy of Brittany; and the new conquest of Ireland was destined for the appanage of John, his fourth son. He had also negotiated, in favour of this last prince, a marriage with Adelais, the only daughter of Humbert count of Savoy and Maurienne; and was to receive as her dowry considerable demesnes in Piedmont, Savoy, Bresse, and Dauphiny. But this exaltation of his family excited the jealousy of all his neighbours, who made those very sons, whose fortunes he had so anxiously established, the means of embittering his future life, and disturbing his government.

Young Henry, who was rising to man's estate, began to display his character, and aspire to independence: brave, ambitious, liberal, munificent, affable; he discovered qualities which give great lustre to youth; prognosticate a shining fortune; but, unless tempered in mature age with discretion, are the forerunners of the greatest calamities. It is said, that at the time when this prince received the royal unction, his father, in order to give greater dignity to the ceremony, officiated at table as one of the retinue; and observed to his son, that never king was more royally served. "It is nothing extraordinary," said young Henry to one of his courtiers, "if the son of a count should serve the son of a king." This saying, which might pass only for an innocent pleasantry, or even for an oblique compliment to his father, was however regarded as a symptom of his aspiring temper; and his conduct soon after justified the conjecture.

Henry, agreeably to the promise which he had given both to the pope and French king, permitted his son to be crowned anew by the hands of the archbishop of Rouen, and associated the princess Margaret, wife to young Henry, in the ceremony.* He afterwards allowed him to pay a visit to his father-in-law at Paris, who took the opportunity of instilling into the young prince those ambitious sentiments to which he was naturally but too much inclined. Though it had been the constant practice of France, ever since the accession of the Capetian line, to crown the son during the lifetime of the father, without conferring on him any present participation of royalty, Lewis persuaded his son-in-law, that, by this ceremony, which in those ages was deemed so important, he had acquired a title to sovereignty, and that the king could not, without injustice, exclude him from immediate possession of the whole, or at least a part, of his dominions. In consequence of these extravagant ideas, young Henry, on his return, desired the king to resign to him either the crown of England, or the duchy of Normandy; discovered great discontent on the refusal; spake in the most undutiful terms of his father; and soon after, in concert with Lewis, made his escape to Paris, where he was protected and supported by that monarch.

While Henry was alarmed at this accident, and had the prospect of dangerous intrigues, or even of a war, which, whether successful or not, must be extremely calamitous and disagreeable to him, he received intelligence of new misfortunes, which must have affected him in the most sensible manner. Queen Eleanor, who had disgusted her first husband, by her gallantries, was no less offensive to her second by her jealousy; and after this manner carried to extremity, in the different periods of her life, every circumstance of female weakness. She communicated her discontents against Henry to her two younger sons, Geoffrey and Richard; persuaded them that they were also entitled to present possession of the territories assigned to them; engaged them to fly secretly to the court of France; and was meditating herself an escape to the same court, and had even put on man's apparel for that purpose; when she was seized by orders from her husband, and thrown into confinement. Thus Europe saw with astonishment the best and most indulgent of parents at war with his whole family; three boys, scarcely arrived at the age of puberty, require a great monarch, in the full vigour of his age and height of his reputation, to dethrone himself in their favour; and several princes not ashamed to support them in these unnatural and absurd pretensions.

Henry, reduced to this perilous and disagreeable situation, had recourse to the court of Rome: though sensible of the danger attending the interposition of ecclesiastical authority in temporal disputes, he applied to the pope, as his superior lord, to excommunicate his enemies, and by these censures to reduce to obedience his undutiful children, whom he found such reluctance to punish by the sword of the magistrate. Alexander, well pleased to exert his power in so justifiable a cause, issued the bulls required of him: but it was soon found, that these spiritual weapons had not the same force as when employed in a spiritual controversy; and that the clergy were very negligent in supporting a sentence, which was nowise calculated to promote the immediate interests of their order. The king, after taking in vain this humiliating step, was obliged to have recourse to arms, and to enlist such auxiliaries, as are the usual resource of tyrants, and have seldom been employed by so wise and just a monarch.

* It appears from Madox's History of the Exchequer, that silk garments were then known in England, and that the coronation robes of the young king and queen cost eighty-seven pounds ten shillings and fourpence, money of that age.

The loose government which prevailed in all the states of Europe, the many private wars carried on among the neighbouring nobles, and the impossibility of enforcing any general execution of the laws, had encouraged a tribe of banditti to disturb every where the public peace, to infest the highways, to pillage the open country, and to brave all the efforts of the civil magistrate, and even the excommunications of the church, which were fulminated against them. Troops of them were sometimes enlisted in the service of one prince or baron, sometimes in that of another: they often acted in an independent manner, under leaders of their own: the peaceable and industrious inhabitants, reduced to poverty by their ravages, were frequently obliged for subsistence, to betake themselves to a like disorderly course of life: and a continual intestine war, pernicious to industry, as well as to the execution of justice, was thus carried on in the bowels of every kingdom. Those desperate ruffians received the name sometimes of Brabançons, sometimes of Routiers or Cotteraux; but for what reason is not agreed by historians: and they formed a kind of society or government among themselves, which set at defiance the rest of mankind. The greatest monarchs were not ashamed, on occasion, to have recourse to their assistance; and as their habits of war and depredation had given them experience, hardiness, and courage, they generally composed the most formidable part of those armies, which decided the political quarrels of princes. Several of them were enlisted among the forces levied by Henry's enemies; but the great treasures amassed by that prince enabled him to engage more numerous troops of them in his service; and the situation of his affairs rendered even such banditti the only forces on whose fidelity he could repose any confidence. His licentious barons, disgusted with a vigilant government, were more desirous of being ruled by young princes, ignorant of public affairs, remiss in their conduct, and profuse in their grants; and as the king had ensured to his sons the succession to every particular province of his dominions, the nobles dreaded no danger in adhering to those who, they knew, must some time become their sovereigns. Prompted by these motives, many of the Norman nobility had deserted to his son Henry; the Breton and Gascon barons seemed equally disposed to embrace the quarrel of Geoffrey and Richard. Disaffection had crept in among the English; and the earls of Leicester and Chester in particular had openly declared against the king. Twenty thousand Brabançons, therefore, joined to some troops which he brought over from Ireland, and a few barons of approved fidelity, formed the sole force with which he intended to resist his enemies.

Lewis, in order to bind the confederates in a closer union, summoned at Paris an assembly of the chief vassals of the crown, received their approbation of his measures, and engaged them by oath to adhere to the cause of young Henry. This prince, in return, bound himself by a like tie never to desert his French allies: and having made a new great seal, he lavishly distributed among them many considerable parts of those territories which he purposed to conquer from his father. The counts of Flanders, Boulogne, Blois, and Eu, partly moved by the general jealousy, arising from Henry's power and ambition, partly allured by the prospect of reaping advantage from the inconsiderate temper and the necessities of the young prince, declared openly in favour of the latter. William king of Scotland had also entered into this great confederacy; and a plan was concerted for a general invasion on different parts of the king's extensive and factious dominions.

Hostilities were first commenced by the counts of Flanders and Boulogne on the frontiers of Normandy. Those princes laid siege to Aumale, which was delivered into their hands by the treachery of the count of that name: this nobleman surrendered himself prisoner; and on pretence of thereby paying his ransom, opened the gates of all his other fortresses. The two counts next besieged and made themselves masters of Drincourt: but the count of Boulogne was here mortally wounded in the assault; and this incident put some stop to the progress of the Flemish arms.

In another quarter, the king of France being strongly assisted by his vassals, assembled a great army of seven thousand knights and their followers on horseback, and a proportionable number of infantry: carrying young Henry along with him, he laid siege to Verneuil, which was vigorously defended by Hugh de Lacy and Hugh de Beauchamp, the governors. After he had lain a month before the place, the garrison, being straitened for provisions, were obliged to capitulate and they engaged, if not relieved within three days, to surrender the town, and to retire into the citadel. On the last of these days, Henry appeared with his army upon the heights above Verneuil. Lewis, dreading an attack, sent the archbishop of Sens and the count of Blois to the English camp, and desired that next day should be appointed for a conference, in order to establish a general peace, and terminate the difference between Henry and his sons. The king, who passionately desired this accommodation, and suspected no fraud, gave his consent; but Lewis, that morning, obliging the garrison to surrender, according to the capitulation, set fire to the place, and began to retire with his army. Henry, provoked at this artifice, attacked the rear with vigour, put them to rout, did some execution, and took several prisoners. The French army, as their time of service was now expired, immediately dispersed themselves into their several provinces, and left Henry free to prosecute his advantages against his other enemies.

The nobles of Britany, instigated by the earl of Chester and Ralph de Fougères, were all in arms; but their progress was checked by a body of Brabançons, which the king, after Lewis's retreat, had sent against them. The two armies came to an action near Dol, where the rebels were defeated, fifteen hundred killed on the spot, and the leaders, the earls of Chester and Fougères, obliged to take shelter in the town of Dol. Henry hastened to form the siege of that place, and carried on the attack with such ardour, that he obliged the governor and garrison to surrender themselves prisoners. By these vigorous measures and happy successes, the insurrections were entirely quelled in Britany; and the king, thus fortunate in all quarters, willingly agreed to a conference with Lewis in hopes that his enemies finding all their mighty efforts entirely frustrated, would terminate hostilities on some moderate and reasonable conditions.

The two monarchs met between Trie and Gisors; and Henry had there the mortification to see his three sons in the retinue of his mortal enemy. As Lewis had no other pretence for war than supporting the claims of the young princes, the king made them such offers as children might be ashamed to insist on, and could be extorted from him by nothing but his parental affection, or by the present necessity of his affairs. He insisted only on retaining the sovereign authority in all his dominions; but offered young Henry half the revenues of England, with some places of surety in that kingdom; or, if he rather chose to reside in Normandy, half the revenues of that duchy, with all those of Anjou. He made a like offer to Richard in Guienne; he promised to resign Britany to Geoffrey; and if these concessions were not deemed sufficient, he agreed to add to them whatever the pope's legates who were present, should require of him. The earl of Leicester was also present at the negotiation; and either from the impetuosity of his temper, or from a view of abruptly breaking off a conference which must cover the allies with confusion, he gave vent to the most violent reproaches against Henry, and he even put his hand to his sword, as if he meant to attempt some violence against him. This furious action threw the whole company into confusion, and put an end to the treaty.

The chief hopes of Henry's enemies seemed now to depend on the state of affairs in England, where his authority was exposed to the most imminent danger. One article of Prince Henry's agreement with his foreign confederates was, that he should resign Kent, with Dover, and all its other fortresses, into the hands of the earl of Flanders: yet so little national or public spirit prevailed among the independent English nobility, so wholly bent were they on the aggrandizement each of himself and his own family, that, notwithstanding this pernicious concession, which must have produced the ruin of the kingdom, the greater part of them had conspired to make an insurrection, and to support the prince's pretensions. The king's principal resource lay in the church and the bishops, with whom he was now in perfect agreement; whether that the decency of their character made them ashamed of supporting so unnatural a rebellion, or that they were entirely satisfied with Henry's atonement for the murder of Becket, and for his former invasion of ecclesiastical immunities. That prince, however, had resigned none of the essential rights of his crown in the accommodation; he maintained still the same prudent jealousy of the court of Rome; admitted no legate into England, without his swearing to attempt nothing against the royal prerogatives; and he had even obliged the monks of Canterbury, who pretended to a free election on the vacancy made by the death of Becket, to choose Roger, prior of Dover, in the place of that turbulent prelate.

The king of Scotland made an irruption into Northumberland, and committed great devastations; but being opposed by Richard de Lucy, whom Henry had left guardian of the realm, he retreated into his own country, and agreed to a cessation of arms. This truce enabled the guardian to march southward with his army, in order to oppose an invasion which the earl of Leicester, at the head of a great body of Flemings, had made upon Suffolk. The Flemings had been joined by Hugh Bigod, who made them masters of his castle of Framlingham; and marching into the heart of the kingdom, where they hoped to be supported by Leicester's vassals, they were met by Lucy, who, assisted by Humphrey Bohun, the constable, and the earls of Arundel, Gloucester, and Cornwall, had advanced to Farnham, with a less numerous, but braver army to oppose them. The Flemings, who were mostly weavers and artificers (for manufactures were now beginning to be established in Flanders), were broken in an instant, ten thousand of them were put to the sword, the earl of Leicester was taken prisoner, and the remains of the invaders were glad to compound for a safe retreat into their own country.

This great defeat did not dishearten the malecontents, who, being supported by the alliance of so many foreign princes, and encouraged by the king's own sons, determined to persevere in their enterprise. The earl of Ferrars, Roger de Mowbray, Archetil de Mallory, Richard de Moreville, Hamo de Mascie, together with many friends of the earls of Leicester and Chester, rose in arms: the fidelity of the earls of Clare and Gloucester was suspected; and the guardian, though vigorously supported by Geoffrey bishop of Lincoln, the king's natural son by the fair Rosamond, found it difficult to defend himself on all quarters, from so many open and concealed enemies. The more to augment the confusion, the king of Scotland, on the expiration of the truce, broke into the northern provinces with a great army of 20,000 men; which, though undisciplined and disorderly, and better fitted for committing devastation than for executing any military enterprise, was become dangerous from the present factious and turbulent spirit of the kingdom. Henry, who had baffled all his enemies in France, and had put his frontiers in a posture of defence, now found England the seat of danger; and he determined by his presence to overawe the malecontents, or by his conduct and courage to subdue them. He landed at Southampton; and knowing the influence of superstition over the minds of the people, he hastened to Canterbury, in order to make atonement to the ashes of Thomas a Becket, and tender his submissions to a dead enemy. As soon as he came within sight of the church of Canterbury, he dismounted, walked barefoot towards it, prostrated himself before the shrine of the saint, remained in fasting and prayer during a whole day, and watched all night the holy relics. Not content with this hypocritical devotion towards a man, whose violence and ingratitude had so long disquieted his government, and had been the object of his most inveterate animosity, he submitted to a penance still more singular and humiliating. He assembled a chapter of the monks, disrobed himself before them, put a scourge of discipline into the hands of each, and presented his bare shoulders to the lashes which these ecclesiastics successively inflicted upon him. Next day he received absolution; and departing for London, got soon after the agreeable intelligence of a great victory which his generals had obtained over the Scots, and which being gained, as was reported, on the very day of his absolution, was regarded as the earnest of his final reconciliation with Heaven and with Thomas a Becket.

William king of Scots, though repulsed before the castle of Prudhoe, and other fortified places, had committed the most horrible depredations upon the northern provinces : but on the approach of Ralph de Glanville, the famous justiciary, seconded by Bernard de Baliol, Robert de Stuteville, Odonel de Umfreville, William de Vesci, and other Norman barons, together with the gallant bishop of Lincoln, he thought proper to retreat nearer his own country, and he fixed his camp at Alnwick. He had here weakened his army extremely, by sending out numerous detachments in order to extend his ravages ; and he lay absolutely safe, as he imagined, from any attack of the enemy. But Glanville, informed of his situation, made a hasty and fatiguing march to Newcastle ; and allowing his soldiers only a small interval for refreshment, he immediately set out towards evening for Alnwick. He marched that night above thirty miles ; arrived in the morning, under cover of a mist, near the Scottish camp ; and regardless of the great numbers of the enemy, he began the attack with his small but determined body of cavalry. William was living in such supine security, that he took the English, at first, for a body of his own ravagers, who were returning to the camp : but the sight of their banners convincing him of his mistake, he entered on the action with no greater body than a hundred horse, in confidence that the numerous army which surrounded him would soon hasten to his relief. He was dismounted on the first shock, and taken prisoner ; while his troops, hearing of this disaster, fled on all sides with the utmost precipitation. The dispersed ravagers made the best of their way to their own country ; and discord arising among them, they proceeded even to mutual hostilities, and suffered more from each other's sword, than from that of the enemy.

This great and important victory proved at last decisive in favour of Henry, and entirely broke the spirit of the English rebels. The bishop of Durham, who was preparing to revolt, made his submissions ; Hugh Bigod, though he had received a strong reinforcement of Flemings, was obliged to surrender all his castles, and throw himself on the king's mercy ; no better resource was left to the earl of Ferrars and Roger de Moubray ; the inferior rebels imitating the example, all England was restored to tranquillity in a few weeks ; and as the king appeared to lie under the immediate protection of Heaven, it was deemed impious any longer to resist him. The clergy exalted anew the merits and powerful intercession of Becket ; and Henry, instead of opposing this superstition, plumed himself on the new friendship of the saint, and propagated an opinion which was so favourable to his interests.

Prince Henry, who was ready to embark at Gravelines, with the earl of Flanders and a great army, hearing that his partisans in England were suppressed, abandoned all thoughts of the enterprise, and joined the camp of Lewis, who, during the absence of the king, had made an irruption into Normandy, and had laid siege to Rouen. The place was defended with great vigour by the inhabitants ; and Lewis, despairing of success by open force, tried to gain the town by a stratagem, which, in that superstitious age, was deemed not very honourable. He proclaimed in his own camp a cessation of arms, on pretence of celebrating the festival of St. Laurence ; and when the citizens, supposing themselves in safety, were so imprudent as to remit their guard, he purposed to take advantage of their security. Happily, some priests had, from mere curiosity, mounted a steeple, where the alarm-bell hung ; and observing the French camp in motion, they immediately rang the bell, and gave warning to the inhabitants, who ran to their several stations. The French, who, on hearing the alarm, hurried to the assault, had already mounted the walls in several places ; but being repulsed by the enraged citizens, were obliged to retreat with considerable loss. Next day Henry, who had hastened to the defence of his Norman dominions, passed over the bridge in triumph, and entered Rouen in sight of the French army. The city was now in absolute safety ; and the king, in order to brave the French monarch, commanded the gates, which had been walled up, to be opened ; and he prepared to push his advantages against the enemy. Lewis saved himself from this perilous situation by a new piece of deceit, not so justifiable. He proposed a conference for adjusting the terms of a general peace, which he knew would be greedily embraced by Henry ; and while the king of England trusted to the execution of his promise, he made a retreat with his army into France.

There was, however, a necessity on both sides for an accommodation. Henry could no longer bear to see his three sons in the hands of his enemy ; and Lewis dreaded, lest this great monarch, victorious in all quarters, crowned with glory, and absolute master of his dominions, might take revenge for the many dangers and disquietudes which the arms, and still more the intrigues, of France, had, in his disputes both with Becket and his sons, found means to raise him. After making a cessation of arms, a conference was agreed on near Tours ; where Henry granted his sons much less advantageous terms than he had formerly offered ; and he received their submissions. The most material of his concessions were some pensions which he stipulated to pay them, and some castles which he granted them for the place of their residence ; together with an indemnity for all their adherents, who were restored to their estates and honours.

Of all those who had embraced the cause of the young prince, William king of Scotland was the only considerable loser by that invidious and unjust enterprise. Henry delivered from confinement, without exacting any ransom, about nine hundred knights whom he had taken prisoners ; but it cost William the ancient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty. He stipulated to do homage to Henry for Scotland and all his other possessions ; he engaged that all the barons and nobility of his kingdom should also do homage ; that the bishops should take an oath of fealty ; that both should swear to adhere to the king of England against their native prince, if the latter should break his engagements ; and that the fortresses of Edinburgh, Sterling, Berwick, Roxborough, and Jedborough, should be delivered into Henry's hands till the performances of articles. This severe and humiliating treaty was executed in its full rigour. William being released, brought up all his barons, prelates, and abbots ; and they did homage to Henry in the cathedral of York, and acknowledged him and his successors for their superior lord. The English monarch stretched still farther the rigour of the conditions which he exacted. He engaged the king and states of Scotland to make a perpe tual cession of the fortresses of Berwick and Roxborough, and to allow the castle of Edinburgh to remain in his hands for a limited time. This was the first great ascendant which England obtained over Scotland; and indeed the first important transaction which had passed between the kingdoms. Few princes have been so fortunate as to gain considerable advantages over their weaker neighbours with less violence and injustice than were practised by Henry against the king of Scots, whom he had taken prisoner in battle, and who had wantonly engaged in a war, in which all the neighbours of that prince, and even his own family were, without provocation, combined against him.*

Henry having thus, contrary to expectation, extricated himself with honour from a situation in which his throne was exposed to great danger, was employed for several years in the administration of justice, in the execution of the laws, and in guarding against those inconveniences, which either the past convulsions of his state, or the political institutions of that age, unavoidably occasioned. The provisions which he made, show such largeness of thought as qualified him for being a legislator; and they were commonly calculated as well for the future as the present happiness of his kingdom.

He enacted severe penalties against robbery, murder, false coining, arson; and ordained that these crimes should be punished by the amputation of the right hand and right foot. The pecuniary commutation for crimes, which has a false appearance of lenity, had been gradually disused; and seems to have been entirely abolished by the rigour of these statutes. The superstitious trial by water ordeal, though condemned by the church, still subsisted; but Henry ordained, that any man accused of murder, or any heinous felony, by the oath of the legal knights of the county, should, even though acquitted by the ordeal, be obliged to abjure the realm.

All advances towards reason and good sense are slow and gradual. Henry, though sensible of the great absurdity attending the trial by duel or battle, did not venture to abolish it: he only admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by an assize or jury of twelve freeholders. This latter method of trial seems to have been very ancient in England, and was fixed by the laws of King Alfred: but the barbarous and violent genius of the age had of late given more credit to the trial by battle, which had become the general method of deciding all important controversies. It was never abolished by law in England; and there is an instance of it so late as the reign of Elizabeth: but the institution revived by this king, being found more reasonable and more suitable to a civilized people, gradually prevailed over it.

The partition of England into four divisions, and the appointment of itinerant justices to go the circuit in each division, and to decide the causes in the counties, was another important ordinance of this prince, which had a direct tendency to curb the oppressive barons, and to protect the inferior gentry and common people in their property. Those justices were either prelates or considerable noblemen; who, besides carrying the authority of the king's commission, were able, by the dignity of their own character, to give weight and credit to the laws.

That there might be fewer obstacles to the execution of justice, the king was vigilant in demolishing all the new-erected castles of the nobility, in England as well as in his foreign dominions; and he permitted no fortress to remain in the custody of those whom he found reason to suspect.

But lest the kingdom should be weakened by this demolition of the fortresses the king fixed an assize of arms, by which all his subjects were obliged to put themselves in a situation for defending themselves and the realm. Every man possessed of a knight's fee was ordained to have for each fee a coat of mail, a helmet, a shield, and a lance; every free layman, possessed of goods to the value of sixteen marks, was to be armed in like manner; every one that possessed ten marks was obliged to have an iron gorget, a cap of iron, and a lance; all burgesses were to have a cap of iron, a lance, and a wambais; that is a coat quilted with wool, tow, or such-like materials. It appears that archery, for which the English were afterwards so renowned, had not at this time become very common among them. The spear was the chief weapon employed in battle.

The clergy and the laity were, during that age, in a strange situation with regard to each other, and such as may seem totally incompatible with a civilized, and indeed with any species of government. If a clergyman were guilty of murder, he could be punished by degradation only: if he were murdered, the murderer was exposed to nothing but excommunication and ecclesiastical censures; and the crime was atoned for by penances and submission. Hence the assassins of Thomas a Becket himself, though guilty of the most atrocious wickedness, and the most repugnant to the sentiments of that age, lived securely in their own houses, without being called to account by Henry himself, who was so much concerned both in honour and interest, to punish that crime, and who professed, or affected on all occasions, the most extreme abhorrence of it. It was not till they found their presence shunned by every one as excommunicated persons, that they were induced to take a journey to Rome, to throw themselves at the feet of the pontiff, and to submit to the penances imposed upon them: after which, they continued to possess, without molestation, their honours and fortunes, and seem even to have recovered the countenance and good opinion of the public. But as the king, by the constitutions of Clarendon, which he endeavoured still to maintain, had subjected the clergy to a trial by the civil magistrate, it seemed but just to give them the protection of that power to which they owed obedience: it was enacted, that the murderers of clergymen should be tried before the justiciary, in the presence of the bishop or his official; and besides the usual punishment for murder, should be subjected to a forfeiture of their estates, and a confiscation of their goods and chattels.

The king passed an equitable law, that the goods of a vassal should not be seized for the debt of his lord, unless the vassal be surety for the debt; and that the rents of vassals should be paid to the creditors of the lord, not to the lord himself. It is remarkable, that this law was enacted by the king in council which he held at Verneuil, and which consisted of some prelates and barons of England, as well as some of Normandy, Poitou, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and Britany; and the statute took place in all these last-mentioned territories,* though totally unconnected with each other:† a certain proof how irregular the ancient feudal government was, and how near the sovereigns, in some instances, approached to despotism, though in others they seemed scarcely to possess any authority. If a prince much dreaded and revered, like Henry, obtained but the appearance of general consent to an ordinance which was equitable and just, it became immediately an established law, and all his subjects acquiesced in it. If the prince was hated or despised; if the nobles who supported him had small influence; if the humours of the times disposed the people to question the justice of his ordinance; the fullest and most authentic assembly had no authority. Thus all was confusion and disorder; no regular idea of a constitution; force and violence decided every thing.

* Some Scotch historians pretend that William paid, besides, 100,000 pounds of ransom, which is quite incredible. The ransom of Richard I. who, besides England, possessed so many rich territories in France, was only 150,000 marks, and yet was levied with great difficulty. Indeed, two-thirds of it only could be paid before his deliverance.

The success which had attended Henry in his wars did not much encourage his neighbours to form any attempt against him; and his transactions with them, during several years, contain little memorable. Scotland remained in that state of feudal subjection to which he had reduced it, and gave him no further inquietude. He sent over his fourth son, John, into Ireland, with a view of making a more complete conquest of the island; but the petulance and incapacity of this prince, by which he enraged the Irish chieftains, obliged the king soon after to recall him. The king of France had fallen into an abject superstition; and was induced, by a devotion more sincere than that of Henry, to make a pilgrimage to the tomb of Becket, in order to obtain his intercession for the cure of Philip, his eldest son. He probably thought himself well entitled to the favour of that saint, on account of their ancient intimacy; and hoped that Becket, whom he had protected while on earth, would not now, when he was so highly exalted in heaven, forget his old friend and benefactor. The monks, sensible that their saint's honour was concerned in the case, failed not to publish that Lewis's prayers were answered, and that the young prince was restored to health by Becket's intercession. That king himself was soon after struck with an apoplexy, which deprived him of his understanding: Philip, though a youth of fifteen, took on him the administration, till his father's death, which happened soon after, opened his way to the throne; and he proved the ablest and greatest monarch that had governed that kingdom since the age of Charlemagne. The superior years, however, and experience of Henry, while they moderated his ambition, gave him such an ascendancy over this prince, that no dangerous rivalry, for a long time, arose between them. The English monarch, instead of taking advantage of his own situation, rather employed his good offices in composing the quarrels which arose in the royal family of France; and he was successful in mediating a reconciliation between Philip and his mother and uncles.

These services were but ill requited by Philip, who, when he came to man's estate, fomented all the domestic discords in the royal family of England, and encouraged Henry's sons in their ungrateful and undutiful behaviour towards him.

Prince Henry, equally impatient of obtaining power, and incapable of using it, renewed to the king the demand of his resigning Normandy; and on meeting with a refusal, he fled with his consort to the court of France; but not finding Philip at that time disposed to enter into war for his sake, he accepted of his father's offers of reconciliation, and made him submissions. It was a cruel circumstance in the king's fortune, that he could hope for no tranquillity from the criminal enterprises of his sons but by their mutual discord and animosities, which disturbed his family, and threw his state into convulsions. Richard, whom he had made master of Guienne, and who had displayed his valour and military genius by suppressing the revolts of his mutinous barons, refused to obey Henry's orders, in doing homage to his elder brother for that duchy; and he defended himself against young Henry and Geoffrey, who, uniting their arms, carried war into his territories. The king, with some difficulty, composed this difference; but immediately found his eldest son engaged in conspiracies, and ready to take arms against himself. While the young prince was conducting these criminal intrigues, he was seized with a fever at Martel, a castle near Turenne, to which he had retired in discontent; and seeing the approaches of death, he was at last struck with remorse for his undutiful behaviour towards his father. He sent a message to the king, who was not far distant; expressed his contrition for his faults; and entreated the favour of a visit, that he might at least die with the satisfaction of having obtained his forgiveness. Henry, who had so often experienced the prince's ingratitude and violence, apprehended that his sickness was entirely feigned, and he durst not intrust himself into his son's hands; but when he soon after received intelligence of young Henry's death, and the proofs of his sincere repentance, this good prince was affected with the deepest sorrow; he thrice fainted away; he accused his own hard-heartedness in refusing the dying request of his son; and he lamented that he had deprived that prince of the last opportunity of making atonement for his offences, and of pouring out his soul in the bosom of his reconciled father. This prince died in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

The behaviour of his surviving children did not tend to give the king any consolation for the loss. As Prince Henry had left no posterity, Richard was become heir to all his dominions, and the king intended that John, his third surviving son and favourite should inherit Guienne as an appanage: but Richard refused his consent, fled into that duchy, and even made preparations for carrying on war, as well against his father as against his brother Geoffrey, who was now put in possession of Britany. Henry sent for Eleanor his queen, the heiress of Guienne, and required Richard to deliver up to her the dominion of these territories; which that prince, either dreading an insurrection of the Gascons in her favour, or retaining some sense of duty towards her, readily performed; and he peaceably returned to his father's court. No sooner was this quarrel accommodated, than Geoffrey, the most vicious perhaps of all Henry's unhappy family, broke out into violence:

* It was usual for the kings of England, after the conquest of Ireland, to summon barons and members of that country to the English parliament.

† Spelman even doubts whether the law were not also extended to England. If it were not, it could only be because Henry did not choose it; for his authority was greater in that kingdom than in his transmarine dominions.

demanding Anjou to be annexed to his dominions of Britany; and on meeting with a refusal, fled to the court of France, and levied forces against his father. Henry was freed from this danger by his son's death, who was killed in a tournament at Paris. The widow of Geoffrey, soon after his decease, was delivered of a son, who received the name of Arthur, and was invested in the duchy of Britany, under the guardianship of his grandfather, who, as duke of Normandy, was also superior lord of that territory. Philip, as lord paramount, disputed some time his title to this wardship; but was obliged to yield to the inclinations of the Bretons, who preferred the government of Henry.

But the rivalry between these potent princes, and all their inferior interest, seemed now to have given place to the general passion for the relief of the Holy Land, and the expulsion of the Saracens. Those infidels, though obliged to yield to the immense inundation of Christians in the first crusade, had recovered courage after the torrent was past; and attacking on all quarters the settlements of the Europeans, had reduced these adventurers to great difficulties, and obliged them to apply again for succours for the West. A second crusade, under the emperor Conrad, and Lewis VII. king of France, in which there perished about 200,000 men, brought them but a temporary relief; and those princes, after losing such immense armies, and seeing the flower of their nobility fall by their side, returned with little honour into Europe. But these repeated misfortunes, which drained the western world of its people and treasure, were not yet sufficient to cure men of their passion for those spiritual adventures; and a new incident rekindled with fresh fury the zeal of the ecclesiastics and military adventurers among the Latin Christians. Saladin, a prince of great generosity, bravery, and conduct, having fixed himself on the throne of Egypt, began to extend his conquests over the East; and finding the settlement of the Christians in Palestine an invincible obstacle to the progress of his arms, he bent the whole force of his policy and valour to subdue that small and barren, but important territory. Taking advantage of dissensions which prevailed among the champions of the cross, and having secretly gained the count of Tripoli, who commanded their armies, he invaded the frontiers with a mighty power; and aided by the treachery of that count, gained over them at Tiberiade a complete victory, which utterly annihilated the force of the already languishing kingdom of Jerusalem. The holy city itself fell into his hands, after a feeble resistance; the kingdom of Antioch was almost entirely subdued; and except some maritime towns, nothing considerable remained of those boasted conquests, which, near a century before, it had cost the efforts of all Europe to acquire.

The western Christians were astonished on receiving this dismal intelligence. Pope Urban III. it is pretended, died of grief; and his successor, Gregory VIII. employed the whole time of his short pontificate in rousing to arms all the Christians who acknowledged his authority. The general cry was, that they were unworthy of enjoying any inheritance in heaven, who did not vindicate from the dominion of the infidels the inheritance of God on earth, and deliver from slavery that country which had been consecrated by the footsteps of their Redeemer. William archbishop of Tyre, having procured a conference between Henry and Philip near Gisors, enforced all these topics; gave a pathetic description of the miserable state of the eastern Christians; and employed every argument to excite the ruling passions of the age, superstition, and jealousy of military honour. The two monarchs immediately took the cross; many of their most considerable vassals imitated the example; and as the Emperor Frederic I. entered into the same confederacy, some well-grounded hopes of success were entertained; and men flattered themselves, that an enterprise which had failed under the conduct of many independent leaders, or of imprudent princes, might at last, by the efforts of such potent and able monarchs, be brought to a happy issue.

The kings of France and England imposed a tax, amounting to the tenth of all moveable goods, on such as remained at home; but as they exempted from this burden most of the regular clergy, the secular aspired to the same immunity; pretended that their duty obliged them to assist the crusade with their prayers alone; and it was with some difficulty they were constrained to desist from an opposition, which in them, who had been the chief promoters of those pious enterprises, appeared with the worst grace imaginable. This backwardness of the clergy is perhaps a symptom, that the enthusiastic ardour which had at first seized the people for crusades, was now by time and ill success considerably abated; and that the frenzy was chiefly supported by the military genius and love of glory in the monarchs.

But before this great machine could be put in motion, there were still many obstacles to surmount. Philip, jealous of Henry's power, entered into a private confederacy with young Richard; and, working on his ambitious and impatient temper, persuaded him, instead of supporting and aggrandizing that monarchy which he was one day to inherit, to seek present power and independence by disturbing and dismembering it. In order to give a pretence for hostilities between the two kings, Richard broke into the territories of Raymond count of Toulouse, who immediately carried complaints of this violence before the king of France as his superior lord. Philip remonstrated with Henry; but received for answer, that Richard had confessed to the archbishop of Dublin, that his enterprise against Raymond had been undertaken by the approbation of Philip himself, and was conducted by his authority. The king of France, who might have been covered with shame and confusion by his detection, still prosecuted his design, and invaded the provinces of Berri and Auvergne, under colour of revenging the quarrel of the count of Toulouse. Henry retaliated, by making inroads upon the frontiers of France, and burning Dreux. As this war, which destroyed all hopes of success in the projected crusade, gave great scandal, the two kings held a conference at the accustomed place between Gisors and Trie, in order to find means of accommodating their differences; they separated on worse terms than before; and Philip, to show his disgust, ordered a great elm, under which the conferences had been usually held, to be cut down; as if he had renounced all desire of accommodation, and was determined to carry the war to extremities against the king of England. But his own vassals refused to serve under him in so invidious a cause; and he was obliged to come anew to a conference with Henry, and to offer terms of peace. These terms were such as entirely opened the eyes of the king of England, and fully convinced him of the perfidy of his son, and his secret alliance with Philip, of which he had before only entertained some suspicion. The king of France required that Richard should be crowned king of England in the lifetime of his father, should be invested in all his transmarine dominions, and should immediately espouse Alice, Philip's sister, to whom he had formerly been affianced, and who had already been conducted into England. Henry had experienced such fatal effects, both from the crowning of his eldest son, and from that prince's alliance with the royal family of France, that he rejected these terms; and Richard, in consequence of his secret agreement with Philip, immediately revolted from him, did homage to the king of France for all the dominions which Henry held of that crown, and received the investitures as if he had already been the lawful possessor. Several historians assert, that Henry himself had become enamoured of young Alice, and mention this as an additional reason for his refusing these conditions: but he had so many other just and equitable motives for his conduct, that it is superfluous to assign a cause, which the great prudence and advanced age of that monarch render somewhat improbable.

Cardinal Albano, the pope's legate, displeased with these increasing obstacles to the crusade, excommunicated Richard, as the chief spring of discord: but the sentence of excommunication, which, when it was properly prepared, and was zealously supported by the clergy, had often great influence in that age, proved entirely ineffectual in the present case. The chief barons of Poitou, Guienne, Normandy, and Anjou, being attached to the young prince, and finding that he had now received the investiture from their superior lord, declared for him, and made inroads into the territories of such as still adhered to the king. Henry, disquieted by the daily revolts of his mutinous subjects, and dreading still worse effects from their turbulent dispositions, had again recourse to papal authority; and engaged the Cardinal Anagni, who had succeeded Albano in the legateship, to threaten Philip with laying an interdict on all his dominions. But Philip, who was a prince of great vigour and capacity, despised the menace, and told Anagni, that it belonged not to the pope to interpose in the temporal disputes of princes, much less between him and his rebellious vassal. He even proceeded so far as to reproach him with partiality, and with receiving bribes from the king of England; while Richard, still more outrageous, offered to draw his sword against the legate, and was hindered by the interposition alone of the company from committing violence upon him.

The king of England was now obliged to defend his dominions by arms, and to engage in a war with France, and with his eldest son, a prince of great valour, on such disadvantageous terms. Ferte-Bernard fell first into the hands of the enemy: Mans was next taken by assault; and Henry, who had thrown himself into that place, escaped with some difficulty: Amboise, Chaumont, and Chateau de Loire, opened their gates on the appearance of Philip and Richard: Tours was menaced; and the king who had retired to Saumur, and had daily instances of the cowardice or infidelity of his governors, expected the most dismal issue to all his enterprises. While he was in this state of despondency, the duke of Burgundy, the earl of Flanders, and the archbishop of Rheims, interposed with their good offices; and the intelligence which he received of the taking of Tours, and which made him fully sensible of the desperate situation of his affairs, so subdued his spirit, that he submitted to all the rigorous terms which were imposed upon him. He agreed, that Richard should marry the Princess Alice; that that prince should receive the homage and oath of fealty of all his subjects both in England and his transmarine dominions; that he himself should pay twenty thousand marks to the king of France as a compensation for the charges of the war; that his own barons should engage to make him observe this treaty by force, and in case of his violating it, should promise to join Philip and Richard against him; and that all his vassals who had entered into confederacy with Richard, should receive an indemnity for the offence.

But the mortification which Henry, who had been accustomed to give the law in most treaties, received from these disadvantageous terms, was the least that he met with on this occasion. When he demanded a list of those barons to whom he was bound to grant a pardon for their connexions with Richard, he was astonished to find at the head of them the name of his second son John; who had always been his favourite, whose interests he had ever anxiously at heart, and who had even on account of his ascendancy over him, often excited the jealousy of Richard. The unhappy father, already overloaded with cares and sorrows, finding his last disappointment in his domestic tenderness, broke out into expressions of the utmost despair, cursed the day in which he received his miserable being, and bestowed on his ungrateful and undutiful children a malediction which he never could be prevailed on to retract. The more his heart was disposed to friendship and affection, the more he resented the barbarous return which his four sons had successively made to his parental care; and this finishing blow, by depriving him of every comfort in life, quite broke his spirit, and threw him into a lingering fever, of which he expired at the castle of Chinon near Saumur. His natural son Geoffrey, who alone had behaved dutifully towards him, attended his corpse to the nunnery of Fontevault; where it lay in state in the abbey-church. Next day Richard, who came to visit the dead body of his father, and who, notwithstanding his criminal conduct, was not wholly destitute of generosity, was struck with horror and remorse at the sight; and as the attendants observed, that at that very instant, blood gushed from the mouth and nostrils of the corpse, he exclaimed, agreeably to a vulgar superstition, that he was his father's murderer; and he expressed a deep sense, though too late, of that undutiful behaviour which had brought his parent to an untimely grave.

Thus died, in the fifty-eighth year of his age, and thirty-fifth of his reign, the greatest prince of his time for wisdom, virtue, and abilities, and the most powerful in extent of dominion of all those that had ever filled the throne of England. His character, in private as well as in public life, is almost without a blemish; and he seems to have possessed every accomplishment, both of body and mind, which makes a man either estimable or amiable. He was of a middle stature, strong and well proportioned; his countenance was lively and engaging; his conversation affable and entertaining; his elocution easy, persuasive, and ever at command. He loved peace, but possessed both bravery and conduct in war; was provident without timidity; severe in the execution of justice without rigour; and temperate without austerity. He preserved health, and kept himself from corpulency, to which he was somewhat inclined, by an abstemious diet, and by frequent exercise, particularly hunting. When he could enjoy leisure, he recreated himself either in learned conversation or in reading; and he cultivated his natural talents by study, above any prince of his time. His affections, as well as his enmities, were warm and durable; and his long experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of men never destroyed the natural sensibility of his temper, which disposed him to friendship and society. His character has been transmitted to us by several writers who were his contemporaries; and it extremely resembles, in its most remarkable features, that of his maternal grandfather Henry I.: excepting only, that ambition, which was a ruling passion in both, found not in the first Henry such unexceptionable means of exerting itself, and pushed that prince into measures which were both criminal in themselves, and were the cause of further crimes, from which his grandson's conduct was happily exempted.

His character is somewhat less favourably drawn by Lingard, but it must be remembered he has drawn his information more largely from the statements of ecclesiastics, than Hume. He says, "The stature of Henry was moderate, his countenance majestic, and his complexion florid; but his person was disfigured by an unseemly protuberance of the abdomen, which he sought to contract by the united aid of exercise and sobriety. Few persons have equalled him in abstemiousness, none perhaps in activity. He was perpetually in motion on foot or on horseback. Every moment which could be spared from more important concerns, he devoted to hunting; but no fatigue could subdue his restlessness: after the chase he would snatch a hasty repast, and then rising from table, in spite of the murmurs of his attendants, keep them walking or standing till bed-time. During his education in the castle of Gloucester he had acquired a knowledge of letters; and after his accession delighted in the conversation of the learned. Such was the power of his memory, that he is said to have retained whatever he had heard or read, and to have recognised at the first glance every person whom he had previously seen. He was eloquent, affable, facetious, uniting with the dignity of the prince the manners of a gentleman; but under this fascinating outside was concealed a heart that could descend to the basest artifices, and sport with its own honour and veracity. No one would believe his assertions or trust his promises; yet he justified this habit of duplicity by the maxim, that it is better to repent of words than of facts; to be guilty of falsehood than to fail in a favourite pursuit. Though possessed of ample dominions, and desirous of extending them, he never obtained the laurels of a conqueror. His ambition was checked by his caution. Even in the full tide of prosperity he would stop to calculate the chances against him, and frequently plunged himself into real, to avoid imaginary evils. Hence the characteristic feature of his policy was delay: a hasty decision could not be recalled; but he persuaded himself that procrastination would allow him to improve every advantage which accident might offer. In his own dominions he wished, says a contemporary, to concentrate all power within his own person. He was jealous of every species of authority which did not emanate from himself, and which was not subservient to his will. His pride delighted in confounding the most haughty of his nobles, and depressing the most powerful families. He abridged their rights, divided their possessions, and married their heiresses to men of inferior rank. He was careful that his favourites should owe every thing to himself, and gloried in the parade of their power and opulence, because they were of his own creation. But if he was a bountiful master, he was a most vindictive enemy. His temper could not brook contradiction. Whoever hesitated to obey his will or presumed to thwart his desires, was marked out for his victim, and was pursued with the most unrelenting vengeance. His passion was the raving of a madman, the fury of a savage beast. In its paroxysms his eyes were spotted with blood, his countenance seemed of flame, his tongue poured a torrent of abuse and imprecations, and his hands were employed to inflict vengeance on whatever came within his reach. On one occasion Humet, a favourite minister, had ventured to offer a plea, in justification of the king of Scots. Henry's anger was instantly kindled. He called Humet a traitor, threw down his cap, ungirt his sword, tore off his clothes, pulled the silk coverlet from his couch, and unable to do more mischief sat down, and gnawed the straw on the floor. Hence the reader will perceive that pride and passion, caution and duplicity, formed the distinguishing traits in his character." So concludes Dr. Lingard; but the unprejudiced reader will not fail to remember, the times in which he lived, the liberality and even generosity he frequently displayed, or the ability by which he subdued an ambitious clergy and a turbulent aristocracy into some submission into reason and justice.

This prince, like most of his predecessors of the Norman line, except Stephen, passed more of his time on the continent than in this island: he was surrounded with the English gentry and nobility, when abroad: the French gentry and nobility attending him when he resided in England: both nations acted in the government, as if they were the same people; and, on many occasions, the legislatures seem not to have been distinguished. As the king and all the English barons were of French extraction, the manners of that people acquired the ascendancy, and were regarded as the models of imitation. All foreign improvements, therefore, such as they were, in literature and politeness, in laws and arts, seem now to have been, in a good measure, transplanted into England; and that kingdom was become little inferior in all the fashionable accomplishments, to any of its neighbours on the continent. The more homely but more sensible manners and principles of the Saxons, were exchanged for the affectations of chivalry, and the subtilties of school philosophy: the feudal ideas of civil government, the Romish sentiments in religion, had taken entire possession of the people: by the former, the sense of submission towards princes was somewhat diminished in the barons by the latter, the devoted attachment to papal authority was much augmented among the clergy. The Norman and other foreign families established in England, had now struck deep root; and being entirely incorporated with the people, whom at first they oppressed and despised, they no longer thought that they needed the protection of the crown for the enjoyment of their possessions, or considered their tenure as precarious. They aspired to the same liberty and independence which they saw enjoyed by their brethren on the continent, and desired to restrain those exorbitant prerogatives and arbitrary practices, which the necessities of war, and the violence of conquest, had at first obliged them to indulge in their monarch. That memory also of a more equal government under the Saxon princes, which remained with the English, diffused still further the spirit of liberty, and made the barons both desirous of more independence to themselves, and willing to indulge it to the people. And it was not long ere this secret revolution in the sentiments of men produced first violent convulsions in the state, then an evident alteration in the maxims of government.

The history of all the preceding kings of England since the conquest, gives evident proofs of the disorders attending the feudal institutions; the licentiousness of the barons, their spirit of rebellion against the prince and laws, and of animosity against each other: the conduct of the barons in the transmarine dominions of those monarchs, afforded perhaps still more flagrant instances of these convulsions; and the history of France, during several ages, consists almost entirely of narrations of this nature. The cities, during the continuance of this violent government, could neither be very numerous nor populous; and there occur instances which seem to evince, that, though these are always the first seat of law and liberty, their police was in general loose and irregular, and exposed to the same disorders with those by which the country was generally infested. It was a custom in London for great numbers, to the amount of a hundred or more, of the sons and relations of considerable citizens, to form themselves into a licentious confederacy, to break into rich houses and plunder them, to rob and murder the passengers, and to commit with impunity all sorts of disorder. By these crimes, it had become so dangerous to walk the streets by night, that the citizens durst no more venture abroad after sun-set, than if they had been exposed to the incursions of a public enemy. The brother of the earl of Ferrars had been murdered by some of those nocturnal rioters; and the death of so eminent a person, which was much more regarded than that of many thousands of an inferior station, so provoked the king, that he swore vengeance against the criminals, and became thenceforth more rigorous in the execution of the laws.

There is another instance given by historians, which proves to what a height such riots had proceeded, and how open these criminals were in committing their robberies. A band of them had attacked the house of a rich citizen, with an intention of plundering it; had broken through a stone wall with hammers and wedges; and had already entered the house sword in hand; when the citizen, armed cap-a-pie, and supported by his faithful servants, appeared in the passage to oppose them: he cut off the right hand of the first robber that entered; and made such stout resistance, that his neighbours had leisure to assemble, and come to his relief. The man who lost his hand was taken; and was tempted by the promise of pardon to reveal his confederates; among whom was one John Senex, esteemed among the richest and best-born citizens in London. He was convicted by the ordeal; and though he offered five hundred marks for his life, the king refused the money, and ordered him to be hanged. It appears from a statute of Edward I., that these disorders were not remedied even in that reign. It was then made penal to go out at night after the hour of the curfew, to carry a weapon, or to walk without a light or lantern. It is said in the preamble to this law, that, both by night and day, there were continual frays in the streets of London.

Henry's care in administering justice had gained him so great a reputation, that even foreign and distant princes made him arbiter, and submitted their differences to his judgment. Sanchez king of Navarre, having some controversies with Alfonso king of Castile, was contented, though Alfonso had married the daughter of Henry, to choose this prince for a referee; and they agreed, each of them to consign three castles into neutral hands, as a pledge of their not departing from his award. Henry made the cause be examined before his great council, and gave a sentence, which was submitted to by both parties. These two Spanish kings sent each a stout champion to the court of England, in order to defend his cause by arms, in case the way of duel had been chosen by Henry.

Henry so far abolished the barbarous and absurd practice of confiscating ships which had been wrecked on the coast, that he ordained, if one man or animal were alive in the ship, that the vessel and goods should be restored to the owners.

The reign of Henry was remarkable also for an innovation which was afterwards carried further by his successors, and was attended with the most important consequences. This prince was disgusted with the species of military force which was established by the feudal institutions, and which, though it was extremely burdensome to the subject, yet rendered very little service to the sovereign. The barons, or military tenants, came late into the field; they were obliged to serve only forty days; they were unskilful and disorderly in all their operations; and they were apt to carry into the camp the same refractory and independent spirit, to which they were accustomed in their civil government. Henry, therefore, introduced the practice of making a commutation of their military service for money; and he levied scutages from his baronies and knights fees, instead of requiring the personal attendance of his vassals. There is mention made in the history of the exchequer, of these scutages in his second, fifth, and eighteenth year; and other writers give us an account of three more of them. When the prince had thus obtained money, he made a contract with some of those adventurers in which Europe at that time abounded: they found him soldiers of the same character with themselves, who were bound to serve for a stipulated time: the armies were less numerous, but more useful, than when composed of all the military vassals of the crown: the feudal institutions began to relax: the kings became rapacious for money, on which all their power depended: the barons, seeing no end of exactions, sought to defend their property: and as the same causes had nearly the same effects in the different countries of Europe, the several crowns either lost or acquired authority, according to their different success in the contest.

This prince was also the first that levied a tax on the moveables or personal estates of his subjects, nobles as well as commons. Their zeal for the holy wars made them submit to this innovation; and a precedent being once obtained, this taxation became, in following reigns, the usual method of supplying the necessities of the crown. The tax of Danegelt, so generally odious to the nation, was remitted in this reign.

It was a usual practice of the kings of England to repeat the ceremony of their coronation thrice every year, on assembling the states at the three great festivals. Henry, after the first year of his reign, never renewed this ceremony, which was found to be very expensive and very useless. None of his successors revived it. It is considered as a great act of grace in this prince, that he mitigated the rigour of the forest laws, and punished any transgressions of them, not capitally, but by fines, imprisonments, and other more moderate penalties.

Since we are here collecting some detached incidents, which show the genius of the age, and which could not so well enter into the body of our history, it may not be improper to mention the quarrel between Roger archbishop of York, and Richard archbishop of Canterbury. We may judge of the violence of military men and laymen, when ecclesiastics could proceed to such extremities. Cardinal Haguezun being sent, in 1176, as legate into Britain, summoned an assembly of the clergy at London; and as both the archbishops pretended to sit on his right hand, this question of precedency begat a controversy between them. The monks and retainers of Archbishop Richard fell upon Roger, in the presence of the cardinal and of the synod, threw him to the ground, trampled him under foot, and so bruised him with blows, that he was taken up half dead, and his life was, with difficulty, saved from their violence. The archbishop of Canterbury was obliged to pay a large sum of money to the legate, in order to suppress all complaints with regard to this enormity.

We are told by Giraldus Cambrensis, that the monks and prior of St. Swithin threw themselves, one day, prostrate on the ground and in the mire before Henry, complaining with many tears and much doleful lamentation, that the bishop of Winchester, who was also their abbot, had cut off three dishes from their table. How many has he left you? said the king. Ten only, replied the disconsolate monks. I myself, exclaimed the king, never have more than three; and I enjoin your bishop to reduce you to the same number.

This king left only two legitimate sons, Richard who succeeded him, and John who inherited no territory, though his father had often intended to leave him a part of his extensive dominions. He was thence commonly denominated Lackland. Henry left three legitimate daughters; Maud, born in 1156, and married to Henry duke of Saxony; Eleanor, born in 1162, and married to Alfonso king of Castile; Joan, born in 1165, and married to William king of Sicily.

Henry is said by ancient historians to have been of a very amorous disposition: they mention two of his natural sons by Rosamond, daughter of Lord Clifford, namely, Richard Longespée, or Long-sword (so called from the sword he usually wore), who was afterwards married to Ela, the daughter and heir of the earl of Salisbury; and Geoffrey, first bishop of Lincoln, then archbishop of York. All the other circumstances of the story, commonly told of that lady, seem to be fabulous.

THE compunction of Richard for his undutiful behaviour towards his father was durable, and influenced him in the choice of his ministers and servants after his accession. Those who had seconded and favoured his rebellion, instead of meeting with that trust and honour which they expected, were surprised to find that they lay under disgrace with the new king, and were on all occasions hated and despised by him. The faithful ministers of Henry, who had vigorously opposed all the enterprises of his sons, were received with open arms, and were continued in those offices which they had honourably discharged to their former master. This prudent conduct might be the result of reflection; but in a prince, like Richard, so much guided by passion, and so little by policy, it was commonly ascribed to a principle still more virtuous and more honourable.

Richard, that he might make atonement to one parent for his breach of duty to the other, immediately sent orders for releasing the queen-dowager from the confinement in which she had long been detained; and he intrusted her with the government of England till his arrival in that kingdom. His bounty to his brother John was rather profuse and imprudent. Besides bestowing on him the county of Mortaigne in Normandy, granting him a pension, of four thousand marks a-year, and marrying him to Avisa the daughter of the earl of Gloucester, by whom he inherited all the possessions of that opulent family, he increased his appenage, which the late king had destined him, by other extensive grants and concessions. He conferred on him the whole estate of William Peverell, which had escheated to the crown: he put him in possession of eight castles, with all the forests and honours annexed to them: he delivered over to him no less than six earldoms, Cornwall, Devon, Somerset, Nottingham, Dorset, Lancaster, and Derby: and endeavouring, by favours, to fix that vicious prince in his duty, he put it too much in his power whenever he pleased, to depart from it.

Lingard says he gives a description of Richard's coronation, because it is the most early account of that ceremony which has come down to us, and it is transcribed here for the same reason.

RICHARD I.

By the queen mother's invitation the barons and prelates assembled at Winchester, and the 3rd of September, 1189, was fixed for the day of coronation.

"At the appointed hour the procession moved from the king's chambers in the palace of Westminster. The whole way to the high altar in the church had been previously covered with crimson cloth. First came the clergy, abbots, and bishops, followed by two barons with the cap of state, and golden spurs, and two earls carrying the rod and sceptre. The three swords were borne by John, the king's brother, David brother to the king of Scotland, and William earl of Salisbury: and to these succeeded six earls and six barons, carrying on their shoulders the different articles of royal apparel. The crown had been intrusted to the hands of the earl of Albemarle, who was followed by Richard himself, supported by the bishops of Durham and Bath. Over his head was borne a canopy of silk, stretched on four spears, and carried by four barons. Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, received the king at the altar, and administered to him the usual oath. Richard then threw off his upper garment, put on sandals of gold, was anointed on the head, breast, and shoulders, and received successively from the proper officers, the cap, tunic, dalmatic, sword, spurs, and mantle. Thus arrayed he was led to the altar, and solemnly adjured by the archbishop, not to assume the royal dignity, unless he were resolved to observe the regal oath. He renewed his promise, took the crown from the altar, and gave it to the prelate, who immediately placed it on his head. The ceremony of the coronation was now completed. Richard repaired to the throne; and after the celebration of the mass, was reconducted in state to his apartments."

The king, impelled more by the love of military glory than by superstition, acted, from the beginning of his reign, as if the sole purpose of his government had been the relief of the Holy Land, and the recovery of Jerusalem from the Saracens. This zeal against infidels, being communicated to his subjects, had broke out in London on the day of his coronation, and made them find a crusade less dangerous, and attended with more immediate profit. The prejudices of the age had made the lending of money on interest pass by the invidious name of usury. Yet the necessity of the practice had still continued it, and the greater part of that kind of dealing fell every where into the hands of the Jews; who, being already infamous on account of their religion, had no honour to lose, and were apt to exercise a profession, odious in itself, by every kind of rigour, and even sometimes by rapine and extortion. The industry and frugality of this people had put them in possession of all the ready money, which the idleness and profusion common to the English with other European nations, enabled them to lend at exorbitant and unequal interest. The monkish writers represent it as a great stain on the wise and equitable government of Henry, that he had carefully protected this infidel race from all injuries and insults; but the zeal of Richard afforded the populace, a pretence for venting their animosity against them. The king had issued an edict prohibiting their appearance at his coronation; but some of them bringing him large presents from their nation, presumed, in confidence of that merit, to approach the hall in which he dined: being discovered, they were exposed to the insults of the bystanders; they took to flight; the people pursued them. the rumour was spread, that the king had issued orders to massacre all the Jews; a command so agreeable was executed in an instant on such as fell into the hands of the populace; those who had kept at home were exposed to equal danger; the people, moved by rapacity and zeal, broke into their houses, which they plundered, after having murdered the owners; where the Jews barricaded their doors and defended themselves with vigour, the rabble set fire to the houses, and made way through the flames to exercise their pillage and violence; the usual licentiousness of London, which the sovereign power with difficulty restrained, broke out with fury, and continued these outrages; the houses of the rich citizens, though Christians, were next attacked and plundered; and weariness and satiety at last put an end to the disorder; yet, when the king empowered Glauville, the justiciary, to inquire into the authors of these crimes, the guilt was found to involve so many of the most considerable citizens, that it was deemed more prudent to drop the prosecution; and very few suffered the punishment due to this enormity. But the disorder stopped not at London. The inhabitants of the other cities of England, hearing of this slaughter of the Jews, imitated the example: in York, five hundred of that nation, who had retired into the castle for safety, and found themselves unable to defend the place, murdered their own wives and children, threw the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, and then setting fire to the houses, perished in the flames. The gentry of the neighbourhood, who were all indebted to the Jews, ran to the cathedral, where their bonds were kept, and made a solemn bonfire of the papers before the altar. The compiler of the Annals of Waverley, in relating these events, blesses the Almighty for thus delivering over this impious race to destruction.

The ancient situation of England, when the people possessed little riches and the public no credit, made it impossible for sovereigns to bear the expense of a steady or durable war, even on their frontiers; much less could they find regular means for the support of distant expeditions like those into Palestine, which were more the result of popular frenzy than of sober reason or deliberate policy. Richard, therefore, knew that he must carry with him all the treasure necessary for his enterprise, and that both the remoteness of his own country and its poverty made it unable to furnish him with those continued supplies which the exigencies of so perilous a war must necessarily require. His father had left him a treasure of above a hundred thousand marks; and the king, negligent of every consideration but his present object, endeavoured to augment this sum by all expedients, how pernicious soever to the public, or dangerous to royal authority. He put to sale the revenues and manors of the crown; the officers of greatest trust and power, even those of forester and sheriff, which anciently were so important,* became venal, the dignity of chief justiciary, in whose hands was lodged the whole execution of the laws, was sold to Hugh de Puzas, bishop of Durham, for a thousand marks; the same prelate bought the earldom of Northumberland for life; many of the champions of the cross, who had repented of their vow, purchased the liberty of violating it; and Richard, who stood less in need of men than of money, dispensed, on these conditions, with their attendance. Elated with the hopes of fame, which in that age attended no wars but those against the infidels, he was blind to every other consideration; and when some of his wiser ministers objected to this dissipation of the revenue and power of the crown, he replied, that he would sell London itself, could he find a purchaser. Nothing indeed could be a stronger proof how negligent he was of all future interests in comparison of the crusade, than his selling, for so small a sum as 10,000 marks, the vassalage of Scotland, together with the fortresses of Roxborough and Berwick, the greatest acquisition that had been made by his father during the course of his victorious reign; and his accepting the homage of William in the usual terms, merely for the territories which that prince held in England. The English, of all ranks and stations, were oppressed by numerous exactions: menaces were employed, both against the innocent and the guilty, in order to extort money from them: and where a pretence was wanting against the rich, the king obliged them, by the fear of his displeasure, to lend him sums, which he knew it would never be in his power to repay.

But Richard, though he sacrificed every interest, and consideration to the success of the pious enterprise, carried so little the appearance of sanctity in his conduct, that Falk, curate of Neuilly, a zealous preacher of the crusade, who from that merit had acquired the privilege of speaking the boldest truths, advised him to rid himself of his notorious vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuousness, which he called the king's three favourite daughters. "You counsel well," replied Richard, "and I hereby dispose of the first to the Templars, of the second to the Benedictines, and of the third to my prelates."

Richard, jealous of attempts which might be made on England during his absence, laid Prince John, as well as his natural brother Geoffrey archbishop of York, under engagements, confirmed by their oaths, that neither of them should enter the kingdom till his return; though he thought proper, before his departure, to withdraw this prohibition. The administration was left in the hands of Hugh bishop of Durham, and of Longchamp bishop of Ely, whom he appointed justiciaries and guardians of the realm. The latter was a Frenchman of mean birth, and of a violent character; who by art and address had insinuated himself into favour, whom Richard had created chancellor, and whom he had engaged the pope also to invest with the legantine authority, that, by centering every kind of power in his person, he might the better ensure the public tranquillity. All the military and turbulent spirits flocked about the person of the king, and were impatient to distinguish themselves against the infidels in Asia; whither his inclinations, his engagements, led him, and whither he was impelled by messages from the king of France, ready to embark in this enterprise.

The Emperor Frederick, a prince of great spirit and conduct, had already taken the road to Palestine at the head of 150,000 men, collected from Germany and all the northern states. Having surmounted every obstacle thrown in his way by the artifices of the Greeks and the power of the infidels, he had penetrated to the borders of Syria; when, bathing in the cold river Cydnus during the greatest heat of the summer season, he was seized with a mortal distemper, which put an end to his life and his rash enterprise. His army, under the command of his son Conrade, reached Palestine; but was so diminished by fatigue, famine, maladies, and the sword, that it scarcely amounted to eight thousand men; and was unable to make any progress against the great power, valour, and conduct of Saladin. These reiterated calamities attending the crusades had taught the kings of France and England the necessity of trying another road to the Holy Land; and they determined to conduct their armies thither by sea, to carry provisions along with them, and by means of their naval power, to maintain an open communication with their own states, and with the western parts of Europe. The place of rendezvous was appointed in the plains of Vezelay, on the borders of Burgundy. Philip and Richard, on their arrival there, found their combined army amount to 100,000 men; a mighty force animated with glory and religion, conducted by two warlike monarchs, provided with everything which their several dominions could supply, and not to be overcome but by their own misconduct, or by the insurmountable obstacles of nature.

The French prince and the English here reiterated their promises of cordial friendship, pledged their faith not to invade each other's dominions during the crusade, mutually exchanged the oaths of all their barons and prelates to the same effect, and subjected themselves to the penalty of interdicts and excommunications, if they should ever violate this public and solemn engagement. They then separated; Philip took the road to Genoa, Richard that of Marseilles, with a view of meeting their fleets, which were severally appointed to rendezvous in these harbours. They put to sea; and, nearly about the same time, were obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in Messina, where they were detained during the whole winter. This incident laid the foundation of animosities which proved fatal to their enterprise.

Richard and Philip were, by the situation and extent of their dominions, rivals in power; by their age and inclinations, competitors for glory; and these causes of emulation which, had the princes been employed in the field against the common enemy, might have stimulated them to martial enterprises, soon excited, during the present leisure and repose, quarrels between monarchs of such a fiery character. Equally haughty, ambitious, intrepid, and inflexible, they were irritated with the least appearance of injury, and were incapable, by mutual condescensions, to efface those causes of complaint which unavoidably arose between them. Richard, candid, sincere, undesigning, impolitic, violent, laid himself open, on every occasion, to the designs of his antagonist; who, provident, interested, intriguing, failed not to take all advantages against him: and thus, both the circumstances of their disposition in which they were similar, and those in which they differed, rendered it impossible for them to persevere in that harmony which was so necessary to the success of their undertaking.

The last king of Sicily and Naples was William II., who had married Joan, sister to Richard, and who dying without issue, had bequeathed his dominions to his paternal aunt Constantia, the only legitimate descendant surviving of Roger, the first sovereign of those states who had been honoured with the royal title. This princess had, in expectation of that rich inheritance, been married to Henry VI. the reigning emperor; but Tancred, her natural brother, had fixed such an interest among the barons, that, taking advantage of Henry's absence, he had acquired possession of the throne, and maintained his claim, by force of arms, against all the efforts of the Germans. The approach of the crusaders naturally gave him apprehensions for his unstable government; and he was uncertain, whether he had most reason to dread the presence of the French or of the English monarch. Philip was engaged in a strict alliance with the emperor his competitor: Richard was disgusted by his rigours towards the queen-dowager, whom the Sicilian prince had confined in Palermo; because she had opposed with all her interest his succession to the crown. Tancred, therefore, sensible of the present necessity, resolved to pay court to both these formidable princes; and he was not unsuccessful in his endeavours. He persuaded Philip that it was highly improper for him to interrupt his enterprise against the infidels, by any attempt against a Christian state: he restored Queen Joan to her liberty; and even found means to make an alliance with Richard, who stipulated by treaty to marry his nephew, Arthur, the young duke of Brittany, to one of the daughters of Tancred. But before these terms of friendship were settled, Richard, jealous both of Tancred and of the inhabitants of Messina, had taken up his quarters in the suburbs, and had possessed himself of a small fort which commanded the harbour; and he kept himself extremely on his guard against their enterprises. The citizens took umbrage. Mutual insults and attacks passed between them and the English. Philip, who had quartered his troops in the town, endeavoured to accommodate the quarrel, and held a conference with Richard for that purpose. While the two kings, meeting in the open fields, were engaged in discourse on this subject, a body of those Sicilians seemed to be drawing towards them; and Richard pushed forwards, in order to inquire into the reason of this extraordinary movement. The English, insolent from their power, and inflamed with former animosities, wanted but a pretence for attacking the Messinese: they soon chased them off the field, drove them into the town, and entered with them at the gates. The king employed his authority to restrain them from pillaging and massacring the defenceless inhabitants; but he gave orders, in token of his victory, that the standard of England should be erected on the walls. Philip, who considered that place as his quarters, exclaimed against the insult, and ordered some of his troops to pull down the standard: but Richard informed him by a messenger, that, though he himself would willingly remove that ground of offence, he would not permit it to be done by others; and if the French king attempted such an insult upon him, he should not succeed but by the utmost effusion of blood. Philip, content with this species of haughty submission, recalled his orders: the difference was seemingly accommodated; but still left the remains of rancour and jealousy in the breasts of the two monarchs.

Tancred, who, for his own security, desired to inflame their mutual hatred, employed an artifice which might have been attended with consequences still more fatal. He showed Richard a letter, signed by the French king, and delivered to him, as he pretended, by the duke of Burgundy; in which that monarch desired Tancred to fall upon the quarters of the English, and promised to assist him in putting them to the sword, as common enemies. The unwary Richard gave credit to the information; but was too candid not to betray his discontent to Philip, who absolutely denied the letter, and charged the Sicilian prince with forgery and falsehood. Richard either was, or pretended to be, entirely satisfied.

Lest these jealousies and complaints should multiply between them, it was proposed, that they should, by a solemn treaty, obviate all future differences, and adjust every point that could possibly hereafter become a controversy between them. But this expedient started a new dispute, which might have proved more dangerous than any of the foregoing, and which deeply concerned the honour of Philip's family. When Richard, in every treaty with the late king, insisted so strenuously on being allowed to marry Alice of France, he had only sought a pretence for quarrelling; and never meant to take to his bed a princess suspected of a criminal amour with his own father. After he became master, he no longer spake of that alliance: he even took measures for espousing Berengaria, daughter of Sanchez king of Navarre, with whom he had become enamoured during his abode in Guienne: Queen Eleanor was daily expected with that princess at Messina: and when Philip renewed to him his applications for espousing his sister Alice, Richard was obliged to give him an absolute refusal. It is pretended by Hoveden, and other historians, that he was able to produce such convincing proofs of Alice's infidelity, and even of her having born a child to Henry, that her brother desisted from his applications, and chose to wrap up the dishonour of his family in silence and oblivion. It is certain, from the treaty itself, which remains, that, whatever were his motives, he permitted Richard to give his hand to Berengaria; and having settled all other controversies with that prince, he immediately set sail for the Holy Land. Richard waited some time the arrival of his mother and bride; and when they joined him, he separated his fleet into two squadrons, and set forward on his enterprise. Queen Eleanor returned to England; but Berengaria, and the queen dowager of Sicily, his sister, attended him on the expedition.

The English fleet, on leaving the port of Messina, met with a furious tempest; and the squadron on which the two princesses were embarked, was driven on the coast of Cyprus, and some of the vessels were wrecked near Limisso in that island. Isaac, prince of Cyprus, who assumed the magnificent title of Emperor, pillaged the ships that were stranded, threw the seamen and passengers into prison, and even refused to the princesses, in their dangerous situation, the liberty of entering the harbour of Limisso. But Richard, who arrived soon after, took ample vengeance on him for the injury. He disembarked his troops; defeated the tyrant, who opposed his landing; entered Limisso by storm; gained next day a second victory; obliged Isaac to surrender at discretion; and established governors over the island. The Greek prince, being thrown into prison and loaded with irons, complained of the little regard with which he was treated: upon which, Richard ordered silver fetters to be made for him; and this emperor, pleased with the distinction, expressed a sense of the generosity of his conqueror. The king here espoused Berengaria, who, immediately embarking, carried along with her to Palestine the daughter of the Cypriot prince; a dangerous rival, who was believed to have seduced the affections of her husband. Such were the libertine character and conduct of the heroes engaged in this pious enterprise!

The English army arrived in time to partake in the glory of the siege of Acre or Ptolemais, which had been attacked for above two years by the united force of all the Christians in Palestine, and had been defended by the utmost efforts of Saladin and the Saracens. The remains of the German army, conducted by the Emperor Frederick, and the separate bodies of adventurers who continually poured in from the West, had enabled the king of Jerusalem to form this important enterprise: but Saladin, having thrown a strong garrison into the place under the command of Caracos, his own master in the art of war, and molesting the besiegers with continual attacks and sallies, had protracted the success of the enterprise, and wasted the force of his enemies. The arrival of Philip and Richard inspired new life into the Christians; and these princes, acting by concert, and sharing the honour and danger of every action, gave hopes of a final victory over the infidels. They agreed on this plan of operations: when the French monarch attacked the town, the English guarded the trenches: next day when the English prince conducted the assault, the French succeeded him in providing for the safety of the assailants. The emulation between those rival kings and rival nations produced extraordinary acts of valour: Richard in particular, animated with a more precipitate courage than Philip, and more agreeable to the romantic spirit of that age, drew to himself the general attention, and acquired a great and splendid reputation. But this harmony was of short duration; and occasions of discord soon arose between these jealous and haughty princes.

The family of Bouillon, which had first been placed on the throne of Jerusalem, ending in a female, Fulk, count of Anjou, grandfather to Henry II. of England, married the heiress of that kingdom, and transmitted his title to the younger branches of his family. The Anjevin race ending also in a female, Guy de Lusignan, by espousing Sibylla, the heiress, had succeeded to the title; and though he lost his kingdom by the invasion of Saladin, he was still acknowledged by all the Christians for king of Jerusalem. But as Sibylla died without issue, during the siege of Acre, Isabella, her youngest sister, put in her claim to that titular kingdom, and required Lusignan to resign his pretensions to her husband Conrad marquis of Montferrat. Lusignan, maintaining that the royal title was unalienable and indefeasible, had recourse to the protection of Richard, attended on him before he left Cyprus, and engaged him to embrace his cause. There needed no other reason for throwing Philip into the party of Conrad; and the opposite views of these great monarchs brought faction and dissension into the Christian army, and retarded all its operations. The Templars, the Genoese, and the Germans, declared for Philip and Conrad; the Flemings, the Pisans, the knights of the hospital of St. John, adhered to Richard and Lusignan. But notwithstanding these disputes, as the length of the siege had reduced the Saracen garrison to the last extremity, they surrendered themselves prisoners; stipulated in return for their lives, other advantages to the Christians, such as the restoring of the Christian prisoners, and the delivery of the wood of the true cross;* and this great enterprise, which had long engaged the attention of all Europe and Asia, was at last, after the loss of 300,000 men, brought to a happy period.

But Philip, instead of pursuing the hopes of further conquest, and of redeeming the holy city from slavery, being disgusted with the ascendancy assumed and acquired by Richard, and having views of many advantages which he might reap by his presence in Europe, declared his resolution of returning to France; and he pleaded his bad state of health as an excuse for his desertion of the common cause. He left, however, to Richard, ten thousand of his troops, under the command of the duke of Burgundy; and he renewed his oath never to commence hostilities against that prince's dominions during his absence. But he had no sooner reached Italy than he applied, it is pretended, to Pope Celestine III. for a dispensation from this vow; and when denied that request, he still proceeded, though after a covert manner, in a project, which the present situation of England rendered inviting, and which gratified, in an eminent degree, both his resentment and his ambition.

Immediately after Richard had left England, and begun his progress to the Holy Land, the two prelates, whom he had appointed guardians of the realm, broke out into animosities against each other, and threw the kingdom into combustion. Longchamp, presumptuous in his nature, elated by the favour which he enjoyed with his master, and armed with the legantine commission, could not submit to an equality with the bishop of Durham: he even went so far as to arrest his colleague, and to extort from him a resignation of the earldom of Northumberland, and of his other dignities, as the price of his liberty. The king, informed of these dissensions, ordered, by letters from Marseilles, that the bishop should be reinstated in his offices; but Longchamp had still the boldness to refuse compliance, on pretence that he himself was better acquainted with the king's secret intentions. He proceeded to govern the kingdom by his sole authority; to treat all the nobility with arrogance; and to display his power and riches with an invidious ostentation. He never travelled without a strong guard of fifteen hundred foreign soldiers, collected from that licentious tribe with which the age was generally infested: nobles and knights were proud of being admitted into his train: his retinue wore the aspect of royal magnificence: and when, in his progress through the kingdom, he lodged in any monastery, his attendants, it is said, were sufficient to devour, in one night, the revenue of several years. The king, who was detained in Europe longer than the haughty prelate expected, hearing of this ostentation,

* This true cross was lost in the battle of Tiberiade, to which it had been carried by the crusaders for their protection. Rigord, an author of that age, says, that after this dismal event, all the children who were born throughout all Christendom, had only twenty or twenty-two teeth, instead of thirty or thirty-two, which was their former complement.

tation, which exceeded even what the habits of that age indulged in ecclesiastics; being also informed of the insolent tyrannical conduct of his minister; thought proper to restrain his power: he sent new orders appointing Walter archbishop of Rouen, William Mareschal earl of Strigul, Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, William Briewere, and Hugh Bardolf, counsellors to Longchamp, and commanded him to take no measure of importance without their concurrence and approbation. But such general terror had this man impressed by his violent conduct, that even the archbishop of Rouen and the earl of Strigul durst not produce this mandate of the king; and Longchamp still maintained an uncontrolled authority over the nation. But when he proceeded so far as to throw into prison Geoffrey archbishop of York, who had opposed his measures, this breach of ecclesiastical privileges excited such a universal ferment, that Prince John, disgusted with the small share he possessed in the government, and personally dissatisfied by Longchamp, ventured to summon at Reading a general council of the nobility and prelates, and cite him to appear before them. Longchamp thought it dangerous to intrust his person in their hands, and he shut himself up in the Tower of London; but being soon obliged to surrender that fortress, he fled beyond sea, concealed under a female habit, and was deprived of his offices of chancellor and chief justiciary; the last of which was conferred on the archbishop of Rouen, a prelate of prudence and moderation. The commission of legate, however, which had been renewed to Longchamp by Pope Celestine, still gave him, notwithstanding his absence, great authority in the kingdom, enabled him to disturb the government, and forwarded the views of Philip, who watched every opportunity of annoying Richard's dominions. That monarch first attempted to carry open war into Normandy; but as the French nobility refused to follow him in an invasion of a state which they had sworn to protect, and as the pope, who was the general guardian of all princes that had taken the cross, threatened him with ecclesiastical censures, he desisted from his enterprise, and employed against England the expedient of secret policy and intrigue. He debauched Prince John from his allegiance; promised him his sister Alice in marriage; offered to give him possession of all Richard's transmarine dominions; and had not the authority of Queen Eleanor, and the menaces of the English council, prevailed over the inclination of that turbulent prince, he was ready to have crossed the seas, and to have put in execution his criminal enterprises.

The jealousy of Philip was every moment excited by the glory which the great actions of Richard were gaining him in the East, and which, being compared to his own desertion of that popular cause, threw a double lustre on his rival. His envy, therefore, prompted him to obscure that fame which he had not equalled; and he embraced every pretence of throwing the most violent and most improbable calumnies on the king of England. There was a petty prince in Asia commonly called "The old man of the mountain," who had acquired such an ascendancy over his fanatical subjects, that they paid the most implicit deference to his commands; esteemed assassination meritorious, when sanctioned by his mandate; courted danger, and even certain death, in the execution of his orders; and fancied, that when they sacrificed their lives for his sake, the highest joys of paradise were the infallible reward of their devoted obedience. It was the custom of this prince, when he imagined himself injured, to dispatch secretly some of his subjects against the aggressor, to charge them with the execution of his revenge, to instruct them in every art of disguising their purpose; and no precaution was sufficient to guard any man, however powerful, against the attempts of those subtle and determined ruffians. The greatest monarchs stood in awe of this prince of the assassins (for that was the name of his people; whence the word has passed into most European languages), and it was the highest indiscretion in Conrad marquis of Montferrat to offend and affront him. The inhabitants of Tyre, who were governed by that nobleman, had put to death some of this dangerous people: the prince demanded satisfaction; for, as he piqued himself on never beginning any offence, he had his regular and established formalities in requiring atonement: Conrad treated his messengers with disdain: the prince issued the fatal orders: two of his subjects, who had insinuated themselves in disguise among Conrad's guards, openly, in the streets of Sidon, wounded him mortally; and when they were seized and put to the most cruel tortures, they triumphed amidst their agonies, and rejoiced that they had been destined by Heaven to suffer in so just and meritorious a cause.

Every one in Palestine knew from what hand the blow came. Richard was entirely free from suspicion. Though that monarch had formerly maintained the cause of Lusignan against Conrad, he had become sensible of the bad effects attending those dissensions, and had voluntarily conferred on the former the kingdom of Cyprus, on condition that he should resign to his rival all pretensions to the crown of Jerusalem. Conrad himself, with his dying breath, had recommended his widow to the protection of Richard; the prince of the assassins avowed the action in a formal narrative which he sent to Europe; yet on this foundation the king of France thought fit to build the most egregious calumnies, and to impute to Richard the murder of the marquis of Montferrat, whose elevation he had once openly opposed. He filled all Europe with exclamations against the crime; appointed a guard for his own person, in order to defend himself against a like attempt; and endeavoured, by these shallow artifices, to cover the infamy of attacking the dominions of a prince whom he himself had deserted, and who was engaged with so much glory in a war, universally acknowledged to be the common cause of Christendom.

But Richard's heroic actions in Palestine were the best apology for his conduct. The Christian adventurers under his command determined, on opening the campaign, to attempt the siege of Ascalon, in order to prepare the way for that of Jerusalem; and they marched along the sea-coast with that intention. Saladin purposed to intercept their passage; and he placed himself on the road with an army amounting to 300,000 combatants. On this occasion was fought one of the greatest battles of that age; and the most celebrated, for the military genius of the commanders, for the number and valour of the troops, and for the great variety of events which attended it. Both the right wing of the Christians, commanded by D'Avesnes, and the left, conducted by the duke of Burgundy, were, in the beginning of the day, broken and defeated; when Richard, who led on the main body, restored the battle; attacked the enemy with intrepidity and presence of mind; performed the part both of a consummate general and gallant soldier; and not only gave his two wings leisure to recover from their confusion, but obtained a complete victory over the Saracens, of whom forty thousand are said to have perished in the field. Ascalon soon after fell into the hands of the Christians: other sieges were carried on with equal success: Richard was even able to advance within sight of Jerusalem, the object of his enterprise; when he had the mortification to find, that he must abandon all hopes of immediate success, and must put a stop to his career of victory. The crusaders, animated with an enthusiastic ardour for the holy wars, broke at first through all regards to safety or interest in the prosecution of their purpose; and trusting to the immediate assistance of Heaven, set nothing before their eyes but fame and victory in this world, and a crown of glory in the next. But long absence from home, fatigue, disease, want, and the variety of incidents which naturally attend war, had gradually abated that fury which nothing was able directly to withstand; and every one, except the king of England, expressed a desire of speedily returning into Europe. The Germans and the Italians declared their resolution of desisting from the enterprise: the French were still more obstinate in this purpose: the duke of Burgundy, in order to pay court to Philip, took all opportunities of mortifying and opposing Richard: and there appeared an absolute necessity of abandoning for the present all hopes of further conquest, and of securing the acquisitions of the Christians by an accommodation with Saladin. Richard, therefore, concluded a truce with that monarch, and stipulated, that Acre, Joppa, and other sea-port towns of Palestine, should remain in the hands of the Christians, and that every one of that religion should have liberty to perform his pilgrimage to Jerusalem unmolested. This truce was concluded for three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours; a magical number, which had probably been devised by the Europeans, and which was suggested by a superstition well suited to the object of the war.

The liberty in which Saladin indulged the Christians to perform their pilgrimages to Jerusalem, was an easy sacrifice on his part; and the furious wars which he waged in defence of the barren territory of Judea, were not with him, as with the European adventurers, the result of superstition, but of policy. The advantage indeed of science, moderation, humanity, was at that time entirely on the side of the Saracens; and this gallant emperor, in particular, displayed, during the course of the war, a spirit and generosity, which even his bigoted enemies were obliged to acknowledge and admire. Richard, equally martial and brave, carried with him more of the barbarian character; and was guilty of acts of ferocity, which threw a stain on his celebrated victories. When Saladin refused to ratify the capitulation of Acre, the king of England ordered all his prisoners, to the number of five thousand, to be butchered; and the Saracens found themselves obliged to retaliate upon the Christians by a like cruelty. Saladin died at Damascus soon after concluding this truce with the princes of the crusade: it is memorable, that, before he expired, he ordered his winding sheet to be carried as a standard through every street of the city; while a crier went before, and proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladin, the conqueror of the East." By his last will he ordered charities to be distributed to the poor, without distinction of Jew, Christian, or Mahometan.

There remained, after the truce, no business of importance to detain Richard in Palestine; and the intelligence which he received, concerning the intrigues of his brother John, and those of the king of France, made him sensible, that his presence was necessary in Europe. As he dared not to pass through France, he sailed to the Adriatic; and being shipwrecked near Aquileia, he put on the disguise of a pilgrim, with a purpose of taking his journey secretly through Germany. Pursued by the governor of Istria, he was forced out of the direct road to England, and was obliged to pass by Vienna; where his expenses and liberalities betrayed the monarch in the habit of the pilgrim; and he was arrested by orders of Leopold duke of Austria. This prince had served under Richard at the siege of Acre; but being disgusted by some insult of that haughty monarch, he was so ungenerous as to seize the present opportunity of gratifying at once his avarice and revenge; and he threw the king into prison. The emperor Henry VI., who also considered Richard as an enemy, on account of the alliance contracted by him with Tancred king of Sicily, dispatched messengers to the duke of Austria, required the royal captive to be delivered to him, and stipulated a large sum of money as a reward for this service. Thus the king of England, who had filled the whole world with his renown, found himself, during the most critical state of his affairs, confined in a dungeon, and loaded with irons, in the heart of Germany, and entirely at the mercy of his enemies, the basest and most sordid of mankind.

The English council was astonished on receiving this fatal intelligence; and foresaw all the dangerous consequences which might naturally arise from that event. The queen-dowager wrote reiterated letters to Pope Celestine, exclaiming against the injury which her son had sustained; representing the impiety of detaining in prison the most illustrious prince that had yet carried the banners of Christ into the Holy Land; claiming the protection of the apostolic see, which was due even to the meanest of those adventurers, and upbraiding the pope, that, in a cause where justice, religion, and the dignity of the church, were so much concerned, a cause which it might well befit his holiness himself to support by taking in person a journey to Germany, the spiritual thunders should so long be suspended over those sacrilegious offenders. The zeal of Celestine corresponded not to the impatience of the queen-mother; and the regency of England were, for a long time, left to struggle alone with all their domestic and foreign enemies.

The king of France, quickly informed of Richard's confinement by a message from the emperor, prepared himself to take advantage of the incident; and he employed every means of force and intrigue, of war and negotiation, against the dominions and the person of his unfortunate rival. He revived the calumny of Richard's assassinating the marquis of Montferrat; and by that absurd pretence he induced his barons to violate their oaths, by which they had engaged that, during the crusade, they never would, on any account, attack the dominions of the king of England. He made the emperor the largest offers, if he would deliver into his hands the royal prisoner, or at least detain him in perpetual captivity: he even formed an alliance by marriage with the king of Denmark, desired that the ancient Danish claim to the crown of England should be transferred to him, and solicited a supply of shipping to maintain it. But the most successful of Philip's negotiations was with Prince John, who, forgetting every tie to his brother, his sovereign, and his benefactor, thought of nothing but how to make his own advantage of the public calamities. That traitor, on the first invitation from the court of France, suddenly went abroad, had a conference with Philip, and made a treaty, of which the object was the perpetual ruin of his unhappy brother. He stipulated to deliver into Philip's hands a great part of Normandy; he received, in return, the investiture of all Richard's transmarine dominions; and it is reported by several historians, that he even did homage to the French king for the crown of England.

In consequence of this treaty, Philip invaded Normandy; and by the treachery of John's emissaries, made himself master, without opposition, of many fortresses, Neufchatel, Neufle, Gisors, Pacey, Ivree: he subdued the counties of Eu and Aumale; and advancing to form the siege of Rouen, he threatened to put all the inhabitants to the sword, if they dared to make resistance. Happily, Robert earl of Leicester appeared in that critical moment; a gallant nobleman, who had acquired great honour during the crusade, and who, being more fortunate than his master in finding his passage homewards, took on him the command in Rouen, and exerted himself, by his exhortations and example, to infuse courage into the dismayed Normans. Philip was repulsed in every attack; the time of service from his vassals expired; and he consented to a truce with the English regency, received in return the promise of 20,000 marks, and had four castles put into his hands, as security for the payment.

Prince John, who, with a view of increasing the general confusion, went over to England, was still less successful in his enterprises. He was only able to make himself master of the castles of Windsor and Wallingford, but when he arrived in London, and claimed the kingdom as heir to his brother, of whose death he pretended to have received certain intelligence, he was rejected by all the barons, and measures were taken to oppose and subdue him. The justiciaries supported by the general affection of the people, provided so well for the defence of the kingdom, that John was obliged, after some fruitless efforts, to conclude a truce with them; and before its expiration, he thought it prudent to return into France, where he openly avowed his alliance with Philip.

Meanwhile the high spirit of Richard suffered in Germany every kind of insult and indignity. The French ambassadors, in their master's name, denounced him as a vassal to the crown of France, and declared all his fiefs to be forfeited to his liege lord. The emperor, that he might render him more impatient for the recovery of his liberty, and make him submit to the payment of a larger ransom, treated him with the greatest severity, and reduced him to a condition worse than that of the meanest malefactor. He was even produced before the diet of the empire at Worms, and accused by Henry of many crimes and misdemeanors; of making an alliance with Tancred, the usurper of Sicily; of turning the arms of the crusade against a Christian prince, and subduing Cyprus; of affronting the duke of Austria before Acre; of obstructing the progress of the Christian arms by his quarrels with the king of France; of assassinating Conrad marquis of Montferrat; and of concluding a truce with Saladin, and leaving Jerusalem in the hands of the Saracen emperor. Richard, whose spirit was not broken by his misfortunes, and whose genius was rather roused by these frivolous or scandalous imputations; after premising, that his dignity exempted him from answering before any jurisdiction, except that of Heaven; yet condescended, for the sake of his reputation, to justify his conduct before that great assembly. He observed, that he had no hand in Tancred's elevation, and only concluded a treaty with a prince, whom he found in possession of the throne: that the king, or rather tyrant of Cyprus, had provoked his indignation by the most ungenerous and unjust proceedings; and though he chastised this aggressor, he had not retarded a moment the progress of his chief enterprise: that if he had at any time been wanting in civility to the duke of Austria, he had already been sufficiently punished for that sally of passion; and it better became men, embarked together in so holy a cause, to forgive each other's infirmities, than to pursue a slight offence with such unrelenting vengeance: that it had sufficiently appeared by the event, whether the king of France or he were most zealous for the conquest of the Holy Land, and were most likely to sacrifice private passions and animosities to that great object: that if the whole tenor of his life had not shown him incapable of a base assassination, and justified him from that imputation in the eyes of his very enemies, it was in vain for him, at present, to make his apology, or plead the many irrefragable arguments which he could produce in his own favour: and that, however he might regret the necessity, he was so far from being ashamed of his truce with Saladin, that he rather gloried in that event; and thought it extremely honourable, that, though abandoned by all the world, supported only by his own courage, and by the small remains of his national troops, he could yet obtain such conditions from the most powerful and most warlike emperor that the East had ever yet produced. Richard, after thus deigning to apologize for his conduct, burst out into indignation at the cruel treatment which he had met with; that he, the champion of the cross, still wearing that honourable badge, should, after expending the blood and treasure of his subjects in the common cause of Christendom, be intercepted by Christian princes in his return to his own country, be thrown into a dungeon, be loaded with irons, be obliged to plead his cause, as if he were a subject and a malefactor; and, what he still more regretted, be thereby prevented from making preparations for a new crusade, which he had projected after the expiration of the truce, and from redeeming the sepulchre of Christ, which had so long been profaned by the dominion of infidels. The spirit and eloquence of Richard made such impression on the German princes, that they exclaimed loudly against the conduct of the emperor; the pope threatened him with excommunication; and Henry, who had hearkened to the proposals of the king of France and Prince John; found that it would be impracticable for him to execute his and their base purposes, or to detain the king of England any longer in captivity. He therefore concluded with him a treaty for his ransom, and agreed to restore him to his freedom for the sum of 150,000 marks, about 300,000 pounds of our present money; of which 100,000 marks were to be paid before he received his liberty, and sixty-seven hostages delivered for the remainder. The emperor, as if to gloss over the infamy of this transaction, made at the same time a present to Richard of the kingdom of Arles, comprehending Provence, Dauphiny, Narbonne, and other states, over which the empire had some antiquated claims; a present which the king very wisely neglected.

The captivity of the superior lord was one of the cases provided for by the feudal tenures: and all the vassals were in that event obliged to give an aid for his ransom. Twenty shillings were therefore levied on each knight's fee in England; but as this money came in slowly, and was not sufficient for the intended purpose, the voluntary zeal of the people readily supplied the deficiency. The churches and monasteries melted down their plate to the amount of 30,000 marks; the bishops, abbots, and nobles, readily paid a fourth of their yearly rent; the parochial clergy contributed a tenth of their tithes: and the requisite sum being thus collected, Queen Eleanor, and Walter archbishop of Rouen, set out with it for Germany; paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Austria at Mentz; delivered them hostages for the remainder; and freed Richard from his captivity. His escape was very critical. Henry had been detected in the assassination of the bishop of Liege, and in an attempt of a like nature on the duke of Louvaine; and finding himself extremely obnoxious to the German princes on account of these odious practices, he had determined to seek support from an alliance with the king of France; to detain Richard, the enemy of that prince, in perpetual captivity; to keep in his hands the money which he had already received for his ransom; and to extort fresh sums from Philip and Prince John, who were very liberal in their offers to him. He therefore gave orders that Richard should be pursued and arrested; but the king, making all imaginable haste, had already embarked at the mouth of the Scheldt, and was out of sight of land when the messengers of the emperor reached Antwerp.

The joy of the English was extreme on the appearance of their monarch, who had suffered so many calamities, who had acquired so much glory, and who had spread the reputation of their name into the farthest East, whither their fame had never before been able to extend. He gave them soon after his arrival, an opportunity of publicly displaying their exultation, by ordering himself to be crowned anew at Winchester; as if he intended, by that ceremony, to reinstate himself in his throne, and to wipe off the ignominy of his captivity. Their satisfaction was not damped, even when he declared his purpose of resuming all those exorbitant grants, which he had been necessitated to make before his departure for the Holy Land. The barons also, in a great council, confiscated, on account of his treason, all Prince John's possessions in England; and they assisted the king in reducing the fortresses which still remained in the hands of his brother's adherents. Richard, having settled every thing in England, passed over with an army into Normandy; being impatient to make war on Philip, and to revenge himself for the many injuries which he had received from that monarch. As soon as Philip heard of the king's deliverance from captivity, he wrote to his confederate John, in these terms: "Take care of yourself: the devil is broken loose."

When we consider such powerful and martial monarchs inflamed with personal animosity against each other, enraged by mutual injuries, excited by rivalry, impelled by opposite interests, and instigated by the pride and violence of their own temper; our curiosity is naturally raised, and we expect an obstinate and furious war, distinguished by the greatest events, and concluded by some remarkable catastrophe. Yet are the incidents which attend those hostilities so frivolous, that scarce any historian can entertain such a passion for military descriptions as to venture on a detail of them: a certain proof of the extreme weakness of princes in those ages, and of the little authority they possessed over their refractory vassals. The whole amount of the exploits on both sides is, the taking of a castle, the surprise of a straggling party, a rencounter of horse, which resembles more a rout than a battle. Richard obliged Philip to raise the siege of Verneuil: he took Loches, a small town in Anjou; he made himself master of Beaumont, and some other places of little consequence; and after these trivial exploits, the two kings began already to hold conferences for an accommodation. Philip insisted that, if a general peace were concluded, the barons on each side should, for the future, be prohibited from carrying on private wars against each other: but Richard replied, that this was a right claimed by his vassals, and he could not debar them from it. After this fruitless negotiation, there ensued an action between the French and English cavalry at Fretelval, in which the former were routed, and the king of France's cartulary and records, which commonly at that time attended his person, were taken. But this victory leading to no important advantages, a truce for a year was at last, from mutual weakness, concluded between the two monarchs.

During this war, Prince John deserted from Philip, threw himself at his brother's feet, craved pardon for his offences, and by the intercession of Queen Eleanor was received into favour. "I forgive him," said the king, "and hope I shall as easily forget his injuries as he will my pardon." John was incapable even of returning to his duty, without committing a baseness. Before he left Philip's party, he invited to dinner all the officers of the garrison which that prince had placed in the citadel of Evreux; he massacred them during the entertainment; fell, with the assistance of the townsmen, on the garrison, whom he put to the sword; and then delivered up the place to his brother.

The king of France was the great object of Richard's resentment and animosity: the conduct of John, as well as that of the emperor and duke of Austria, had been so base, and was exposed to such general odium and reproach, that the king deemed himself sufficiently revenged for their injuries; and he seems never to have entertained any project of vengeance against any of them.

The duke of Austria, about this time, having crushed his leg by the fall of his horse at a tournament, was thrown into a fever; and being struck, on the approaches of death, with remorse for his injustice to Richard, he ordered, by will, all the English hostages in his hands to be set at liberty, and the remainder of the debt due to him to be remitted: his son, who seemed inclined to disobey these orders, was constrained by his ecclesiastics to execute them. The emperor also made advances for Richard's friendship, and offered to give him a discharge of all the debt not yet paid to him, provided he would enter into an offensive alliance against the king of France; a proposal which was very acceptable to Richard, and was greedily embraced by him. The treaty with the emperor took no effect; but it served to rekindle the war between France and England before the expiration of the truce. This war was not distinguished by any more remarkable incidents than the foregoing. After mutually ravaging the open country, and taking a few insignificant castles, the two kings concluded a peace at Louviers, and made an exchange of some territories with each other. Their inability to wage war occasioned the peace: their mutual antipathy engaged them again in war before two months expired. Richard imagined that he had now found an opportunity of gaining great advantages over his rival, by forming an alliance with the counts of Flanders, Toulouse, Boulogne, Champagne, and other considerable vassals of the crown of France. But he soon experienced the insincerity of those princes: and was not able to make any impression on that kingdom, while governed by a monarch of so much vigour and activity as Philip. The most remarkable incident in this war was the taking prisoner in battle the bishop of Beauvais, a martial prelate, who was of the family of Dreux, and a near relation of the French king. Richard, who hated that bishop, threw him into prison, and loaded him with irons; and when the pope demanded his liberty, and claimed him as his son, the king sent to his holiness the coat of mail which the prelate had worn in battle, and which was all besmeared with blood: and he replied to him, in the terms employed by Jacob's sons to that patriarch, "This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no." This new war between England and France, though carried on with such animosity that both kings frequently put out the eyes of their prisoners, was soon finished by a truce of five years; and immediately after signing this treaty, the kings were ready, on some new offence, to break out again into hostilities; when the mediation of the cardinal of St. Mary, the pope's legate, accommodated the difference. This prelate even engaged the princes to commence a treaty for a more durable peace; but the death of Richard put an end to the negotiation.

Vidomar, viscount of Limoges, a vassal of the king, had found a treasure, of which he sent part to that prince as a present. Richard, as superior lord, claimed the whole; and at the head of some Brabançons, besieged the viscount in the castle of Chalus, near Limoges, in order to make him comply with his demand. The garrison offered to surrender; but the king replied, that, since he had taken the pains to come thither and besiege the place in person, he would take it by force, and would hang every one of them. The same day, Richard, accompanied by Marcadée, leader of his Brabançons, approached the castle in order to survey it; when one Bertrand de Gourdon, an archer, took aim at him, and pierced his shoulder with an arrow. The king, however, gave orders for the assault, took the place, and hanged all the garrison, except Gourdon, who had wounded him, and whom he reserved for a more deliberate and more cruel execution.

The wound was not in itself dangerous; but the unskilfulness of the surgeon made it mortal: he so rankled Richard's shoulder in pulling out the arrow, that a gangrene ensued; and that prince was now sensible that his life was drawing towards a period. He sent for Gourdon, and asked him, "Wretch, what have I ever done to you, to oblige you to seek my life?"—"What have you done to me?" coolly replied the prisoner: "you killed with your own hands my father and my two brothers; and you intended to have hanged myself: I am now in your power, and you may take revenge, by inflicting on me the most severe torments: but I shall endure them all with pleasure, provided I can think that I have been so happy as to rid the world of such a nuisance." Richard, struck with the reasonableness of this reply, and humbled by the near approach of death, ordered Gourdon to be set at liberty, and a sum of money to be given him; but Marcadée, unknown to him, seized the unhappy man, flayed him alive, and then hanged him. Richard died in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-second of his age; and he left no issue behind him.

The most shining part of this prince's character are his military talents. No man, even in that romantic age, carried personal courage and intrepidity to a greater height; and this quality gained him the appellation of the lion-hearted, cœur de lion. He passionately loved glory, chiefly military glory; and as his conduct in the field was not inferior to his valour, he seems to have possessed every talent necessary for acquiring it. His resentments also were high; his pride unconquerable; and his subjects, as well as his neighbours, had reason therefore to apprehend, from the continuance of his reign, a perpetual scene of blood and violence. Of an impetuous and vehement spirit, he was distinguished by all the good, as well as the bad qualities, incident to that character: he was open, frank, generous, sincere, and brave; he was revengeful, domineering, ambitious, haughty, and cruel; and was much better calculated to dazzle men by the splendour of his enterprises, than either to promote their happiness or his own grandeur, by a sound and well-regulated policy. As military talents make great impression on the people, he seems to have been much beloved by his English subjects; and he is remarked to have been the first prince of the Norman line that bore any sincere regard to them. He passed, however, only four months of his reign in England: the crusade employed him near three years; he was detained about fourteen months in captivity; the rest of his reign was spent either in war, or preparations for war, against France; and he was so well pleased with the fame which he had acquired in the East, that he determined, notwithstanding his past misfortunes, to have further exhausted his kingdom, and to have exposed himself to new hazards, by conducting another expedition against the infidels.

Though the English pleased themselves with the glory which the king's martial genius procured them, his reign was very oppressive, and somewhat arbitrary, by the high taxes which he levied on them, and often without consent of the states or great council. In the ninth year of his reign, he levied five shillings on each hide of land; and because the clergy refused to contribute their share, he put them out of the protection of law, and ordered the civil courts to give them no sentence for any debts which they might claim. Twice in his reign he ordered all his charters to be sealed anew, and the parties to pay fees for the renewal. It is said that Hubert, his justiciary, sent him over to France, in the space of two years, no less a sum than 1,100,000 marks, besides bearing all the charges of the government in England. But this account is quite incredible, unless we suppose that Richard made a thorough dilapidation of the demesnes of the crown, which it is not likely he could do with any advantage after his former resumption of all grants. A king possessed of such a revenue, could never have endured fourteen months' captivity, for not paying 150,000 marks to the emperor, and be obliged at last to leave hostages for a third of the sum. The prices of commodities in this reign are also a certain proof that no such enormous sum could be levied on the people. A hide of land, or about a hundred and twenty acres, was commonly let at twenty shillings a-year, money of that time. As there were 243,600 hides in England, it is easy to compute the amount of all the landed rents of the kingdom. The general and stated price of an ox was four shillings: of a labouring horse the same; of a sow, one shilling; of a sheep with fine wool, tenpence; with coarse wool, sixpence. These commodities seem not to have advanced in their prices since the conquest.*

Lingard states, without expressing any doubt as to the fact, that the enormous sum stated by the old historians, of 1,100,000 pounds, was actually levied on the people during the period mentioned, and gives the following account of the expedients used to raise it. "1st. Before his departure for Palestine the king had sold many of the lands and offices belonging to the crown. These were resumed: and to palliate the injustice of the measure, it was pretended that the purchasers had been indemnified by the profits which they had made in the interval. 2nd. The tax of two shillings on every caracute of land, imposed in the council at Nottingham, had been afterwards increased to five. The caracute was fixed at one hundred acres, and commissioners were appointed to inquire upon oath, and to enrol the number of such caracutes, with the names of the proprietors in every hundred or wapentake. To ensure payment the lord was authorised to distrain his tenant: and if any deficiency remained, the sheriff was ordered to make it good by levying distress on the demesne lands of the lord. 3d. Tournaments had been introduced into England in the turbulent reign of Stephen, and prohibited by the policy of his successor: Richard revived them, on the plea that they were necessary to teach the use of arms, and to fit the rising generation for the defence of their country. But these patriotic views were in reality prompted by avarice: before any individual could partake of such martial sports a royal license was requisite: and its price was duly fixed at the rate of twenty marks for an earl, ten for a baron, four for a knight with, and two for a knight without, land. 4th. Richard broke the great seal, ordered a new one to be made, and declared by proclamation that no grant under the former should be deemed valid in courts of law. The consequence was that the holders of such grants were compelled to exhibit them in the office of the chancellor, and to pay the usual fees a second time. 5th. The institution of itinerant justices was resumed or continued: but their instructions were improved by such additions as circumstances suggested. They were to consider the king as succeeding in the place of the Jews who had been killed in the first year of his reign, and to require fines from their murderers, and payment from their debtors: they were to annul all grants which had been made by Prince John, and to receive all monies that were due to him: they were to inquire into the state of all wardships and escheats, the real value of all the lands, and the quantity of stock on each farm; they were to impose tallages on the cities, burghs, and ancient demesnes of the crown; and to exact the payment of all arrears from those who had promised to contribute towards the king's ransom. 'By these and similar inquisitions,' says a contemporary writer, 'England was reduced to poverty from one sea to the other.'"

Richard renewed the severe laws against transgressors in his forests, whom he punished by castration and putting out their eyes, as in the reign of his great-grandfather. He established by law one weight and measure throughout his kingdom: a useful institution, which the mercenary disposition and necessities of his successor engaged him to dispense with for money.

The disorders in London, derived from its bad police, had risen to a great height during this reign; and in the year 1196, there seemed to be formed so regular a conspiracy among the numerous malefactors as threatened the city with destruction. There was one William Fitz-Osbert, commonly called Longbeard, a lawyer, who had rendered himself extremely popular among the lower rank of citizens; and, by defending them on all occasions, had acquired the appellation of the advocate or saviour of the poor. He exerted his authority, by injuring and insulting the more substantial citizens, with whom he lived in a state of hostility, and who were every moment exposed to the most outrageous violences from him and his licentious emissaries. Murders were daily committed in the streets; houses were broken open and pillaged in day-light; and it is pretended, that no less than fifty-two thousand persons had entered into an association, by which they bound themselves to obey all the orders of this dangerous ruffian. Archbishop Hubert, who was then chief justiciary, summoned him before the council to answer for his conduct; but he came so well attended, that no one durst accuse him, or give evidence against him; and the primate finding the impotence of law, contented himself with exacting from the citizens hostages for their good behaviour. He kept, however, a watchful eye on Fitz-Osbert; and seizing a favourable opportunity, attempted to commit him to custody; but the criminal, murdering one of the public officers, escaped with his concubine to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where he defended himself by force of arms. He was at last forced from his retreat, condemned, and executed, amidst the regrets of the populace, who were so devoted to his memory, that they stole his gibbet, paid the same veneration to it as to the cross, and were equally zealous in propagating and attesting reports of the miracles wrought by it. But though the sectaries of this superstition were punished by the justiciary, it received so little encouragement from the established clergy, whose property was endangered by such seditious practices, that it suddenly sunk and vanished.

* Madox, in his Baronia Anglica, tells us, that in the 30th of Henry II., thirty-three cows and two bulls cost but eight pounds seven shillings, money of that age; 500 sheep, twenty-two pounds ten shillings, or about tenpence three farthings per sheep; sixty-six oxen, eighteen pounds three shillings; fifteen breeding mares, two pounds twelve shillings and sixpence; and twenty-two hogs, one pound two shillings. In the tenth year of Richard I. mention is made of ten per cent. paid for money: but the Jews frequently exacted much higher interest.

It was during the crusades, that the custom of using coats of arms was first introduced into Europe. The knights, cased up in armour, had no way to make themselves be known and distinguished in battle but by the devices on their shields; and these were gradually adopted by their posterity and families, who were proud of the pious and military enterprises of their ancestors.

King Richard was a passionate lover of poetry: there even remain some poetical works of his composition: and he bears a rank among the provençal poets or Troubadours, who were the first of the modern Europeans that distinguished themselves by attempts of that nature.

CHAPTER XIV.

JOHN.

Accession of the king—His marriage—War with France—Murder of Arthur duke of Britany—The king expelled the French provinces—The king's quarrel with the court of Rome—Cardinal Langton appointed archbishop of Canterbury—Interdict of the kingdom—Excommunication of the king—The king's submission to the pope—Discontents of the barons—Insurrection of the barons—Magna Charta—Renewal of the civil wars—Prince Lewis called over—Death—and character of the king.

THE noble and free genius of the ancients, which made the government of a single person be always regarded as a species of tyranny and usurpation, and kept them from forming any conception of a legal and regular monarchy, had rendered them entirely ignorant both of the rights of primogeniture and a representation in succession; inventions so necessary for preserving order in the lines of princes, for obviating the evils of civil discord and of usurpation, and for begetting moderation in that species of government, by giving security to the ruling sovereign. These innovations arose from the feudal law; which, first introducing the right of primogeniture, made such a distinction between the families of the elder and younger brothers, that the son of the former was thought entitled to succeed to his grandfather, preferably to his uncles, though nearer allied to the deceased monarch. But though this progress of ideas was natural, it was gradual. In the age of which we treat, the practice of representation was indeed introduced, but not thoroughly established; and the minds of men fluctuated between opposite principles. Richard, when he entered on the holy war, declared his nephew, Arthur duke of Britany, his successor: and by a formal deed, he set aside, in his favour, the title of his brother John, who was younger than Geoffrey, the father of that prince. But John so little acquiesced in that destination, that, when he gained the ascendancy in the English ministry, by expelling Longchamp, the chancellor and great justiciary, he engaged all the barons to swear, that they would maintain his right of succession; and Richard, on his return, took no steps towards restoring or securing the order which he had at first established. He was even careful, by his last will, to declare his brother John heir to all his dominions; whether, that he now thought Arthur, who was only twelve years of age, incapable of asserting his claim against John's faction, or was influenced by Eleanor, the queen-mother, who hated Constantia, mother of the young duke, and who dreaded the credit which that princess would naturally acquire if her son should mount the throne. The authority of a testament was great in that age, even where the succession of a kingdom was concerned; and John had reason to hope that this title, joined to his plausible right in other respects, would ensure him the succession. But the idea of representation seems to have made, at this time, greater progress in France than in England: the barons of the transmarine provinces, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, immediately declared in favour of Arthur's title, and applied for assistance to the French monarch as their superior lord. Philip, who desired only an occasion to embarrass John, and dismember his dominions, embraced the cause of the young duke of Britany, took him under his protection, and sent him to Paris to be educated, along with his own son Lewis. In this emergency, John hastened to establish his authority in the chief members of the monarchy; and after sending Eleanor into Poictou and Guienne, where her right was incontestable, and was readily acknowledged, he hurried to Rouen, and having secured the duchy of Normandy, he passed over, without loss of time, to England. Hubert archbishop of Canterbury, William Mareschal earl of Strigul, who also passed by the name of earl of Pembroke, and Geoffrey Fitz-Peter the justiciary, the three most favoured ministers of the late king, were already engaged on his side; and the submission or acquiescence of all the other barons put him, without opposition, in possession of the throne.

The king soon returned to France, in order to conduct the war against Philip, and to recover the revolted provinces from his nephew Arthur. The alliances which Richard had formed with the earl of Flanders, and other potent French princes, though they had not been very effectual, still subsisted, and enabled John to defend himself against all the efforts of his enemy. In an action between the French and Flemings, the elect bishop of Cambray was taken prisoner by the former; and when the cardinal of Capua claimed his liberty, Philip, instead of complying, reproached him with the weak efforts which he had employed in favour of the bishop of Beauvais, who was in a like condition. The legate, to show his impartiality, laid at the same time the kingdom of France and the duchy of Normandy under an interdict; and the two kings found themselves obliged to make an exchange of these military prelates.

Nothing enabled the king to bring this war to a happy issue so much as the selfish intriguing character of Philip, who acted in the provinces that had declared for Arthur without any regard to the interests of that prince. Constantia, seized with a violent jealousy that he intended to usurp the entire dominion of them, found means to carry off her son secretly from Paris: she put him into the hands of his uncle; restored the provinces which had adhered to the young prince; and made him do homage for the duchy of Britany, which was regarded as a rere-fief of Normandy. From this incident, Philip saw that he could not hope to make any progress against John; and being threatened with an interdict on account of his irregular divorce from Ingelburga, the Danish princess whom he had espoused, he became desirous of concluding a peace with England. After some fruitless conferences, the terms were at last adjusted; and the two monarchs seemed in this treaty to have an intention, besides ending the present quarrel, of preventing all future causes of discord, and of obviating every controversy which could hereafter arise between them. They adjusted the limits of all their territories; mutually secured the interests of their vassals; and, to render the union more durable, John gave his niece, Blanche of Castile, in marriage to Prince Lewis, Philip's eldest son, and with her the baronies of Issoudun and Graçai, and other fiefs in Berri. Nine barons of the king of England, and as many of the king of France, were guarantees of this treaty; and all of them swore, that if their sovereign violated any article of it, they would declare themselves against him, and embrace the cause of the injured monarch.

John, now secure as he imagined on the side of France, indulged his passion for Isabella, the daughter and heir of Aymar Tailleffer, count of Angouleme, a lady with whom he had become much enamoured. His queen, the heiress of the family of Gloucester, was still alive: Isabella was married to the count de la Marche, and was already consigned to the care of that nobleman; though by reason of her tender years the marriage had not been consummated. The passion of John made him overlook all these obstacles: he persuaded the count of Angouleme to carry off his daughter from her husband; and having on some pretence or other procured a divorce from his own wife, he espoused Isabella; regardless both of the menaces of the pope, who exclaimed against these irregular proceedings, and of the resentment of the injured count, who soon found means of punishing his powerful and insolent rival.

John had not the art of attaching his barons either by affection or by fear. The count de la Marche, and his brother the Count d'Eu, taking advantage of the general discontent against him, excited commotions in Poitou and Normandy; and obliged the king to have recourse to arms, in order to suppress the insurrection of his vassals. He summoned together the barons of England, and required them to pass the sea under his standard, and to quell the rebels: he found that he possessed as little authority in that kingdom as in his transmarine provinces. The English barons unanimously replied, that they would not attend him on this expedition, unless he would promise to restore and preserve their privileges:

the first symptom of a regular association and plan of liberty among those noblemen! But affairs were not yet fully ripe for the revolution projected. John, by menacing the barons, broke the concert; and both engaged many of them to follow him into Normandy, and obliged the rest, who staid behind, to pay him a scutage of two marks on each knight's fee, as the price of their exemption from the service.

The force which John carried abroad with him, and that which joined him in Normandy, rendered him much superior to his malecontent barons; and so much the more as Philip did not publicly give them any countenance, and seemed as yet determined to persevere steadily in the alliance which he had contracted with England. But the king, elated with his superiority, advanced claims which gave a universal alarm to his vassals, and diffused still wider the general discontent. As the jurisprudence of those times required, that the causes in the lord's court should chiefly be decided by duel, he carried along with him certain bravos, whom he retained as champions, and whom he destined to fight with his barons, in order to determine any controversy which he might raise against them. The count de la Marche, and other noblemen, regarded this proceeding as an affront, as well as an injury; and declared, that they would never draw their sword against men of such inferior quality. The king menaced them with vengeance; but he had not vigour to employ against them the force in his hands, or to prosecute the injustice, by crushing entirely the nobles who opposed it.

This government, equally feeble and violent gave the injured barons courage as well as inclination to carry farther their opposition: they appealed to the king of France: complained of the denial of justice in John's court; demanded redress from him as their superior lord; and entreated him to employ his authority, and prevent their final ruin and oppression. Philip perceived his advantage, opened his mind to great projects, interposed in behalf of the French barons, and began to talk in a high and menacing style to the king of England. John, who could not disavow Philip's authority, replied, that it belonged to himself first to grant them a trial by their peers in his own court; it was not till he failed in this duty, that he was answerable to his peers in the supreme court of the French king; and he promised by a fair and equitable judicature, to give satisfaction to his barons. When the nobles, in consequence of this engagement, demanded a safe-conduct, that they might attend his court, he at first refused it; upon the renewal of Philip's menaces, he promised to grant their demand; he violated this promise; fresh menaces extorted from him a promise to surrender to Philip the fortresses of Tillieres and Boutavant, as a security for performance; he again violated this engagement; his enemies, sensible both of his weakness and want of faith, combined still closer in the resolution of pushing him to extremities; and a new and powerful ally soon appeared to encourage them in their invasion of this odious and despicable government.

The young duke of Britany, who was now rising to man's estate, sensible of the dangerous character of his uncle, determined to seek both his security and elevation by a union with Philip and the malecontent barons. He joined the French army, which had begun hostilities against the king of England: he was received with great marks of distinction by Philip; was knighted by him; espoused his daughter Mary; and was invested not only in the duchy of Britany, but in the counties of Anjou and Maine, which he had formerly resigned to his uncle. Every attempt succeeded with the allies. Tillieres and Boutevant were taken by Philip, after making a feeble defence: Mortimar and Lyons fell into his hands almost without resistance. That prince next invested Gournai; and opening the sluices of a lake which lay in the neighbourhood, poured such a torrent of water into the place, that the garrison deserted it, and the French monarch, without striking a blow, made himself master of that important fortress. The progress of the French arms was rapid, and promised more considerable success than usually in that age attended military enterprises. In answer to every advance which the king made towards peace, Philip still insisted, that he should resign all his transmarine dominions to his nephew, and rest contented with the kingdom of England; when an event happened, which seemed to turn the scales in favour of John, and to give him a decisive superiority over his enemies.

Young Arthur, fond of military renown, had broken into Poitou at the head of a small army; and passing near Mirabeau, he heard that his grandmother Queen Eleanor, who had always opposed his interests, was lodged in that place, and was protected by a weak garrison and ruinous fortifications. He immediately determined to lay siege to the fortress, and make himself master of her person: but John, roused from his indolence by so pressing an occasion, collected an army of English and Brabançons, and advanced from Normandy with hasty marches to the relief of the queen-mother. He fell on Arthur's camp before that prince was aware of the danger; dispersed his army; took him prisoner, together with the Count de la Marche, Geoffrey de Lusignan, and the most considerable of the revolted barons; and returned in triumph to Normandy. Philip, who was lying before Arques in that duchy, raised the siege and retired, upon his approach. The greater part of the prisoners were sent over to England; but Arthur was shut up in the castle of Falaise.

The king had here a conference with his nephew; represented to him the folly of his pretensions; and required him to renounce the French alliance, which had encouraged him to live in a state of enmity with all his family: but the brave, though imprudent youth, rendered more haughty from misfortunes, maintained the justice of his cause; asserted his claim, not only to the French provinces, but to the crown of England; and, in his turn, required the king to restore the son of his elder brother to the possession of his inheritance. John, sensible, from these symptoms of spirit, that the young prince, though now a prisoner, might hereafter prove a dangerous enemy, determined to prevent all future peril by dispatching his nephew: and Arthur was never more heard of. The circumstances which attended this deed of darkness were, no doubt, carefully concealed by the actors, and are variously related by historians: but the most probable account is as follows: the king, it is said, first proposed to William de la Bray, one of his servants, to dispatch Arthur; but William replied, that he was a gentleman, not a hangman; and he positively refused compliance. Another instrument of murder was found, and was dispatched with proper orders, to Falaise; but Hubert de Bourg, chamberlain to the king, and constable of the castle, feigning that he himself would execute the king's mandate, sent back the assassin, spread the report that the young prince was dead, and publicly performed all the ceremonies of his interment: but finding, that the Bretons vowed revenge for the murder, and that all the revolted barons persevered more obstinately in their rebellion, he thought it prudent to reveal the secret, and to inform the world that the duke of Britany was still alive, and in his custody. This discovery proved fatal to the young prince: John first removed him to the castle of Rouen, and coming in a boat, during the night-time, to that place, commanded Arthur to be brought forth to him. The young prince, aware of his danger, and now more subdued by the continuance of his misfortunes, and by the approach of death, threw himself on his knees before his uncle, and begged for mercy: but the barbarous tyrant, making no reply, stabbed him with his own hands; and fastening a stone to the dead body, threw it into the Seine.

All men were struck with horror at this inhuman deed; and from that moment the king, detested by his subjects, retained a very precarious authority over both the people and the barons in his dominions. The Bretons, enraged at this disappointment in their fond hopes, waged implacable war against him; and fixing the succession of their government, put themselves in a posture to revenge the murder of their sovereign. John had got into his power his niece, Eleanor, sister to Arthur, commonly called the Damsel of Britany; and carrying her over to England, detained her ever after in captivity: but the Bretons in despair of recovering this princess, chose Alice for their sovereign; a younger daughter of Constantia, by her second marriage with Guy de Thouars; and they intrusted the government of the duchy to that nobleman. The states of Britany, meanwhile, carried their complaints before Philip as their liege lord, and demanded justice for the violence committed by John on the person of Arthur, so near a relation, who, notwithstanding the homage which he did to Normandy, was always regarded as one of the chief vassals of the crown. Philip received their application with pleasure; summoned John to stand a trial before him, and on his non-appearance passed sentence, with the concurrence of the peers, upon that prince; declared him guilty of felony and parricide; and adjudged him to forfeit to his superior lord all his seignories and fiefs in France.

The king of France, whose ambitious and active spirit had been hitherto confined, either by the sound policy of Henry, or the martial genius of Richard, seeing now the opportunity favourable against this base and odious prince, embraced the project of expelling the English, or rather the English king, from France, and of annexing to the crown so many considerable fiefs, which, during several ages, had been dismembered from it. Many of the other great vassals, whose jealousy might have interposed, and have obstructed the execution of this project, were not at present in a situation to oppose it; and the rest either looked on with indifference, or gave their assistance to this dangerous aggrandizement of their superior lord. The earls of Flanders and Blois were engaged in the holy war: the count of Champagne was an infant, and under the guardianship of Philip: the duchy of Brittany, enraged at the murder of their prince, vigorously promoted all his measures: and the general defection of John's vassals made every enterprise easy and successful against him. Philip, after taking several castles and fortresses beyond the Loire, which he either garrisoned or dismantled, received the submissions of the count of Alençon, who deserted John, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French: upon which Philip broke up his camp, in order to give the troops some repose after the fatigues of the campaign. John, suddenly collecting some forces, laid siege to Alençon; and Philip, whose dispersed army could not be brought together in time to succour it, saw himself exposed to the disgrace of suffering the oppression of his friend and confederate. But his active and fertile genius found an expedient against this evil. There was held at that very time a tournament at Moret in the Gatinois; whither all the chief nobility of France and the neighbouring countries had resorted, in order to signalize their prowess and address. Philip presented himself before them; craved their assistance in his distress; and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the most honourable field in which they could display their generosity and martial spirit. Those valorous knights vowed that they would take vengeance on the base parricide, the stain of arms and of chivalry; and putting themselves, with all their retinue, under the command of Philip, instantly marched to raise the siege of Alençon. John, hearing of their approach, fled from before the place; and in the hurry abandoned all his tents, machines, and baggage, to the enemy.

This feeble effort was the last exploit of that slothful and cowardly prince for the defence of his dominions. He thenceforth remained in total inactivity at Rouen, passing all his time, with his young wife, in pastimes and amusements, as if his state had been in the most profound tranquillity, or his affairs in the most prosperous condition. If he ever mentioned war, it was only to give himself vaunting airs, which, in the eyes of all men, rendered him still more despicable and ridiculous. "Let the French go on," said he, "I will retake in a day what it has cost them years to acquire." His stupidity and indolence appeared so extraordinary, that the people endeavoured to account for the infatuation by sorcery, and believed that he was thrown into this lethargy by some magic or witchcraft. The English barons, finding that their time was wasted to no purpose, and that they must suffer the disgrace of seeing, without resistance, the progress of the French arms, withdrew from their colours, and secretly returned to their own country. No one thought of defending a man, who seemed to have deserted himself; and his subjects regarded his fate with the same indifference, to which, in this pressing exigency, they saw him totally abandoned.

John, while he neglected all domestic resources, had the meanness to betake himself to a foreign power, whose protection he claimed: he applied to the pope, Innocent III. and entreated him to interpose his authority between him and the French monarch. Innocent, pleased with any occasion of exerting his superiority, sent Philip orders to stop the progress of his arms, and to make peace with the king of England. But the French barons received the message with indignation; disclaimed the temporal authority assumed by the pontiff, and vowed, that they would, to the uttermost, assist their prince against all his enemies: Philip, seconding their ardour, proceeded, instead of obeying the pope's envoys, to lay siege to Chateau Gaillard, the most considerable fortress which remained to guard the frontiers of Normandy.

Chateau Gaillard was situated partly on an island in the river Seine, partly on a rock opposite to it; and was secured by every advantage which either art or nature could bestow upon it. The late king, having cast his eye on this favourable situation, had spared no labour or expense in fortifying it; and it was defended by Roger de Laci, constable of Chester, a determined officer, at the head of a numerous garrison. Philip, who despaired of taking the place by force, purposed to reduce it by famine; and that he might cut off its communication with the neighbouring country, he threw a bridge across the Seine, while he himself with his army blockaded it by land. The earl of Pembroke, the man of greatest vigour and capacity in the English court, formed a plan for breaking through the French entrenchments, and throwing relief into the place. He carried with him an army of 4000 infantry and 3000 cavalry, and suddenly attacked, with great success, Philip's camp in the night-time; having left orders, that a fleet of seventy flat-bottomed vessels should sail up the Seine, and fall at the same instant on the bridge. But the wind and the current of the river, by retarding the vessels, disconcerted this plan of operations; and it was morning before the fleet appeared; when Pembroke, though successful in the beginning of the action, was already repulsed with considerable loss, and the king of France had leisure to defend himself against these new assailants, who also met with a repulse. After this misfortune, John made no further efforts for the relief of Chateau Gaillard; and Philip had all the leisure requisite for conducting and finishing the siege. Roger de Laci defended himself for a twelvemonth with great obstinacy; and having bravely repelled every attack, and patiently borne all the hardships of famine, he was at last overpowered by a sudden assault in the night-time, and made prisoner of war, with his garrison. Philip, who knew how to respect valour even in an enemy, treated him with civility, and gave him the whole city of Paris for the place of his confinement.

When this bulwark of Normandy was once subdued, all the province lay open to the inroads of Philip; and the king of England despaired of being any longer able to defend it. He secretly prepared vessels for a scandalous flight; and that the Normans might no longer doubt of his resolution to abandon them, he ordered the fortifications of Pont de l'Arche, Moulineaux, and Montfort l'Amauri to be demolished. Not daring to repose confidence in any of his barons, whom he believed to be universally engaged in a conspiracy against him, he intrusted the government of the province to Archas Martin and Lupicaire, two mercenary Brabançons, whom he had retained in his service. Philip, now secure of his prey, pushed his conquests with vigour and success against the dismayed Normans. Falaise was first besieged; and Lupicaire, who commanded in this impregnable fortress, after surrendering the place, enlisted himself with his troops in the service of Philip, and carried on hostilities against his ancient master. Caen, Coutance, Seez, Evreux, and Baieux, soon fell into the hands of the French monarch, and all lower Normandy was reduced under his dominion. To forward his enterprises on the other division of the province, Gui de Thouars, at the head of the Bretons, broke into the territory, and took Mount St. Michael, Avranches, and all the other fortresses in that neighbourhood. The Normans, who abhorred the French yoke, and who would have defended themselves to the last extremity if their prince had appeared to conduct them, found no resource but in submission; and every city opened its gates as soon as Philip appeared before it. Rouen alone, Arques, and Verneuil, determined to maintain their liberties; and formed a confederacy for mutual defence. Philip began with the siege of Rouen: the inhabitants were so inflamed with hatred to France, that, on the appearance of his army, they fell on all the natives of the country, whom they found within their walls, and put them to death. But after the French king had begun his operations with success, and had taken some of their outworks, the citizens, seeing no resource, offered to capitulate; and demanded only thirty days to advertise their prince of their danger, and to require succours against the enemy. Upon the expiration of the term, as no supply had arrived, they opened their gates to Philip; and the whole province soon after imitated the example, and submitted to the victor. Thus was this important territory re-united to the crown of France, about three centuries after the cession of it by Charles the Simple to Rollo, the first duke: and the Normans, sensible that this conquest was probably final, demanded the privilege of being governed by French laws; which Philip, making a few alterations on the ancient Norman customs, readily granted them. But the French monarch had too much ambition and genius to stop in his present career of success. He carried his victorious army into the western provinces; soon reduced Anjou, Maine, Touraine, and part of Poitou; and in this manner, the French crown, during the reign of one able and active prince, received such an accession of power and grandeur, as, in the ordinary course of things, it would have required several ages to attain.

John, on his arrival in England, that he might cover the disgrace of his own conduct, exclaimed loudly against his barons, who, he pretended, had deserted his standard in Normandy; and he arbitrarily extorted from them a seventh of all their moveables, as a punishment for the offence. Soon after he forced them to grant him a scutage of two marks and a half on each knight's fee for an expedition into Normandy; but he did not attempt to execute the service for which he pretended to exact it. Next year, he summoned all the barons of his realm to attend him on this foreign expedition, and collected ships from all the sea-ports; but meeting with opposition from some of his ministers, and abandoning his design, he dismissed both fleet and army, and then renewed his exclamations against the barons for deserting him. He next put to sea with a small army, and his subjects believed, that he was resolved to expose himself to the utmost hazard for the defence and recovery of his dominions: but they were surprised, after a few days, to see him return again into harbour without attempting any thing. In the subsequent season, he had the courage to carry his hostile measures a step further. Gui de Thouars, who governed Brittany, jealous of the rapid progress made by his ally, the French king, promised to join the king of England with all his forces; and John ventured abroad with a considerable army, and landed at Rochelle. He marched to Angers; which he took and reduced to ashes. But the approach of Philip with an army threw him into a panic; and he immediately made proposals for peace, and fixed a place of interview with his enemy: but instead of keeping his engagement, he stole off with his army, embarked at Rochelle, and returned, loaded with new shame and disgrace, into England. The mediation of the pope procured him at last a truce for two years with the French monarch; almost all the transmarine provinces were ravished from him; and his English barons, though harassed with arbitrary taxes and fruitless expeditions, saw themselves and their country baffled and affronted in every enterprise.

In an age when personal valour was regarded as the chief accomplishment, such conduct as that of John, always disgraceful, must be exposed to peculiar contempt; and he must thenceforth have expected to rule his turbulent vassals with a very doubtful authority. But the government exercised by the Norman princes had wound up the royal power to so high a pitch, and so much beyond the usual tenor of the feudal constitutions, that it still behoved him to be debased by new affronts and disgraces, ere his barons could entertain the view of conspiring against him, in order to retrench his prerogatives. The church, which, at that time, declined not a contest with the most powerful and most vigorous monarchs, took first advantage of John's imbecility; and, with the most aggravating circumstances of insolence and scorn, fixed her yoke upon him.

The papal chair was then filled by Innocent III. who, having attained that dignity at the age of thirty-seven years, and being endowed with a lofty and enterprising genius, gave full scope to his ambition, and attempted, perhaps more openly than any of his predecessors, to convert that superiority, which was yielded him by all the European princes, into a real dominion over them. The hierarchy, protected by the Roman pontiff, had already carried to an enormous height its usurpations upon the civil power; but in order to extend them further, and render them useful to the court of Rome, it was necessary to reduce the ecclesiastics themselves under an absolute monarchy, and to make them entirely dependent on their spiritual leader. For this purpose, Innocent first attempted to impose taxes at pleasure upon the clergy; and in the first year of this century, taking advantage of the popular frenzy for crusades, he sent collectors over all Europe, who levied, by his authority, the fortieth of all ecclesiastical revenues for the relief of the Holy Land, and received the voluntary contributions of the laity to a like amount. The same year Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, attempted another innovation, favourable to ecclesiastical and papal power: in the king's absence, he summoned, by his legantine authority, a synod of all the English clergy, contrary to the inhibition of Geoffrey Fitz-Peter, the chief justiciary; and no proper censure was ever passed on this encroachment, the first of the kind, upon the royal power. But a favourable incident soon after happened, which enabled so aspiring a pontiff as Innocent to extend still further his usurpations on so contemptible a prince as John.

Hubert the primate, died in 1205; and as the monks or canons of Christ-church, Canterbury, possessed a right of voting in the election of their archbishop, some of the juniors of the order, who lay in wait for that event, met clandestinely the very night of Hubert's death; and, without any cong   d'  lire from the king, chose Reginald, their sub-prior, for the successor; installed him in the archiepiscopal throne before midnight; and having enjoined him in the strictest secrecy, sent him immediately to Rome, in order to solicit the confirmation of his election. The vanity of Reginald prevailed over his prudence; and he no sooner arrived in Flanders, than he revealed to every one the purpose of his journey, which was immediately known in England. The king was enraged at the novelty and temerity of the attempt, in filling so important an office without his knowledge or consent: the suffragan bishops of Canterbury, who were accustomed to concur in the choice of their primate, were no less displeased at the exclusion given them in this election. the senior monks of Christ-church were injured by the irregular proceedings of their juniors: the juniors themselves, ashamed of their conduct, and disgusted with the levity of Reginald, who had broken his engagements with them, were willing to set aside his election: and all men concurred in the design of remedying the false measures which had been taken. But as John knew that this affair would be canvassed before a superior tribunal, where the interposition of royal authority in bestowing ecclesiastical benefices was very invidious; where even the cause of suffragan bishops was not so favourable as that of monks; he determined to make the new election entirely unexceptionable: he submitted the affair wholly to the canons of Christ-church; and departing from the right claimed by his predecessors, ventured no further than to inform them privately, that they would do him an acceptable service if they chose John de Gray, bishop of Norwich, for their primate. The election of that prelate was accordingly made without a contradictory vote; and the king, to obviate all contests, endeavoured to persuade the suffragan bishops not to insist on their claim of concurring in the election: but those prelates, persevering in their pretensions, sent an agent to maintain their cause before Innocent; while the king, and the convent of Christ-church, dispatched twelve monks of that order to support, before the same tribunal, the election of the bishop of Norwich.

Thus there lay three different claims before the pope, whom all parties allowed to be the supreme arbiter in the contest. The claim of the suffragans, being so opposite to the usual maxims of the papal court, was soon set aside: the election of Reginald was so obviously fraudulent and irregular, that there was no possibility of defending it: but Innocent maintained, that though this election was null and invalid, it ought previously to have been declared such by the sovereign pontiff, before the monks could proceed to a new election; and that the choice of the bishop of Norwich was of course as uncanonical as that of his competitor. Advantage was therefore taken of this subtlety for introducing a precedent, by which the see of Canterbury, the most important dignity in the church after the papal throne, should ever after be at the disposal of the court of Rome.

While the pope maintained so many fierce contests, in order to wrest from princes the right of granting investitures, and to exclude laymen from all authority in conferring ecclesiastical benefices, he was supported by the united influence of the clergy, who, aspiring to independence, fought, with all the ardour of ambition, and all the zeal of superstition, under his sacred banners. But no sooner was this point, after a great effusion of blood and the convulsions of many states, established in some tolerable degree, than the victorious leader, as is usual, turned his arms against his own community, and aspired to centre all power in his person. By the invention of reserves, provisions, commendams, and other devices, the pope gradually assumed the right of filling vacant benefices; and the plenitude of his apostolic power, which was not subject to any limitations, supplied all defects of title in the person on whom he bestowed preferment. The canons which regulated elections were purposely rendered intricate and involved: frequent disputes rose among candidates: appeals were every day carried to Rome: the apostolic see, besides reaping pecuniary advantages from these contests, often exercised the power of setting aside both the litigants, and, on pretence of appeasing faction, nominated a third person, who might be more acceptable to the contending parties.

The present controversy about the election to the see of Canterbury afforded Innocent an opportunity of claiming this right; and he failed not to perceive and avail himself of the advantage. He sent for the twelve monks deputed by the convent to maintain the cause of the bishop of Norwich; and commanded them, under the penalty of excommunication, to choose for their primate, Cardinal Langton, an Englishman by birth, but educated in France, and connected, by his interest and attachments, with the see of Rome. In vain did the monks represent, that they had received from their convent no authority for this purpose; that an election, without a previous writ from the king, would be deemed highly irregular; and that they were merely agents for another person, whose right they had no power or pretence to abandon. None of them had the courage to persevere in this opposition, except one, Elias de Brantefield: all the rest, overcome by the menaces and authority of the pope, complied with his orders, and made the election required of them.

Innocent, sensible that this flagrant usurpation would be highly resented by the court of England, wrote John a mollifying letter; sent him four golden rings set with precious stones; and endeavoured to enhance the value of the present, by informing him of the many mysteries implied in it. He begged him to consider seriously the form of the rings, their number, their matter, and their colour. Their form, he said, being round, shadowed out eternity, which had neither beginning nor end; and he ought thence to learn his duty of aspiring from earthly objects to heavenly, from things temporal to things eternal. The number four, being a square, denoted steadiness of mind, not to be subverted either by adversity or prosperity, fixed for ever on the firm basis of the four cardinal virtues. Gold, which is the matter, being the most precious of metals, signified wisdom, which is the most valuable of all accomplishments, and justly preferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all exterior attainments. The blue colour of the sapphire represented Faith; the verdure of the emerald, Hope; the redness of the ruby, Charity; and the splendour of the topaz, Good Works. By these conceits, Innocent endeavoured to repay John for one of the most important prerogatives of his crown, which he had ravished from him; conceits probably admired by Innocent himself: for it is easily possible for a man, especially in a barbarous age, to unite strong talents for business with an absurd taste for literature and the arts.

John was inflamed with the utmost rage when he heard of this attempt of the court of Rome; and he immediately vented his passion on the monks of Christ-church, whom he found inclined to support the election made by their fellows at Rome. He sent Fulke de Cantelupe and Henry de Cornhulle, two knights of his retinue, men of violent tempers and rude manners, to expel them from the convent, and take possession of their revenues. These knights entered the monastery with drawn swords, commanded the prior and the monks to depart the kingdom, and menaced them, that, in case of disobedience, they would instantly burn them with the convent. Innocent, prognosticating, from the violence and imprudence of these measures, that John would finally sink in the contest, persevered the more vigorously in his pretensions, and exhorted the king not to oppose God and the church any longer, nor to prosecute that cause for which the holy martyr St. Thomas had sacrificed his life, and which had exalted him equal to the highest saints in heaven: a clear hint to John to profit by the example of his father, and to remember the prejudices and established principles of his subjects, who bore a profound veneration to that martyr, and regarded his merits as the subject of their chief glory and exultation.

Innocent, finding that John was not sufficiently tamed to submission, sent three prelates, the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to intimate, that if he persevered in his disobedience, the sovereign pontiff would be obliged to lay the kingdom under an interdict. All the other prelates threw themselves on their knees before him, and entreated him, with tears in their eyes, to prevent the scandal of this sentence, by making a speedy submission to his spiritual father, by receiving from his hands the new-elected primate, and by restoring the monks of Christ-church to all their rights and possessions. He burst out into the most indecent invectives against the prelates; swore by God's teeth (his usual oath), that if the pope presumed to lay his kingdom under an interdict, he would send to him all the bishops and clergy in England, and would confiscate all their estates; and threatened, that if thenceforth he caught any Romans in his dominions, he would put out their eyes and cut off their noses, in order to set a mark upon them which might distinguish them from all other nations. Amidst all this idle violence, John stood on such bad terms with his nobility, that he never dared to assemble the states of the kingdom, who, in so just a cause, would probably have adhered to any other monarch, and have defended with vigour the liberties of the nation against these palpable usurpations of the court of Rome. Innocent, therefore, perceiving the king's weakness, fulminated at last the sentence of interdict, which he had for some time held suspended over him.

The sentence of interdict was at that time the great instrument of vengeance and policy employed by the court of Rome; was denounced against sovereigns for the lightest offences; and made the guilt of one person involve the ruin of millions, even in their spiritual and eternal welfare. The execution of it was calculated to strike the senses in the highest degree, and to operate with irresistible force on the superstitious minds of the people. The nation was of a sudden deprived of all exterior exercise of its religion: the altars were despoiled of their ornaments. The crosses, the relics, the images, the statues of the saints, were laid on the ground; and, as if the air itself were profaned, and might pollute them by its contact, the priests carefully covered them up, even from their own approach and veneration. The use of bells entirely ceased in all the churches: the bells themselves were removed from the steeples, and laid on the ground with the other sacred utensils. Mass was celebrated with shut doors, and none but the priests were admitted to that holy institution. The laity partook of no religious rite, except baptism to new-born infants, and the communion to the dying: the dead were not interred in consecrated ground: they were thrown into ditches, or buried in common fields; and their obsequies were not attended with prayers, or any hallowed ceremony. Marriage was celebrated in the church-yards; and that every action in life might bear the marks of this dreadful situation, the people were prohibited the use of meat, as in Lent, or times of the highest penance; were debarred from all pleasures and entertainments; and were forbidden even to salute each other, or so much as to shave their beards, and give any decent attention to their person and apparel. Every circumstance carried symptoms of the deepest distress, and of the most immediate apprehensions of divine vengeance and indignation.

The king, that he might oppose his temporal to their spiritual terrors, immediately, from his own authority, confiscated the estates of all the clergy who obeyed the interdict; banished the prelates, confined the monks in their convents, and gave them only such a small allowance from their own estates as would suffice to provide them with food and raiment. He treated with the utmost rigour all Langton's adherents, and every one that showed any disposition to obey the command of Rome: and in order to distress the clergy in the tenderest point, and at the same time expose them to reproach and ridicule, he threw into prison all their concubines, and required high fines as the price of their liberty.

After the canons which established the celibacy of the clergy were, by the zealous endeavours of Archbishop Anselm, more rigorously executed in England, the ecclesiastics gave, almost universally and avowedly, into the use of concubinage; and the court of Rome, which had no interest in prohibiting this practice, made very slight opposition to it. The custom was become so prevalent, that, in some cantons of Switzerland, before the reformation, the laws not only permitted, but, to avoid scandal, enjoined the use of concubines to the younger clergy; and it was usual every where for priests to apply to the ordinary, and obtain from him a formal liberty for this indulgence. The bishop commonly took care to prevent the practice from degenerating into licentiousness: he confined the priest to the use of one woman, required him to be constant to her bed, obliged him to provide for her subsistence and that of her children; and though the offspring was, in the eye of the law, deemed illegitimate, this commerce was really a kind of inferior marriage, such as is still practised in Germany among the nobles; and may be regarded by the candid as an appeal from the tyranny of civil and ecclesiastical institutions, to the more virtuous and more unerring laws of nature.

The quarrel between the king and the see of Rome continued for some years; and though many of the clergy, from the fear of punishment, obeyed the orders of John, and celebrated divine service, they complied with the utmost reluctance, and were regarded, both by themselves and the people, as men who betrayed their principles, and sacrificed their conscience to temporal regards and interests. During this violent situation, the king, in order to give a lustre to his government, attempted military expeditions against Scotland, against Ireland, against the Welsh; and he commonly prevailed, more from the weakness of his enemies, than from his own vigour or abilities. Meanwhile, the danger to which his government stood continually exposed from the discontents of the ecclesiastics, increased his natural propensity to tyranny; and he seems to have even wantonly disgusted all orders of men, especially his nobles, from whom alone he could reasonably expect support and assistance. He dishonoured their families by his licentious amours; he published edicts, prohibiting them from hunting feathered game, and thereby restrained them from their favourite occupation and amusement; he ordered all the hedges and fences near his forests to be levelled, that his deer might have more ready access into the fields for pasture; and he continually loaded the nation with arbitrary impositions. Conscious of the general hatred which he had incurred, he required his nobility to give him hostages for security of their allegiance; and they were obliged to put into his hands their sons, nephews, or near relations. When his messengers came with like orders to the castle of William de Braouse, a baron of great note, the lady of that nobleman replied, That she would never intrust her son into the hands of one who had murdered his own nephew while in his custody. Her husband reproved her for the severity of this speech; but, sensible of his danger, he immediately fled with his wife and son into Ireland, where he endeavoured to conceal himself. The king discovered the unhappy family in their retreat; seized the wife and son, whom he starved to death in prison; and the baron himself narrowly escaped, by flying into France.

The court of Rome had artfully contrived a gradation of sentences; by which she kept offenders in awe; still afforded them an opportunity of preventing the next anathema by submission; and, in case of their obstinacy, was able to refresh the horror of the people against them, by new denunciations of the wrath and vengeance of Heaven. As the sentence of interdict had not produced the desired effect on John, and as his people, though extremely discontented, had hitherto been restrained from rising in open rebellion against him, he was soon to look for the sentence of excommunication: and he had reason to apprehend, that notwithstanding all his precautions, the most dangerous consequences might ensue from it. He was witness of the other scenes which at that very time were acting in Europe, and which displayed the unbounded and uncontrolled power of the papacy. Innocent, far from being dismayed at his contests with the king of England, had excommunicated the Emperor Otho, John's nephew; and soon brought that powerful and haughty prince to submit to his authority. He published a crusade against the Albigenses, a species of enthusiasts in the south of France, whom he denominated heretics; because, like other enthusiasts, they neglected the rites of the church, and opposed the power and influence of the clergy: the people from all parts of Europe, moved by their superstition and their passion for wars and adventures, flocked to his standard. Simon de Montfort, the general of the crusade, acquired to himself a sovereignty in these provinces: the count of Toulouse, who protected, or perhaps only tolerated the Albigenses, was stripped of his dominions: and these sectaries themselves, though the most innocent and inoffensive of mankind, were exterminated with all the circumstances of extreme violence and barbarity. Here were therefore both an army and a general, dangerous from their zeal and valour, who might be directed to act against John; and Innocent, after keeping the thunder long suspended, gave at last authority to the bishops of London, Ely, and Worcester, to fulminate the sentence of excommunication against him. These prelates obeyed; though their brethren were deterred from publishing, as the pope required of them, the sentence in the several churches of their dioceses.

No sooner was the excommunication known, than the effects of it appeared. Geoffrey, archdeacon of Norwich, who was intrusted with a considerable office in the court of exchequer, being informed of it while sitting on the bench, observed to his colleagues the danger of serving under an excommunicated king; and he immediately left his chair, and departed the court. John gave orders to seize him, to throw him into prison, to cover his head with a great leaden cope; and by this and other severe usage he put an end to his life. Nor was there any thing wanting to Geoffrey, except the dignity and rank of Becket, to exalt him to an equal station in heaven with that great and celebrated martyr. Hugh de Wells, the chancellor, being elected, by the king's appointment, bishop of Lincoln, upon a vacancy in that see, desired leave to go abroad, in order to receive consecration from the archbishop of Rouen; but he no sooner reached France than he hastened to Pontigny, where Langton then resided, and paid submissions to him as his primate. The bishops, finding themselves exposed either to the jealousy of the king or hatred of the people, gradually stole out of the kingdom; and at last there remained only three prelates to perform the functions of the episcopal office. Many of the nobility terrified by John's tyranny, and obnoxious to him on different accounts, imitated the example of the bishops; and most of the others who remained were, with reason, suspected of having secretly entered into a confederacy against him. John was alarmed at his dangerous situation; a situation which prudence, vigour, and popularity, might formerly have prevented, but which no virtues or abilities were now sufficient to retrieve. He desired a conference with Langton at Dover; offered to acknowledge him as primate, to submit to the pope, to restore the exiled clergy, and even to pay them a limited sum as a compensation for the rents of their confiscated estates. But Langton, perceiving his advantage, was not satisfied with these concessions: he demanded that full restitution and reparation should be made to all the clergy; a condition so exorbitant that the king, who probably had not the power of fulfilling it, and who foresaw that this estimation of damages might amount to an immense sum, finally broke off the conference.

The next gradation of papal sentences was to absolve John's subjects from their oaths of fidelity and allegiance, and to declare every one excommunicated who had any commerce with him in public or in private; at his table, in his council, or even in private conversation: and this sentence was accordingly, with all imaginable solemnity, pronounced against him. But as John still persevered in his contumacy, there remained nothing but the sentence of deposition; which, though intimately connected with the former, had been distinguished from it by the artifice of the court of Rome; and Innocent determined to dart this last thunderbolt against the refractory monarch. But as a sentence of this kind required an armed force to execute it, the pontiff, casting his eyes around, fixed at last on Philip king of France, as the person into whose powerful hand he could most properly intrust that weapon, the ultimate resource of his ghostly authority. And he offered the monarch, besides the remission of all his sins and endless spiritual benefits, the property and possession of the kingdom of England, as the reward of his labour.

Lingard, on the faith of the Monk Paris, a contemporary historian, relates the following almost incredible account of the weakness and baseness of John's conduct during the expectation of this appalling sentence:—"To fortify himself against the pope, he solicited the aid of Mohammed al Nassir, who had assumed the usual appellation of the Emir al Moumenim, and by his conquests in Spain had threatened to extirpate Christianity from the south of Europe. This secret negotiation was intrusted to the prudence of two knights, Thomas Hardington and Ralf Fitz-Nicholas, and of a clergyman called Robert of London. On their arrival at the palace of the Moor, they were successively conducted through several apartments lined with guards, whose arms, manners, and apparel, excited the wonder of the strangers. The emir himself, a man of moderate stature and grave aspect, kept his eyes fixed on a book lying before him. Having made their reverences, they presented John's letter, which was received and translated by an interpreter. It contained, if we may believe the report which was afterwards circulated, an offer of the English crown to the emir, and a promise on the part of John to embrace the Mohammedan faith. In this there is probably much exaggeration: but it would be difficult to determine the precise limits at which the desperation of a prince would stop, who with John's disposition should find himself in John's circumstances. The emir put to the envoys several pertinent questions, respecting the population and strength of the kingdom, the age, prospects, and character of the king: and dismissed them with general unmeaning expressions of amity. But as they retired, he recalled Robert, and adjured him, by his respect for the Christian faith, to say what kind of a man his master was. He honestly replied, that John was a tyrant, and would soon be deposed by his subjects. This was the only audience which they obtained. At their return the king gave to Robert, as the reward of his services, the custody of the abbey of St. Alban's during the interdict: a charge from which he contrived to collect for his own use above a thousand marks."

It was the common concern of all princes to oppose the exorbitant pretensions of the Roman pontiff, by which they themselves were rendered vassals, and vassals totally independent on the papal crown: yet even Philip, the most able monarch of the age, was seduced by present interest, and by the prospect of so tempting a prize, to accept this liberal offer of the pontiff, and thereby to ratify that authority which, if he ever opposed its boundless usurpations, might next day tumble him from the throne. He levied a great army; summoned all the vassals of the crown to attend him at Rouen; collected a fleet of 1700 vessels, great and small, in the sea-ports of Normandy and Picardy; and partly from the zealous spirit of the age, partly from the personal regard universally paid him, prepared a force, which seemed equal to the greatness of his enterprise. The king, on the other hand, issued out writs, requiring the attendance of all his military tenants at Dover, and even of all able-bodied men to defend the kingdom in this dangerous extremity. A great number appeared; and he selected an army of 60,000 men; a power invincible, had they been united in affection to their prince, and animated with a becoming zeal for the defence of their native country. But the people were swayed by superstition, and regarded their king with horror, as anathematized by papal censures: the barons, besides lying under the same prejudices, were all disgusted by his tyranny, and were, many of them, suspected of holding a secret correspondence with the enemy: and the incapacity and cowardice of the king himself, ill fitted to contend with those mighty difficulties, made men prognosticate the most fatal effects from the French invasion.

Pandolf, whom the pope had chosen for his legate, and appointed to head this important expedition, had, before he left Rome, applied for a secret conference with his master, and had asked him, whether if the king of England, in this desperate situation, were willing to submit to the apostolic see, the church should, without the consent of Philip, grant him any terms of accommodation? Innocent, expecting from his agreement with a prince so abject both in character and fortune, more advantages than from his alliance with a great and victorious monarch, who, after such mighty acquisitions, might become too haughty to be bound by spiritual chains, explained to Pandolf the conditions on which he was willing to be reconciled to the king of England. The legate, therefore, as soon as he arrived in the north of France, sent over two knights templars to desire an interview with John at Dover, which was readily granted: he there represented to him, in such strong, and probably in such true colours, his lost condition, the disaffection of his subjects, the secret combination of his vassals against him, the mighty armament of France, that John yielded at discretion, and subscribed to all the conditions which Pandolf was pleased to impose upon him. He promised, among other articles, that he would submit himself entirely to the judgment of the pope; that he would acknowledge Langton for primate; that he would restore all the exiled clergy and laity who had been banished on account of the contest; that he would make them full restitution of their goods, and compensation for all damages, and instantly consign eight thousand pounds in part payment; and that every one outlawed or imprisoned for his adherence to the pope, should immediately be received into grace and favour. Four barons swore, along with the king, to the observance of this ignominious treaty.

But the ignominy of the king was not yet carried to its full height. Pandolf required him, as the first trial of obedience, to resign his kingdom to the church; and he persuaded him, that he could no wise so effectually disappoint the French invasion, as by thus putting himself under the immediate protection of the apostolic see. John, lying under the agonies of present terror, made no scruple of submitting to this condition. He passed a charter, in which he said, that not constrained by fear, but of his own free will, and by the common advice and consent of his barons, he had, for remission of his own sins, and those of his family, resigned England and Ireland to God, to St. Peter and St. Paul, and to Pope Innocent and his successors in the apostolic chair: he agreed to hold these dominions as feudatory of the church of Rome, by the annual payment of a thousand marks; seven hundred for England, three hundred for Ireland: and he stipulated, that if he or his successors should ever presume to revoke or infringe this charter, they should instantly, except upon admonition they repented of their offence, forfeit all right to their dominions.

In consequence of this agreement, John did homage to Pandolf as the pope's legate, with all the submissive rites which the feudal law required of vassals before their liege-lord and superior; he came disarmed into the legate's presence, who was seated on a throne; he flung himself on his knees before him; he lifted up his joined hands, and put them within those of Pandolf; he swore fealty to the pope; and he paid part of the tribute which he owed for his kingdom as the patrimony of St. Peter. The legate, elated by this supreme triumph of sacerdotal power, could not forbear discovering extravagant symptoms of joy and exultation: he trampled on the money, which was laid at his feet, as an earnest of the subjection of the kingdom: an insolence of which, however offensive to the English, no one present, except the archbishop of Dublin, dared to take any notice. But though Pandolf had brought the king to submit to these base conditions, he still refused to free him from the excommunication and interdict, till an estimation should be taken of the losses of the ecclesiastics, and full compensation and restitution should be made them.

John, reduced to this abject situation under a foreign power, still showed the same disposition to tyrannise over his subjects, which had been the chief cause of all his misfortunes. One Peter Pomfret, a hermit, had foretold that the king, this very year, should lose his crown; and for that rash prophecy he had been thrown into prison in Corfe-castle. John now determined to bring him to punishment as an impostor; and though the man pleaded, that his prophecy was fulfilled, and that the king had lost the royal and independent crown which he formerly wore, the defence was supposed to aggravate his guilt: he was dragged at horses' tails, to the town of Warham, and there hanged on a gibbet with his son.

When Pandolf, after receiving the homage of John, returned to France, he congratulated Philip on the success of his pious enterprise; and informed him, that John, moved by the terror of the French arms, had now come to a just sense of his guilt; and returned to obedience under the apostolic see; and even consented to do homage to the pope for his dominions; and having thus made his kingdom a part of St. Peter's patrimony, had rendered it impossible for any Christian prince, without the most manifest and most flagrant impiety, to attack him. Philip was enraged on receiving this intelligence: he exclaimed, that having, at the pope's instigation, undertaken an expedition, which had cost him above 60,000 pounds sterling, he was frustrated of his purpose, at the time when its success was become infallible: he complained, that all the expense had fallen upon him; all the advantages had accrued to Innocent: he threatened to be no longer the dupe of these hypocritical pretences: and assembling his vassals, he laid before them the ill-treatment which he had received, exposed the interested and fraudulent conduct of the pope, and required their assistance to execute his enterprise against England, in which he told them, that, notwithstanding the inhibitions and menaces of the legate, he was determined to persevere. The French barons were, in that age, little less ignorant and superstitious than the English: yet, so much does the influence of those religious principles depend on the present dispositions of men! they all vowed to follow their prince on his intended expedition, and were resolute not to be disappointed of that glory and those riches which they had long expected from this enterprise. The earl of Flanders alone, who had previously formed a secret treaty with John, declaring against the injustice and impiety of the undertaking, retired with his forces; and Philip, that he might not leave so dangerous an enemy behind him, first turned his arms against the dominions of that prince. Meanwhile, the English fleet was assembled under the earl of Salisbury, the king's natural brother; and, though inferior in number, received orders to attack the French in their harbours. Salisbury performed this service with so much success, that he took three hundred ships; destroyed a hundred more: and Philip, finding it impossible to prevent the rest from falling into the hands of the enemy, set fire to them himself, and thereby rendered it impossible for him to proceed any further in his enterprise.

John, exulting in his present security, insensible to his past disgrace, was so elated with his success, that he thought of no less than invading France in his turn, and recovering all those provinces which the prosperous arms of Philip had formerly ravished from him. He proposed this expedition to the barons, who were already assembled for the defence of the kingdom. But the English nobles both hated and despised their prince: they prognosticated no success to any enterprise conducted by such a leader: and pretending that their time of service was elapsed, and all their provisions exhausted, they refused to second his undertaking. The king however, resolute in his purpose, embarked with a few followers, and sailed to Jersey, in the foolish expectation that the barons would at last be ashamed to stay behind. But finding himself disappointed, he returned to England; and raising some troops, threatened to take vengeance on all his nobles for their desertion and disobedience. The archbishop of Canterbury, who was in a confederacy with the barons, here interposed; strictly inhibited the king from thinking of such an attempt; and threatened him with a renewal of the sentence of excommunication, if he pretended to levy war upon any of his subjects, before the kingdom were freed from the sentence of interdict.

The church had recalled the several anathemas pronounced against John, by the same gradual progress with which she had at first issued them. By receiving his homage, and admitting him to the rank of a vassal, his deposition had been virtually annulled, and his subjects were again bound by their oaths of allegiance. The exiled prelates had then returned in great triumph, with Langton at their head; and the king, hearing of their approach, went forth to meet them, and throwing himself on the ground before them, he entreated them, with tears, to have compassion on him and the kingdom of England. The primate, seeing these marks of sincere penitence, led him to the chapter house of Winchester, and there administered an oath to him, by which he again swore fealty and obedience to Pope Innocent and his successors; promised to love, maintain and defend holy church and the clergy; engaged that he would re-establish the good laws of his predecessors, particularly those of St. Edward, and would abolish the wicked ones; and expressed his resolution of maintaining justice and right in all his dominions. The primate next gave him absolution in the requisite forms, and admitted him to dine with him, to the great joy of all the people. The sentence of interdict, however, was still upheld against the kingdom. A new legate, Nicholas, bishop of Frescati, came into England in the room of Pandolf; and he declared it to be the pope's intentions never to loosen that sentence till full restitution were made to the clergy of everything taken from them, and ample reparation for all damages which they had sustained. He only permitted mass to be said with a low voice in the churches, till those losses and damages could be estimated to the satisfaction of the parties. Certain barons were appointed to take an account of the claims; and John was astonished at the greatness of the sum to which the clergy made their losses to amount. No less than twenty thousand marks were demanded by the monks of Canterbury alone; twenty-three thousand for the see of Lincoln; and the king, finding these pretensions to be exorbitant and endless, offered the clergy the sum of a hundred thousand marks for a final acquittal. The clergy rejected the offer with disdain; but the pope, willing to favour his new vassal, whom he found zealous in his declarations of fealty, and regular in paying the stipulated tribute to Rome, directed his legate to accept of forty thousand. The issue of the whole was, that the bishops and considerable abbots got reparation beyond what they had any title to demand: the inferior clergy were obliged to sit down contented with their losses and the king, after the interdict was taken off, renewed in the most solemn manner, and by a new charter, sealed with gold, his professions of homage and obedience to the see of Rome.

When this vexatious affair was at last brought to a conclusion, the king, as if he had nothing farther to attend to but triumphs and victories, went over to Poitou, which still acknowledged his authority; and he carried war into Philip's dominions. He besieged a castle near Angiers; but the approach of Prince Lewis, Philip's son, obliged him to raise the siege with such precipitation, that he left his tents, machines, and baggage, behind him; and he returned to England with disgrace. About the same time, he heard of the great and decisive victory gained by the king of France at Bovines over the Emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of 150,000 Germans; a victory which established for ever the glory of Philip, and gave full security to all his dominions. John could, therefore, think thenceforth of nothing further, than of ruling peaceably his own kingdom; and his close connexions with the pope, which he was determined at any price to maintain, ensured him, as he imagined, the certain attainment of that object. But the last and most grievous scene of this prince's misfortunes still awaited him; and he was destined to pass through a series of more humiliating circumstances than had ever yet fallen to the lot of any other monarch.

The introduction of the feudal law into England by William the Conqueror had much infringed the liberties, however imperfect, enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxons in their ancient government, and had reduced the whole people to a state of vassalage under the king or barons, and even the greater part of them to a state of real slavery. The necessity also of entrusting great power in the hands of a prince, who was to maintain military dominion over a vanquished nation, had engaged the Norman barons to submit to a more severe and absolute prerogative, than that to which men of their rank, in other feudal governments, were commonly subjected. The power of the crown, once raised to a high pitch, was not easily reduced; and the nation, during the course of a hundred and fifty years, was governed by an authority unknown, in the same degree, to all kingdoms founded by the northern conquerors. Henry I., that he might allure the people to give an exclusion to his elder brother Robert, had granted them a charter, favourable in many particulars to their liberties; Stephen had renewed the grant; Henry II. had confirmed it: but the concessions of all these princes had still remained without effect; and the same unlimited, at least irregular authority, continued to be exercised both by them and their successors. The only happiness was, that arms were never yet ravished from the hands of the barons and people: the nation, by a great confederacy, might still vindicate its liberties: and nothing was more likely, than the character, conduct, and fortunes, of the reigning prince, to produce such a general combination against him. Equally odious and contemptible, both in public and private life, he affronted the barons by his insolence, dishonoured their families by his licentiousness, enraged them by his tyranny, and gave discontent to all ranks of men by his endless exactions and impositions. The effect of these lawless practices had already appeared in the general demand made by the barons of a restoration of their privileges; and after he had reconciled himself to the pope, by abandoning the independence of the kingdom, he appeared to all his subjects in so mean a light, that they universally thought they might with safety and honour insist upon their pretensions.

But nothing forwarded this confederacy so much as the concurrence of Langton, archbishop of Canterbury; a man whose memory, though he was obtruded on the nation by a palpable encroachment of the see of Rome, ought always to be respected by the English. This prelate, whether he was moved by the generosity of his nature, and his affection to public good; or had entertained an animosity against John on account of the long opposition made by that prince to his election; or thought that an acquisition of liberty to the people would serve to increase and secure the privileges of the church; had formed the plan of reforming the government, and had prepared the way for that great innovation, by inserting those singular clauses above mentioned in the oath which he administered to the king, before he would absolve him from the sentence of excommunication. Soon after, in a private meeting of some principal barons at London, he showed them a copy of Henry I.'s charter, which, he said, he had happily found in a monastery; and he exhorted them to insist on the renewal and observance of it: the barons swore, that they would sooner lose their lives than depart from so reasonable a demand. The confederacy began now to spread wider, and to comprehend almost all the barons in England; and a new and more numerous meeting was summoned by Langton at St. Edmondsbury, under colour of devotion. He again produced to the assembly the old charter of Henry; renewed his exhortations of unanimity and vigour in the prosecution of their purpose; and represented in the strongest colours the tyranny to which they had so long been subjected, and from which it now behoved them to free themselves and their posterity. The barons, inflamed by his eloquence, incited by the sense of their own wrongs, and encouraged by the appearance of their power and numbers, solemnly took an oath, before the high altar, to adhere to each other, to insist on their demands, and to make endless war on the king, till he should submit to grant them. They agreed, that, after the festival of Christmas, they would prefer in a body their common petition; and in the mean time, they separated, after mutually engaging, that they would put themselves in a posture of defence, would enlist men and purchase arms, and would supply their castles with the necessary provisions.

The barons appeared in London on the day appointed; and demanded of the king, that, in consequence of his own oath before the primate, as well as in deference to their just rights, he should grant them a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of St. Edward. The king, alarmed with their zeal and unanimity, as well as with their power, required a delay; promised that, at the festival of Easter, he would give them a positive answer to their petition; and offered them the archbishop of Canterbury, the bishop of Ely, and the earl of Pembroke, the mareschal, as sureties for his fulfilling this engagement. The barons accepted of the terms, and peaceably returned to their castles.

During this interval, John, in order to break or subdue the league of his barons, endeavoured to avail himself of the ecclesiastical power, of whose influence he had, from his own recent misfortunes, had such fatal experience. He granted to the clergy a charter, relinquishing for ever that important prerogative for which his father and all his ancestors had zealously contended; yielding to them the free election on all vacancies; reserving only the power to issue a congé d'elire, and to subjoin a confirmation of the election; and declaring that, if either of these were withheld, the choice should nevertheless be deemed just and valid. He made a vow to lead an army into Palestine against the infidels, and he took on him the cross; in hopes that he should receive from the church that protection which it tendered to every one that had entered into this sacred and meritorious engagement. And he sent to Rome his agent, William de Maucclerc, in order to appeal to the pope against the violence of his barons, and procure him a favourable sentence from that powerful tribunal. The barons also were not negligent on their part in endeavouring to engage the pope in their interests: they dispatched Eustace de Vescie to Rome; laid their case before Innocent as their feudal lord; and petitioned him to interpose his authority with the king, and oblige him to restore and confirm all their just and undoubted privileges.

Innocent beheld with regret the disturbances which had arisen in England, and was much inclined to favour John in his pretensions. He had no hopes of retaining and extending his newly-acquired superiority over that kingdom, but by supporting so base and degenerate a prince, who was willing to sacrifice every consideration to his present safety: and he foresaw, that if the administration should fall into the hands of those high-spirited barons, they would vindicate the privileges and independence of the laity, with the same ardour which they now exerted in defence of their own political rights. He wrote letters therefore to the prelates, to the nobility, and to the king himself. He exhorted the first to employ their good offices in conciliating peace between the contending parties, and putting an end to civil discord: to the second, he expressed his disapprobation of their conduct in employing force to extort concessions from their reluctant sovereign: the last, he advised to treat his nobles with grace and indulgence, and to grant them such of their demands as should appear just and reasonable.

The barons easily saw, from the tenor of these letters, that they must reckon on having the pope, as well as well as the king, for their adversary; but they had already advanced too far to recede from their pretensions, and their passions were so deeply engaged, that it exceeded even the power of superstition itself any longer to control him. They also foresaw, that the thunders of Rome, when not seconded by the efforts of the English ecclesiastics, would be of small avail against them; and they perceived, that the most considerable of the prelates, as well as all the inferior clergy, professed the highest approbation of their cause. Besides that these men were seized with the national passion for laws and liberty; blessings, of which they themselves expected to partake; there concurred very powerful causes to loosen their devoted attachment to the apostolic see. It appeared, from the late usurpations of the Roman pontiff, that he pretended to reap alone all the advantages accruing from that victory, which under his banners, though at their own peril, they had everywhere obtained over the civil magistrate. The pope assumed a despotic power over all the churches: their particular customs, privileges, and immunities were treated with disdain; even the canons of general councils were set aside by his dispensing power : the whole administration of the church was centred in the church of Rome : all preferments ran of course in the same channel : and the provincial clergy saw, at least felt, that there was a necessity for limiting these pretensions. The legate, Nicholas, in filling those numerous vacancies which had fallen in England during an interdict of six years, had proceeded in the most arbitrary manner ; and had paid no regard in conferring dignities to personal merit, to rank, to the inclination of the electors, or to the customs of the country. The English church was universally disgusted ; and Langton himself, though he owed his elevation to an encroachment of the Romish see, was no sooner established in his high office, than he became jealous of the privileges annexed to it, and formed attachments with the country subjected to its jurisdiction. These causes, though they opened slowly the eyes of men, failed not to produce their effect : they set bounds to the usurpations of the papacy : the tide first stopped, and then turned against the sovereign pontiff : and it is otherwise inconceivable, how that age, so prone to superstition, and so sunk in ignorance, or rather so devoted to a spurious erudition, could have escaped falling into an absolute and total slavery under the court of Rome.

About the time that the pope's letters arrived in England, the malecontent barons, on the approach of the festival of Easter, when they were to expect the king's answer to their petition, met by agreement at Stamford ; and they assembled a force, consisting of about 2000 knights, besides their retainers and inferior persons without number. Elated with their power, they advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, the place where the court then resided ; and they there received a message from the king, by the archbishop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke, desiring to know what those liberties were which they so zealously challenged from their sovereign. They delivered to these messengers a schedule containing the chief articles of their demands ; which was no sooner shown to the king, than he burst into a furious passion, and asked, why the barons did not also demand of him his kingdom ? swearing that he would never grant them such liberties as must reduce himself to slavery.

No sooner were the confederated nobles informed of John's reply, than they chose Robert Fitz-Walter their general, whom they called the mareschal of the army of God and of holy church ; and they proceeded without further ceremony to levy war upon the king. They besieged the castle of Northampton during fifteen days, though without success : the gates of Bedford-castle were willingly opened to them by William Beauchamp, its owner : they advanced to Ware in their way to London, where they held a correspondence with the principal citizens : they were received without opposition into that capital ; and finding now the great superiority of their force, they issued proclamations, requiring the other barons to join them ; and menacing them, in case of refusal or delay, with committing devastation on their houses and estates. In order to show what might be expected from their prosperous arms, they made incursions from London, and laid waste the king's parks and palaces ; and all the barons, who had hitherto carried the semblance of supporting the royal party, were glad of this pretence for openly joining a cause which they always had secretly favoured. The king was left at Odiham in Hampshire, with a poor retinue of only seven knights ; and after trying several expedients to elude the blow, after offering to refer all differences to the pope alone, or to eight barons, four to be chosen by himself, and four by the confederates, he found himself at last obliged to submit at discretion.

A conference between the king and the barons was appointed at Runnymede, between Windsor and Staines ; a place which has ever since been extremely celebrated, on account of this great event. The two parties encamped apart, like open enemies ; and after a debate of a few days, the king, with a facility somewhat suspicious, signed and sealed the charter which was required of him. This famous deed, commonly called the Great Charter, either granted or secured very important liberties and privileges to every order of men in the kingdom ; to the clergy, to the barons, and to the people.

Sir James Mackintosh details the completion of this great event in the following words :—

"It is needless," say the ancient writers, "to enumerate the barons who composed 'the army of God and of Holy Church ;' they were the whole nobility of England. A phrase nearly equivalent to what in modern language would be called the nobility and gentry. Their followers comprehended all the yeomen and free peasantry, while the accession of the capital was a pledge of the adherence of the citizens and burgesses. A safe-conduct was granted by John at Merton on the 8th of June, 1215, to the deputies of the barons, who were to meet him at Staines ; and two days afterwards, he, being at Windsor, agreed to a prolongation of the truce to Trinity Monday. On that day, the 15th of June, both parties advanced to a plain called Runnymede, on the banks of the Thames, where they encamped apart from each other, like declared enemies, and opened conferences which were not concluded till Friday the 19th of June, 1215."

The freedom of elections was secured to the clergy : the former charter of the king was confirmed, by which the necessity of a royal congé d'elire and confirmation was superseded : all check upon appeals to Rome was removed, by allowance granted every man to depart the kingdom at pleasure : and the fines to be imposed on the clergy, for any offence, were ordained to be proportional to their lay estates, not to their ecclesiastical benefices.

The privileges granted to the barons were either abatements in the rigour of the feudal law, or determinations in points which had been left by that law, or had become by practice arbitrary and ambiguous. The reliefs of heirs succeeding to a military fee were ascertained ; an earl's and baron's at a hundred marks, a knight's at a hundred shillings. It was ordained by the charter, that if the heir be a minor, he shall immediately, upon his majority, enter upon his estate, without paying any relief : the king shall not sell his wardship : he shall levy only reasonable profits upon the estate, without committing waste, or hurting the property : he shall uphold the castles, houses, mills, parks, and ponds : and if he commit the guardianship of the estate to the sheriff or any other, he shall previously oblige them to find surety to the same purpose. During the minority of a baron, while his lands are in wardship, and are not in his own possession, no debt which he owes to the Jews shall bear any interest. Heirs shall be married without disparagement; and before the marriage be contracted, the nearest relations of the person shall be informed of it. A widow, without paying any relief, shall enter upon her dower, the third part of her husband's rents: she shall not be compelled to marry, so long as she chooses to continue single; she shall only give security never to marry without her lord's consent. The king shall not claim the wardship of any minor who holds lands by military tenure of a baron, on pretence that he also holds lands of the crown, by soccage or any other tenure. Scutages shall be estimated at the same rate as in the time of Henry I.; and no scutage or aid, except in the three general feudal cases, the king's captivity, the knighting of his eldest son, and the marrying of his eldest daughter, shall be imposed but by the great council of the kingdom; the prelates, earls, and great barons, shall be called to this great council, each by a particular writ; the lesser barons by a general summons of the sheriff. The king shall not seize any baron's land for a debt to the crown, if the baron possesses as many goods and chattels as are sufficient to discharge the debt. No man shall be obliged to perform more service for his fee than he is bound to by his tenure. No governor or constable of a castle shall oblige any knight to give money for castle-guard, if the knight be willing to perform the service in person, or by another able-bodied man; and if the knight be in the field himself, by the king's command, he shall be exempted from all other service of this nature. No vassal shall be allowed to sell to much of his land as to incapacitate himself from performing his service to his lord.

These were the principal articles, calculated for the interest of the barons; and had the charter contained nothing further, national happiness and liberty had been very little promoted by it, as it would only have tended to increase the power and independence of an order of men who were already too powerful, and whose yoke might have become more heavy on the people than even that of an absolute monarch. But the barons, who alone drew and imposed on the prince this memorable charter, were necessitated to insert in it other clauses of a more extensive and more beneficent nature: they could not expect the concurrence of the people, without comprehending, together with their own, the interests of inferior ranks of men; and all provisions which the barons, for their own sake, were obliged to make, in order to ensure the free and equitable administration of justice, tended directly to the benefit of the whole community. The following were the principal clauses of this nature:—

It was ordained, that all the privileges and immunities above mentioned, granted to the barons against the king, should be extended by the barons to their inferior vassals. The king bound himself not to grant any writ, empowering a baron to levy aid from his vassals, except in the three feudal cases. One weight and one measure shall be established throughout the kingdom. Merchants shall be allowed to transact all business, without being exposed to any arbitrary tolls and impositions: they and all free men shall be allowed to go out of the kingdom and return to it at pleasure: London, and all cities and burghs, shall preserve their ancient liberties, immunities, and free customs: aids shall not be required of them but by the consent of the great council: no towns or individuals shall be obliged to make or support bridges but by ancient custom: the goods of every free man shall be disposed of according to his will: if he die intestate, his heirs shall succeed to them. No officer of the crown shall take any horses, carts, or wood, without the consent of the owner. The king's courts of justice shall be stationary, and shall no longer follow his person: they shall be open to every one, and justice shall no longer be sold, refused or delayed by them. Circuits shall be regularly held every year; the inferior tribunals of justice, the county court, sheriff's turn, and court-leet, shall meet at their appointed time and place: the sheriffs shall be incapacitated to hold pleas of the crown; and shall not put any person upon his trial, from rumour or suspicion alone, but upon the evidence of lawful witnesses. No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, or dispossessed of his free tenement and liberties, or outlawed, or banished, or anywise hurt or injured, unless by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land; and all who suffered otherwise, in this or the two former reigns, shall be restored to their rights and possessions. Every freeman shall be fined in proportion to his fault; and no fine shall be levied on him to his utter ruin: even a villain or rustic shall not, by any fine, be bereaved of his carts, ploughs, and implements of husbandry. This was the only article calculated for the interests of this body of men, probably at that time the most numerous in the kingdom.

It must be confessed, that the former articles of the Great Charter contain such mitigations and explanations of the feudal law as are reasonable and equitable; and that the latter involve all the chief outlines of a legal government, and provide for the equal distribution of justice and free enjoyment of property; the great objects for which political society was at first founded by men, which the people have a perpetual and unalienable right to recal, and which no time, nor precedent, nor statute, nor positive institution, ought to deter them from keeping ever uppermost in their thoughts and attention. Though the provisions made by this charter might, conformably to the genius of the age, be esteemed too concise, and too bare of circumstances, to maintain the execution of its articles, in opposition to the chicanery of lawyers, supported by the violence of power; time gradually ascertained the sense of all the ambiguous expressions; and those spirited barons, who first extorted this concession, still held their swords in their hands, and could turn them against those who dared on any pretence to depart from the original spirit and meaning of the grant, we may now, from the tenor of this charter, conjecture what those laws were of King Edward, which the English nation, during so many generations, still desired, with such an obstinate perseverance, to have recalled and established. They were chiefly these latter articles of Magna Charta; and the barons who, at the beginning of these commotions, demanded the revival of the Saxon laws, undoubtedly thought that they had sufficiently satisfied the people, by procuring them this concession, which comprehended the principal objects to which they had so long aspired. But what we are most to admire is, the prudence and moderation of those haughty nobles themselves, who were enraged by injuries, inflamed by opposition, and elated by a total victory over their sovereign. They were content, even in this plenitude of power, to depart from some articles of Henry I.'s charter, which they made the foundation of their demands, particularly from the abolition of wardships, a matter of the greatest importance; and they seem to have been sufficiently careful not to diminish too far the power and revenue of the crown. If they appear, therefore, to have carried other demands to too great a height, it can be ascribed only to the faithless and tyrannical character of the king himself, of which they had long had experience, and which they foresaw would, if they provided no farther security, lead him soon to infringe their new liberties, and revoke his own concessions. This alone gave birth to those other articles, seemingly exorbitant, which were added as a rampart for the safeguard of the Great Charter.

The barons obliged the king to agree that London should remain in their hands, and the Tower be consigned to the custody of the primate, till the 15th of August ensuing, or till the execution of the several articles of the Great Charter. The better to ensure the same end, he allowed them to choose five-and-twenty members from their own body, as conservators of the public liberties; and no bounds were set to the authority of these men either in extent or duration. If any complaint were made of a violation of the charter, whether attempted by the king, justiciaries, sheriffs, or foresters, any four of these barons might admonish the king to redress the grievance: if satisfaction were not obtained, they could assemble the whole council of twenty-five; who, in conjunction with the great council, were empowered to compel him to observe the charter; and, in case of resistance, might levy war against him, attack his castles, and employ every kind of violence, except against his royal person, and that of his queen and children. All men throughout the kingdom were bound, under the penalty of confiscation, to swear obedience to the twenty-five barons; and the freeholders of each county were to choose twelve knights, who were to make report of such evil customs as required redress, conformably to the tenor of the Great Charter. The names of those conservators were, the earls of Clare, Albemarle, Gloucester, Winchester, Hereford, Roger Bigod earl of Norfolk, Robert de Vere earl of Oxford, William Mareschal the younger, Robert Fitz-Walter, Gilbert de Clare, Eustace de Vescey, Gilbert Delaval, William de Moubray, Geoffrey de Say, Roger de Mombezon, William de Huntingfield, Robert de Ros, the constable of Chester, William de Aubenne, Richard de Perci, William Malet, John Fitz-Robert, William de Lanvaley, Hugh de Bigod, and Roger de Montfitchet. These men were, by this convention, really invested with the sovereignty of the kingdom: they were rendered co-ordinate with the king, or rather superior to him, in the exercise of the executive power: and as there was no circumstance of government which, either directly or indirectly, might not bear a relation to the security or observance of the Great Charter, there could scarcely occur any incident in which they might not lawfully interpose their authority.

John seemed to submit passively to all these regulations, however injurious to majesty: he sent writs to all the sheriffs, ordering them to constrain every one to swear obedience to the twenty-five barons: he dismissed all his foreign forces: he pretended that his government was henceforth to run in a new tenor, and be more indulgent to the liberty and independence of his people. But he only dissembled till he should find a favourable opportunity for annulling all his concessions. The injuries and indignities which he had formerly suffered from the pope and the king of France, as they came from equals or superiors, seemed to make but small impression on him: but the sense of this perpetual and total subjection under his own rebellious vassals sunk deep in his mind, and he was determined, at all hazards, to throw off so ignominious a slavery. He grew sullen, silent, and reserved: he shunned the society of his courtiers and nobles: he retired into the Isle of Wight, as if desirous of hiding his shame and confusion; but in this retreat he meditated the most fatal vengeance against all his enemies. He secretly sent abroad his emissaries to enlist foreign soldiers, and to invite the rapacious Brabancons into his service, by the prospect of sharing the spoils of England, and reaping the forfeitures of so many opulent barons, who had incurred the guilt of rebellion by rising in arms against him: and he dispatched a messenger to Rome, in order to lay before the pope the Great Charter which he had been compelled to sign, and to complain, before that tribunal, of the violence which had been imposed upon him.

Innocent, considering himself as feudal lord of the kingdom, was incensed at the temerity of the barons, who, though they pretended to appeal to his authority, had dared, without waiting for his consent, to impose such terms on a prince, who by resigning to the Roman pontiff his crown and independence, had placed himself immediately under the papal protection. He issued, therefore, a bull, in which, from the plenitude of his apostolic power, and from the authority which God had committed to him, to build and destroy kingdoms, to plant and overthrow, he annulled and abrogated the whole charter, as unjust in itself, as obtained by compulsion, and as derogatory to the dignity of the apostolic see. He prohibited the barons from exacting the observance of it: he even prohibited the king himself from paying any regard to it: he absolved him and his subjects from all oaths which they had been constrained to take to that purpose: and he pronounced a general sentence of excommunication against every one who should persevere in maintaining such treasonable and iniquitous pretensions.

The king, as his foreign forces arrived along with this bull, now ventured to take off the mask; and, under sanction of the pope's decree, recalled all the liberties which he had granted to his subjects, and which he had solemnly sworn to observe. But the spiritual weapon was found, upon trial, to carry less force with it than he had reason from his own experience to apprehend. The primate refused to obey the pope in publishing the sentence of excommunication against the barons; and though he was cited to Rome, that he might attend a general council there assembled, and was suspended on account of his disobedience to the pope, and his secret correspondence with the king's enemies; though a new and particular sentence of excommunication was pronounced by name against the principal barons, John still found that his nobility and the people, and even his clergy, adhered to the defence of their liberties, and to their combination against him: the sword of his foreign mercenaries was all he had to trust to for restoring his authority.

The barons, after obtaining the Great Charter, seemed to have been lulled into a fatal security, and to have taken no rational measures, in case of the introduction of a foreign force, for re-assembling their armies. The king was, from the first, master of the field; and immediately laid siege to the castle of Rochester, which was obstinately defended by William de Albiney, at the head of a hundred and forty knights with their retainers, but was at last reduced by famine. John, irritated with the resistance, intended to have hanged the governor and all the garrison; but, on the representation of William de Mauleon, who suggested to him the danger of reprisals, he was content to sacrifice, in this barbarous manner, the inferior prisoners only. The captivity of William de Albiney, the best officer among the confederated barons, was an irreparable loss to their cause; and no regular opposition was thenceforth made to the progress of the royal arms. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let loose against the estates, tenants, manors, houses, parks of the barons, and spread devastation over the face of the kingdom. Nothing was to be seen but the flames of villages and castles reduced to ashes, the consternation and misery of the inhabitants, tortures exercised by the soldiery to make them reveal their concealed treasures, and reprisals no less barbarous committed by the barons and their partisans on the royal demesnes, and on the estates of such as still adhered to the crown. The king, marching through the whole extent of England, from Dover to Berwick, laid the provinces waste on each side of him; and considered every state, which was not his immediate property, as entirely hostile, and the object of military execution. The nobility of the north, in particular, who had shown the greatest violence in the recovery of their liberties, and who, acting in a separate body, had expressed their discontent even at the concessions made by the Great Charter, as they could expect no mercy, fled before him with their wives and families, and purchased the friendship of Alexander, the young king of Scots, by doing homage to him.

"Never, we are told," says Lingard, "since the exterminating expedition of the first William, had these provinces been exposed to such horrors, as they now experienced from the vengeance of the king of England. He himself gave the example; and with his own hands set fire in the morning to the house in which he had rested the last night. The castles, towns, and villages, were given to the flames. The monk of Melrose confines his description to the neighbourhood of his own monastery, where, within the space of eight days, Morpeth, Mitford, Aluwick, Wark, and Roxburgh, were entirely consumed. John declared that he would unkennel the young fox, alluding to the ruddy complexion of Alexander, and followed him to Edinburgh, burning in his return, Haddington, Dunbar, and Berwick. But it was not with the towns only that he warred, the miserable inhabitants were abandoned to the cruelty of his rapacious followers, without respect of age or sex, rank or profession. The tortures which they suffered are too shocking to be related. Whoever possessed anything was compelled to deliver all for his ransom. Of those who had nothing, many perished under the hands of their torturers, some by fallacious promises purchased a short respite to be succeeded by more exquisite torments. Nor were the plunderers in the south, if we may believe the monk of St. Alban's, behind their fellows in cruelty and rapacity. Wherever the royal forces could penetrate, the inhabitants fled to the forests and mountains: the labours of agriculture were suspended; and the only markets were held in the church-yards, which, as they possessed the right of sanctuary, were generally, but not always, respected by the marauders."

The barons, reduced to this desperate extremity, and menaced with the total loss of their liberties, their properties, and their lives, employed a remedy no less desperate; and making applications to the court of France, they offered to acknowledge Lewis, the eldest son of Philip, for their sovereign, on condition that he would afford them protection from the violence of their enraged prince. Though the sense of the common rights of mankind, the only rights that are entirely indefeasible, might have justified them in the deposition of their king, they declined insisting before Philip on a pretension which is commonly so disagreeable to sovereigns, and which sounds harshly in their royal ears. They affirmed that John was incapable of succeeding to the crown, by reason of the attainder passed upon him during his brother's reign; though that attainder had been reversed, and Richard had even, by his last will, declared him his successor. They pretended that he was already legally deposed by sentence of the peers of France, on account of the murder of his nephew; though that sentence could not possibly regard anything but his transmarine dominions, which alone he held in vassalage to that crown. On more plausible grounds they affirmed, that he had already deposed himself by doing homage to the pope, changing the nature of his sovereignty, and resigning an independent crown for a fee under a foreign power. And as Blanche of Castile, the wife of Lewis, was descended by her mother from Henry II., they maintained, though many other princes stood before her in the order of succession, that they had not shaken off the royal family, in choosing her husband for their sovereign.

Philip was strongly tempted to lay hold on the rich prize which was offered to him. The legate menaced him with interdicts and excommunications if he invaded the patrimony of St. Peter, or attacked a prince who was under the immediate protection of the holy see: but as Philip was assured of the obedience of his own vassals, his principles were changed with the times, and he now undervalued as much all papal censures, as he formerly pretended to pay respect to them. His chief scruple was with regard to the fidelity which he might expect from the English barons in their new engagements, and the danger of entrusting his son and heir into the hands of men who might, on any caprice or necessity, make peace with their native sovereign, by sacrificing a pledge of so much value. He therefore exacted from the barons twenty five hostages of the most noble birth in the kingdom; and having obtained this security, he sent over first a small army to the relief of the confederates; then more numerous forces, which arrived with Lewis himself at their head.

The first effect of the young prince's appearance in England was the desertion of John's foreign troops, who, being mostly levied in Flanders, and other provinces of France, refused to serve against the heir of their monarchy. The Gascons and Poitevins alone, who were still John's subjects, adhered to his cause; but they were too weak to maintain that superiority in the field which they had hitherto supported against the confederated barons. Many considerable noblemen deserted John's party, the earls of Salisbury, Arundel, Warrene, Oxford, Albemarle, and William Mareschal the younger. His castles fell daily into the hands of the enemy; Dover was the only place which, from the valour and fidelity of Hubert de Burgh the governor, made resistance to the progress of Lewis. and the barons had the melancholy prospect of finally succeeding in their purpose, and of escaping the tyranny of their own king, by imposing on themselves and the nation a foreign yoke. But this union was of short duration between the French and English nobles; and the imprudence of Lewis, who on every occasion showed too visible a preference to the former, increased that jealousy, which it was so natural for the latter to entertain in their present situation. The viscount of Melun, too, it is said, one of his courtiers, fell sick at London, and finding the approaches of death, he sent for some of his friends among the English barons, and warning them of their danger, revealed Lewis's secret intentions of exterminating them and their families as traitors to their prince, and of bestowing their estates and dignities on his native subjects, in whose fidelity he could more reasonably place confidence: this story, whether true or false, was universally reported and believed, and concurring with other circumstances which rendered it credible, did great prejudice to the cause of Lewis. The earl of Salisbury, and other noblemen, deserted again to John's party; and as men easily changed sides in a civil war, especially where their power is founded on an hereditary and independent authority, and is not derived from the opinion and favour of the people, the French prince had reason to dread a sudden reverse of fortune. The king was assembling a considerable army, with a view of fighting one great battle for his crown.

According to Lingard (who says he has rectified some mistakes usually made by historians, as to the route of John), "The king returned from Lincoln through Grimsby and Spalding to Lynn, a town strongly attached to his interests, and the general depot for his supplies and treasures. Thence he marched to Wisbeach, and resolved to proceed across the Wash from the Cross Keys to the Fossdike. The army had reached the land; but on turning back, John beheld a long train of waggons and sumpter-horses, which carried his jewels, insignia, and money, swallowed up in a whirlpool, caused by the afflux of the tide and the current of the Welland. With a heavy heart he proceeded to the Cistercian convent of Swinhead, where fatigue, or anxiety, or poison, or a surfeit (for all these causes are mentioned), threw him into a dangerous fever. He set out, however, in the morning: but was obliged to exchange his horse for a litter, and was conveyed with difficulty to the castle of Sleaford. There he passed the night, and dictated a letter to the new Pope Honorius III., recommending in the most earnest terms the interests of his children to the protection of that pontiff. The next day conducted him to the castle of Newark: where, sensible of his approaching fate, he sent for a confessor, appointed his eldest son Henry to succeed him, and expressed a wish that his body might be buried at Worcester, near the shrine of St. Wulstan. He expired three days later (the 19th Oct. 1216), in the forty-ninth year of his age, and the seven-teenth of his reign; and thus freed the nation from the dangers to which it was equally exposed by his success or by his misfortunes.

The character of this prince is nothing but a complication of vices, equally mean and odious; ruinous to himself, and destructive to his people. Cowardice, inactivity, folly, levity, licentiousness, ingratitude, treachery, tyranny, and cruelty; all these qualities appear too evidently in the several incidents of his life, to give us room to suspect that the disagreeable picture has been anywise overcharged by the prejudices of the ancient historians. It is hard to say whether his conduct to his father, his brother, his nephew, or his subjects, was most culpable; or whether his crimes, in these respects, were not even exceeded by the baseness which appeared in his transactions with the king of France, the pope, and the barons. His European dominions, when they devolved to him by the death of his brother, were more extensive than have ever, since his time, been ruled by any English monarch: but he first lost, by his misconduct, the flourishing provinces in France, the ancient patrimony of his family: he subjected his kingdom to a shameful vassalage under the see of Rome: he saw the prerogatives of his crown diminished by law, and still more reduced by faction: and he died at last, when in danger of being totally expelled by a foreign power, and of either ending his life miserably in prison, on seeking shelter as a fugitive from the pursuit of his enemies.

The monks throw great reproaches on this prince for his impiety, and even infidelity; and as an instance of it, they tell us, that having one day caught a very fat stag, he exclaimed, "How plump and well-fed is this animal. and yet I dare swear he never heard mass." This sally of wit, upon the usual corpulency of the priests, more than all his enormous crimes and iniquities, made him pass with them for an atheist.

John left two legitimate sons behind him, Henry, born on the first of October 1207, and now nine years of age; and Richard, born on the sixth of January 1209; and three daughters, Jane, afterwards married to Alexander king of Scots; Eleanor, married first to William Mareschal the younger, earl of Pembroke, and then to Simon Mountfort, earl of Leicester; and Isabella, married to the emperor Frederick II. All these children were born to him by Isabella of Angoulesme his second wife. His illegitimate children were numerous; but none of them were anywise distinguished.

It was this king who, in the ninth year of his reign, first gave by charter to the city of London, the right of electing annually a mayor out of its own body, an office which was till now held for life. He gave the city also power to elect and remove its sheriffs at pleasure, and its common-council-men annually. London-bridge was finished in this reign: the former bridge was of wood. Maud the empress was the first that built a stone bridge in England.

APPENDIX.

SECTION I.

History of the changes in the Constitution, Government, and Laws of England, that were introduced in the reign of William I., from 1066 to 1087.

THE changes in the ranks and degrees of men in society, that were introduced into England at the Norman conquest, seem to have been rather nominal than real. Those who occupied the lowest rank still continued in a state of slavery; and we have good reason to believe, that their numbers were rather increased than diminished by that event. None of the Anglo-Saxon serfs, who were annexed to the lands which they cultivated, and had been usually transferred with them from one proprietor to another, could entertain the least hopes of obtaining freedom, or even a mitigation of their servitude, when these lands were bestowed on the enemies and conquerors of their nation. On the contrary, many of the English, who had formerly been free, having been taken prisoners at the battle of Hastings, or in some of the subsequent revolts, were reduced to slavery; and thought themselves very happy if they preserved their lives, though they lost their freedom. The Norman conquerors for some time treated their English slaves with so much severity, that a contemporary writer declines giving any description of it, "because its inhuman cruelty would appear incredible to posterity."

The condition of all these unhappy people, in this period, was not equally abject and wretched. There were different degrees of servitude, and different kinds of slaves that were called by different names, viz.—1. Villains in gross, who were the personal property of their masters, and performed the lowest and most laborious offices about their masters' houses. This class of slaves seems to have been very numerous; for Roger Hoveden tells us, that, from the reign of William I. to his own time in the reign of King John, there was hardly a house or even cottage in Scotland, in which there was not to be found an English slave. It is not to be imagined that their more opulent neighbours the Normans and English were worse provided than the Scots with domestic slaves. They had indeed such great numbers of them, that they exported and sold many of these unhappy persons in foreign countries.

2. Villains regardant, or predial slaves, who lived in the country, and cultivated the lands of their masters, to which they were annexed. These were in a better condition than domestic slaves, and had an imperfect kind of property in their houses and furniture, and in the little gardens and small pieces of ground which they were allowed to cultivate, at leisure times, for their own subsistence. But still their persons and properties were so much in the power of their masters, that they granted or sold them to whom they pleased. These two formed a very numerous class of slaves, by whom the demesnes of all the earls, barons, bishops, abbots, and great men of England, were cultivated. The villains belonging to some of the richest abbeyes amounted to two thousand.

3. Cottars (who in the barbarous Latin of those times were called Cottarii, because they dwelt in small huts or cottages, near to the mansions of their masters), composed another class of slaves frequently mentioned in Domesday-book. They were such as, by the direction of their owners, had been instructed in some handicraft art or trade, as that of smiths, carpenters, &c. which they practised for the benefit of their masters, and were on the same footing in all respects with villains or predial slaves.

4. Borders, in Latin Bordarii, frequently occur in Domesday-book, as distinguished from villains and cottars; but in what respects they differed from them is not clearly ascertained. The most probable opinion seems to be, that they were a kind of upper domestic servants, who waited at table (then called board), and performed other less ignoble offices in their masters' houses, in which they did not reside, but in small huts of their own, to which little gardens and parcels of land were annexed, as the fee or reward of their services. From this short and imperfect enumeration it is sufficiently evident, that a very great proportion of the people of England, in this period, were in a state of servitude, or rather in a state of slavery.

As all the children of slaves were by their birth in the same degrees of subjection to the same masters with their parents, this order of men must have increased exceedingly, if many of them had not from time to time obtained their freedom. This they did by various means, but chiefly by uncommon fidelity and diligence, which excited the gratitude of their masters, and engaged them to make them free. The granting freedom to a certain number of slaves was sometimes enjoyed by the clergy, and sometimes voluntarily performed by penitents, in order to obtain the pardon of their sins, and for the good of their souls. The ceremony of manumission was commonly performed at church, or at the county-court, when the master, taking his slave by the hand, declared that he made him free; after which he gave him a sword or spear, the arms of a free man; and then commanding all the doors to be thrown open, allowed him to go where he pleased. These freed-men possessed the same place in society in this period, that the free-lazen had possessed in the times of the Anglo-Saxons.

The middle rank in society, that filled up the interval between the freed-men on the one hand and the noblesse and baronage on the other, was chiefly composed of three different bodies of men, which had been formerly very distinct, but were now united. 1. Those Anglo-Saxon ceorls, who had remained neuter in the quarrel between William and Harold, and had not joined in any of the subsequent revolts, and were therefore allowed to retain their rank as well as their possessions, though, for their own greater security, they generally put themselves under the protection of some great Norman baron, and became his socmen. 2. Those Anglo-Saxon theles and noble-men who were degraded from their former rank, and divested of all power, but permitted to retain a part of their possessions, under the protection of their conquerors. The number of these degraded nobles was not inconsiderable; for, before the end of the reign of William I., there was hardly so much as one Englishman who was either earl, baron, bishop, or abbot; and for more than a century after, to be an Englishman was an effectual exclusion from all preferment. 3. Those Frenchmen, Normans, and others, who fought under their several leaders in the conquest of England, and afterwards settled on the demesne lands of those leaders, and became their farmers, socmen, and smaller vassals. All these different kinds of people were by degrees blended together, and formed a body, from which the yeomanry and many of the gentry of England are descended. The inhabitants of towns and cities were generally of this middle rank.

The Norman barons formed the highest order of the state, and occupied the same place in society after the conquest that the Anglo-Saxon thanes had possessed before that era, and the nobility and principal gentry of England now possess. They were a numerous, opulent, and powerful body of men, and (when taken in the most extensive sense) comprehended all the considerable proprietors of land in England, especially all those who held immediately of the king in capite by military services. The lesser barons were frequently called vassals, and corresponded to the lesser Anglo-Saxon thanes, and to the modern English gentlemen of ancient families and large estates. But barons, in this period, most properly were the greater or king's barons, who held immediately of the king an entire barony, consisting of thirteen knights' fees, and the third part of a knight's fee, yielding an annual revenue of 266*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, or 400 marks: an ample fortune in the times we are now considering. Those who held such baronies were the spiritual and temporal lords of the kingdom, who enjoyed many singular privileges and immunities, and in their own territories were a kind of petty princes (too often tyrants), possessing both civil and military jurisdiction over their vassals. But we shall meet with a more convenient opportunity of considering the civil authority and military power of the Norman barons.

Though the accession of William duke of Normandy to the throne of England produced no very remarkable alteration in the ranks and orders of men in society, it produced many important changes in their political circumstances,—in the tenures by which they held their lands,—the services and prestations to which they were subjected,—the magistrates by whom they were governed,—the courts in which they were judged,—and the laws they were obliged to obey. These changes were chiefly owing to the establishment of the feudal system of police and government in England by William I., in the same state of maturity to which it had then attained in his dominions on the continent.

In the Anglo-Saxon times, all the proprietors of land (the clergy at least excepted) were subjected to the three following obligations, commonly called the trinoda necessitas:—1. To attend the king with their followers in military expeditions;—2. To assist in building and defending the royal castles;—3. To keep the highways and bridges in a proper state. To these three obligations a fourth, called a heriot, was added, by the laws of Canute the Great; which consisted in delivering to the king the horses and arms of his earls and thanes at their death, with certain sums of money, according to their rank and wealth. That these may be called feudal prestations, and considered as a proof that the feudal form of government was not altogether unknown to the Anglo-Saxons, need not be disputed; but to these William I. added so many others, which shall be presently described, that he may be justly said to have completed, if not to have erected, the fabric of the feudal government in Britain.

The sovereign of a feudal state was, in idea at least, the proprietor of all the lands in his dominions. Part of these lands he retained in his own possession for the maintenance of his family and support of his dignity; the rest he granted to certain of his subjects, as benefices or fees for services to be performed by them, and on such other conditions as he thought proper to require, and they to accept. By the numerous forfeitures after the battle of Hastings, and the subsequent revolts, and by the abject state to which even those of the English who had not forfeited were reduced, the idea of a feudal sovereign was almost realized in William I., and he beheld a very great proportion of the lands in England at his disposal, which enabled him to establish the feudal system of government in its full extent, with little or no difficulty. Nor did he neglect this favourable opportunity of introducing into his new dominions that form of government, to which he and his followers had been long accustomed, and which was so well adapted to preserve the important acquisition he had made.

William I., in the distribution of the territory of England, was not unmindful of the interests of the crown; but retained in his own possession no fewer than 1422 manors, besides a great number of forests, parks, chaces, farms, and houses, in all parts of the kingdom. As the hopes of obtaining splendid establishments for themselves and followers had engaged many powerful barons, and even some sovereign princes, to embark with him in his dangerous expedition, he was induced, both by the dictates of honour and prudence, to gratify their expectations by very liberal grants of lands. To Hugh de Abrencis, his sister's son, he granted the whole county of Chester; to Robert earl of Mortaigne, and Odo bishop of Bayeux, his two uterine brothers, he gave, to the former, 973 manors, to the latter 439; to Allen earl of Britany 442, to William de Warrenne 290, to Geoffrey bishop of Coutance 280, to Roger Bigod 123, to Walter Giffard 107, to Richard de Clare 171, to William de Percy 119, and to all his other chieftains according to the different degrees of their power, their services, and their favour.

None of the grants of land made by William I. were unconditional, but to all of them a great variety of obligations was annexed. These obligations were of two kinds, viz. 1. Services which contributed to the splendour of the sovereign, and security of the kingdom; 2. Prestations of various kinds, which constituted a considerable part of the royal revenue.

1. The services which contributed to the splendour of the sovereign, and security of the kingdom, to be performed by the immediate vassals of the crown, were chiefly these three: 1. Homage and fealty. 2. Personal attendance upon the king in his court at the three great festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and in his parliament, at other times, when regularly called

3. Military services in the field, or in the defence of castles for a certain time, with a certain number of men, according to the extent of their estates. By these three things the sovereign of a feudal kingdom was secured, as far as human policy could secure him,—in a splendid court for his honour,—a numerous council for giving him advice in the arduous affairs of government,—and a powerful army for the defence of his person and dominions.

2. The payments or prestations to which the immediate vassals of the crown were subjected, and which constituted a considerable part of the royal revenue, were chiefly these six: 1. Reserved rents. 2. Wardships. 3. On marriages. 4. Reliefs. 5. Scutages. 6. Aids. It is necessary to give a very brief delineation of each of the above services and prestations.

The sovereign of a feudal kingdom never appeared in greater glory than when he received the homage of his immediate vassals, in his great court of parliament. Seated on his throne, in his royal robes, with his crown on his head, and surrounded by his spiritual and temporal nobles, he beheld his greatest prelates and most powerful barons, uncovered and unarmed, on their knees before him. In that humble posture they put both their hands between his, and solemnly promised, “to be his liege-men of life and limb and worldly worship, to bear faith and troth to him, to live and die with him against all manner of men.”

2. The courts of the Anglo-Norman kings were at all times very splendid, but more especially at the three great festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, when all the prelates, earls, and barons of the kingdom were, by their tenures, obliged to attend their sovereign, to assist in the celebration of these festivals,—in the administration of justice,—and in deliberating on the great affairs of the kingdom. On these occasions the king wore his crown, and feasted his nobles in the great hall of his palace, and made them presents of robes, &c., as marks of his royal favour; after which they proceeded to business, which consisted partly in determining important causes, and partly in deliberating on public affairs.

3. Military service was the greatest and most important obligation annexed to the grants of lands made by William I., and other feudal sovereigns, whose chief intention was, in making these grants, to secure a sufficient body of troops under proper leaders, well armed, and always ready to take the field, for the defence of the kingdom and the prosecution of such wars as were thought necessary for the honour of the prince and the prosperity of the state. These lands, so granted, may very well be considered as the daily pay of a certain number of troops which the persons to whom they were granted were obliged to keep in constant readiness for service; and therefore the number of knights' fees or stipends which every state comprehended was carefully ascertained. To add still further to the strength and security of the kingdom, William I. subjected the lands of spiritual barons, as archbishops, bishops, abbots, and priors, to the same military services with the lands of temporal barons and knights. From the famous survey of England, made by the direction of this great prince, and recorded in Doomsday-book, it was found, that the whole kingdom contained 60,215 knights' fees, of which no fewer than 28,115 belonged to the church.

It is now time to take a very short view of those prestations to which the immediate vassals of the crown of England were at this time subjected, and which constituted a considerable part of the royal revenue.

1. Though William I., and other feudal sovereigns, made large grants of lands to their nobility, clergy, and other vassals, they did not relinquish all connexion with and interest in these lands. On the contrary, they granted only the right of using these lands on certain conditions, still retaining the property, or dominium directum, in themselves: and, to put their vassals constantly in mind of this circumstance, they always reserved certain annual payments (commonly very trifling) that were collected by the sheriffs of the counties where the lands lay.

2. When an earl, baron, or other vassal of the crown, died, and left his heir under age, and consequently incapable of performing those personal services to his sovereign to which he was bound by his tenure, the king took possession of his estate; that he might therewith support the heir, and give him an education suitable to his quality, and at the same time might provide another person to perform his services in his room. This right of being the guardians of all minors, male or female, who held their lands of the crown by military services, brought considerable profits into the royal coffers, or enabled the prince to enrich his favourites, by granting them the guardianship of some of his most opulent wards.

3. The king's female wards could not marry any person, however agreeable to themselves and their relations, without the consent of their royal guardian; that they might not have it in their power to bestow an estate that had been derived from the crown on one who was disagreeable to the sovereign. This was a cruel and ignominious servitude, by which heiresses of the greatest families and most opulent fortunes were exposed to sale, or obliged to purchase the liberty of disposing of themselves in marriage by great sums of money, either from the king, or from some greedy courtier, to whom he had granted or sold their marriage. No less a sum than ten thousand marks, equal in efficacy to one hundred thousand pounds of our money at present, was paid to the king for the wardship and marriage of a single heiress. This cruel servitude was afterwards extended to male heirs.

4. The king had not only the guardianship and marriage of the heirs of all his immediate vassals, but he demanded and obtained a sum of money from them when they came of age, and were admitted to the possession of their estates; and also from those heirs who had been of age at the death of their ancestors. This last was called relief, because it relieved their lands out of the hands of their sovereign, into which they fell at the death of every possessor. Reliefs were at first arbitrary and uncertain, and of consequence the occasion of much oppression. They were afterwards fixed at the rate of one hundred shillings for a knight's fee, one hundred marks for a baron, and one hundred pounds for an earldom, which was supposed to be about the fourth part of the annual value of each.

5. Scutage, or shield-money, was another prestation to which the military vassals of the crown, both of the clergy and laity, were subjected. It was a sum of money paid in lieu of actual service in the field, by those who were not able or were not willing to perform that service in person, or to provide another to perform it in their room. The rate of this commutation was not always the same, but most commonly it was two marks for every knight's fee, though sometimes it was only twenty shillings, and at other times three marks, or two marks and a half. This payment became the occasion of much vexation to those who owed military service to the crown; because our monarchs sometimes engaged, or pretended to engage in expeditions into distant parts, or at inconvenient seasons, that they might have a pretence for demanding scutage from their vassals.

6. Besides all the above payments, the immediate vassals of the crown, who were presumed to be possessed of much affection and gratitude to their sovereign for the favours they had received from him, granted, or rather complied with the demand of certain pecuniary aids, on some great occasions, when he stood in particular need of their assistance. The occasions on which those aids were demanded and granted, were these three: 1. To make his eldest son a knight; 2. To marry his eldest daughter; 3. To ransom his person when he was taken prisoner in war. The rate of these aids was also unsettled; but it seems to have been most frequently one mark, or one pound for every knight's fee.

There is sufficient evidence, that all these services and prestations, so troublesome in themselves, and so liable to be rendered oppressive and intolerable, were brought from Normandy, and imposed by William I. on the leaders of his victorious army, to whom he granted great estates in England. But these were far from being the only persons who felt the weight of those feudal servitudes. For the Norman and other barons, who received extensive tracts of land, imitated the example of their sovereign in the disposal of these lands. They retained part of them lying contiguous to their castles in their own possession, which were called their demesnes; and the rest they granted to their followers, who had fought under their banners, on terms exactly similar to those on which they had received them from the crown. The vassals of every baron did him homage, with a reservation of their homage to the king, which was sometimes not much regarded. They gave personal attendance in his court at stated times, or when regularly called. They followed him into the field with a certain number of troops, according to the quantity of land they had received. They paid him certain reserved rents. Their heirs were his wards when under age. They could not marry without his consent. They gave him a relief when they obtained possession of their estates; and aids for making his eldest son a knight, for marrying his eldest daughter, and for redeeming his person from captivity. In a word, a feudal baron was a king in miniature, and a barony was a little kingdom. Even the vassals of barons sometimes granted subinfeudations, but always exactly on the same plan. By this means all the distressful servitudes of the feudal system descended from the sovereign to the meanest possessor of land by military tenure becoming heavier as they descended lower.

It is true that those possessors of land, who were called socmen, because (as many think) they followed the soc or plough, were not subjected to some of the most vexatious of those feudal servitudes, as personal attendance, wardship, marriage, &c. But this seems to have been owing to the contemptible light in which they were viewed by their sovereign and his haughty martial barons, who would not admit them into their courts and company; and considered the education and marriage of their heirs as matters of small importance, and unworthy of their attention. Nor were many of these socmen more free and happy than the military vassals of the king and barons. On the contrary, they were subjected to lower and more laborious servitudes, as furnishing men, horses, and carriages, on various occasions; ploughing and sowing the lands of their lords, &c.* In a word, the feudal system of tenures established by William I. in England, was productive of universal distress and servitude; from which even those of the highest ranks were not exempted, though they were most severely felt by the lower orders in the state.

It has been the subject of much dispute, when, by whom, and in what manner, the feudal system of government was introduced into Scotland. It would be improper to revive this unimportant controversy, by repeating the sentiments of different authors, and their arguments in support of these sentiments. Upon the whole, it seems to be most probable, that Malcolm III., surnamed Canmore, began the introduction of this system into his dominions, in imitation of his neighbour and contemporary, William I. of England; and that his plan was prosecuted by his successors, as opportunities offered, until it came to be universally established.

The introduction of the feudal system was productive of several other changes in police and government, particularly in courts and magistrates.

Nothing could be more regular, or more admirably adapted to the speedy, easy, and effectual administration of justice, to persons of all ranks, than the constitution of the Anglo-Saxon courts. But this beautiful fabric was not respected by the Norman conquerors. For though they did not pull it down by violence, they suffered it to fall into ruin by neglect, and the establishment of other courts.

In all feudal kingdoms there were three kinds of persons that bore the chief sway, both in peace and war, viz. barons in their baronies, earls in their counties, and kings in their kingdoms. In consequence of this there were three kinds of courts of chief consideration—the baron's court, the earl's court, and the king's court.

In the feudal times, every barony (as hath been already observed) was a little kingdom, and every baron was a petty king; the commander of all the tenants in his barony (who might not improperly be called his subjects) in time of war, and their judge in time of peace. In his court, which was commonly held in the great hall of his castle, and to which all the tenants of his barony owed suit and service, he administered justice to his people, in person or by his bailiff; not only compelling the payment of debts and the performance of contracts, but also redressing wrongs and punishing crimes even with capital punishments. Archbishops, bishops, abbots, and priors, who held baronies of the crown, had their courts of the same kind with the secular barons. Even the barons of barons, or those who held manors by military service of the king's barons, had similar courts within their respective manors, but commonly without the privilege of pit and gallows, i. e. the power of inflicting capital punishments.

* The opinion of one of the most learned writers on the law of England,—that tenures called free soccage were the relics of the allodial tenures of the Anglo-Saxons, is not disputed. We have no reason to be surprised, that a few small estates escaped the rapacity of the Normans.—Blackstone's Comment.

The title of earl before the conquest, and for some time after, was not merely honorary, but official. There was but one earl in every county, who was properly its governor, the general of its forces in times of war, and its chief justiciary or judge in times of peace. The court in which the earl presided was the county court; and as a reward or salary for acting in his judicial capacity, he received the third penny of all the dues, amerciaments, and profits, arising in that court. This, in the Anglo-Saxon times, and even during some part of the reign of William I., was a court of great power and dignity, in which the bishop of the diocese sat with the earl, and on which all the abbots, priors, barons, knights, and freeholders of the county, were obliged to attend. In this little parliament all the controversies arising in the county, the most important not excepted, were determined, though not always finally, because there lay an appeal from its decrees to a higher court, which shall presently be described. In a county-court of Kent, held in the reign of William I., at Pinendine, there were present one archbishop, three bishops, the earl of the county, the vice-earl or sheriff, a great number of the king's barons, besides a still greater multitude of knights and freeholders, who in the course of three days adjudged several manors to belong to the archbishopric of Canterbury, which had been possessed for some time by Odo, bishop of Baieux, the king's uterine brother, and by other powerful barons.

But the county-courts did not continue long after the conquest in this state of power and splendour. For William I., about A.D. 1085, separated the ecclesiastical from the civil part of these courts, prohibiting the bishops to sit as judges, the clergy to attend as suitors, and the causes of the church to be tried in them, but in courts of their own. By this regulation, which is said to have been made in a common council of the archbishops, bishops, abbots, and chief men of the kingdom, the county-courts were deprived, at one blow, of their most venerable judges, their most respectable suitors, and most important business. Besides this, after the departure of the bishops and clergy, the earls disdained to sit as judges, and the great barons to attend as suitors in the county-courts; which by degrees reduced them to their present state. But this was not the worst effect of this most imprudent and pernicious regulation. By it the kingdom was split asunder; the crown and mitre were set at variance, and the ecclesiastical courts, by putting themselves under the immediate protection of the pope, formed the clergy into a separate state under a foreign sovereign, which was productive of infinite mischiefs and disorders.

The ecclesiastical courts, that were immediately erected in consequence of this fatal statute, were these three; 1. The archdeacon's court.

For as the archdeacon was by that statute discharged from sitting as a judge with the hundredary in the hundred court, he was authorized to erect a court of his own, in which he took cognizance of ecclesiastical causes within his archdeaconry. 2. The bishop's court, or consistory, which received appeals from the archdeacon's court, and whose jurisdiction extended over the whole diocese. 3. The archbishop's court, which received appeals from the consistories of the several bishops of the province, and had jurisdiction not only over the particular diocese of the archbishop, but over all the dioceses in the province. From this highest ecclesiastical court appeals lay to the pope, which soon became very frequent, vexatious, and expensive.

As the king was the chief magistrate of the kingdom, and it was both his duty and prerogative to administer justice to his subjects, he had a court, which was the chief court of the kingdom, in which he performed that duty and exercised that prerogative. This supreme court was commonly called curia or aula regis, because it was held in the great hall of the king's palace, wherever he happened to reside. In this court the king was presumed to be always present, either in person, or by his representatives, the judges of his court, to whom he committed the performance of his duty, and the exercise of his prerogative as the supreme judge in his kingdom. The judges in the king's court, as it was constituted by William I., and continued till near the end of this period, were,—the great officers of the crown,—the king's justices,—together with all the great barons of the kingdom, both temporal and spiritual, who were entitled to seats in this court.

The great officers of the crown, who were also the leading members of the king's court, were these seven: 1. The chief justiciary, who was an officer of the highest dignity and greatest power, the president of the king's court when the prince was not personally present, and regent of the kingdom when the sovereign was beyond seas, which in this period very frequently happened. 2. The constable of England. 3. The marischal of England, who were both military and civil officers: when acting in their civil capacity, as members of the king's court, their jurisdiction chiefly respected matters of honour and of arms. 4. The high steward of England. 5. The great chamberlain of England. These two great officers had the chief direction of all things in the king's court and palace. The four last-named officers were for the most part hereditary. 6. The chancellor of England, who had the custody of the great seal, and the inspection of all grants to which it was appended. 7. The high treasurer, who had the chief direction of all things respecting the royal revenues.

The king's justices were persons learned in the laws, who had seats in the supreme court, in order to inform the other members what the law of the land was in every case. This great court was divided into several chambers, and certain judges sat in each of these chambers, at particular times, to take cognizance of those matters with which they were best acquainted, and in which they were most interested. Of these chambers the exchequer (so called from a chequered cloth which covered the table) was one, in which the high treasurer and certain barons sat, and regulated all things respecting the revenues of the crown.

The jurisdiction of the king's court was universal, extending to all parts of the kingdom, and over all the subjects of it, till the clergy, after long and violent struggles, emancipated themselves in a great measure from its authority. As the Normans were remarkably fond of pomp, some of the sessions of this august tribunal, particularly those at the festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, were attended with much parade and show. The king, on these occasions, wore his crown and royal robes; the great officers of state appeared with the ensigns of their respective offices: and all the spiritual and temporal barons in their richest ornaments. At these ceremonies and magnificent meetings, the ambassadors of foreign princes were introduced, that they might be struck with admiration at the opulence and grandeur of the king and kingdom. To these stated meetings all the members of the king's court came of course, without any summons. In this, and in several other respects, they differed from the common councils of the kingdom.

Though the powers of this supreme court were great and various, they were all ministerial and executive, and did not extend to the making new laws or imposing new taxes. These two most important branches of police and government belonged to another assembly, that was called (commune concilium, or magnum concilium regni) the common council, or great council of the kingdom; and sometimes, though very seldom in this period (parliamentum) parliament, from the French word parler, to speak.

Who were the constituent members of the great councils or parliaments of this period, is a question that hath been differently answered, and warmly agitated. Though the nature and limits of this work will not admit of a full discussion of this question (at present of no great importance), yet a plain and short exposition of what appears to be the truth is necessary. That all archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, earls, and barons, who held each an entire barony immediately of the king in capite, were constituent members of these great councils, has never been denied, and needs not be proved. Besides these great spiritual and temporal barons, there were many others, who held smaller portions of land, as one, two, three, or four knights' fees, immediately of the king, by the same honourable tenure with the great barons, who were also members of the great councils of the kingdom, and were commonly called the lesser barons, or free military tenants of the crown. Among many evidences that might easily be produced of this, the fourteenth article of the great charter of King John is one of the most decisive, and seems to be sufficient: "To have a common council of the kingdom, to assess an aid otherwise than in the three foresaid cases, or to assess a scutage, we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, earls, and greater barons, particularly by our letters; and besides, we will cause to be summoned in general by our sheriffs and bailiffs, all those who hold of us in capite." The lesser barons continued to sit personally in the parliaments of Scotland till the year 1427, when an act was made exempting them from personal attendance in parliament, on condition of sending representatives. But besides all these great and small barons, who by virtue of their tenures were obliged, as well as entitled, to sit as members in the great councils of the kingdom, our historians of this period sometimes speak of great multitudes of people, both of the clergy and laity, who were present in some of these councils. Eadmerus, the friend and secretary of Archbishop Anselm, thus describes the persons assembled in a great council at Rockingham, A.D. 1095, to whom his patron made a speech. "Anselm spoke in this manner to the bishops, abbots, and princes, or principal men, and to a numerous multitude of monks, clerks, and laymen standing by." By the bishops, abbots, and princes, we are certainly to understand the spiritual and temporal barons. But who are we to understand by "the numerous multitudes of monks, clerks, and laymen standing by?" Were they members of this assembly, or were they only spectators and by-standers? If by the multitude of these clerks and laymen, the historian did not mean the lesser barons, it is highly probable that they were only spectators. We are told by several contemporary historians, that the great councils of the kingdom in those times were very much incommoded by crowds of spectators, who forced their way into their meetings. One of these historians thus describes a great council held by King Stephen: "The king, by an edict published through England, called the rulers of the churches, and the chiefs of the people, to a council at London. All these coming thither, as into one receptacle, and the pillars of the churches being seated in order, and the vulgar also forcing themselves in on all hands, confusedly and promiscuously, as usual, many things were usefully proposed and happily transacted, for the benefit of the church and kingdom." In a great council held at Westminster, May 18th, 1127, the spectators, who are said to have been innumerable, were so outrageous, that they interrupted the business of the council, and prevented some things from being debated. Upon the whole, it seems to be almost certain, that though great numbers of people of all ranks, prompted by political curiosity, or interested in the affairs that were to be debated, attended the great councils of the kingdom in this period, none were properly members of these councils but those described in the great charter of King John, viz. the spiritual and temporal barons, who were personally summoned; and those who held smaller parcels of land than baronies, immediately of the king, by knight's service, who were summoned edictally by the sheriffs of their respective counties.

Besides all the prerogatives that had been enjoyed by his predecessors, the Anglo-Saxon and Danish kings of England, William I. acquired a great addition of power by the introduction of the feudal system, which made him the territorial lord as well as sovereign of his greatest subjects. But the greatness of some of these subjects, together with their extensive influence over their vassals and tenants, fortunately formed a kind of counterpoise to the exorbitant power of the crown, prevented it from becoming, or at least from continuing, arbitrary; and at length, by slow degrees, and many struggles (which from the most interesting parts of our history), reduced it within proper limits. All the historians of this period are full of the most bitter complaints of the tyranny of William I., and of his son and successor William II., representing them as acting on many occasions in the most despotic manner, with little or no regard to law, justice, or humanity. "None of his bishops, abbots, or great men," says Eadmerus of William I., "dared to disobey his will on any consideration; but all things divine and human depended upon his nod." "Whoever," says Henry of Huntingdon, speaking of the same prince, "desired to enjoy money, lands, or even life itself, was under a necessity of obeying the king's nod in all things. Alas! how much is it to be lamented, that any man, who is but a worm and dust, should forget death, and arrive at such a height of pride as to trample on all the rest of mankind!" Of the ferocity and tyranny of his son and successor William II., the historians of those times speak in still stronger terms. "He was more fierce," says one of them, "than human nature seemed to be capable of. By the advice of the worst men, which he always followed, he harassed his neighbours with war, and his own subjects with armies and taxes; and England was so miserably oppressed that it was brought to the very brink of ruin."

The great revenues of these princes contributed not a little to increase their pride, and support their power; especially as these revenues were for the most part considered as their undoubted property, and did not depend on the generosity or good-will of their subjects. Besides all the revenues arising from the royal demesnes, and from the rents, aids, wardships, marriages, and scutages of all the immediate vassals of the crown, which have been already mentioned, money flowed into the coffers of the first Norman kings of England, from all the following sources, escheats, vacancies, tallages, taxes, tolls, customs, oblations, amerciaments, moneyage, farms of counties, cities, towns, and corporations, queen-gold, impositions of various kinds upon the Jews, &c. &c.

Escheats and forfeitures formed a great branch of the royal revenue in those turbulent times, when civil broils were frequent, when estates escheated into the king's hands on the failure of lineal descendants from the persons to whom they had been granted, and when the immediate vassals of the crown forfeited their lands, not only for treason against the king as sovereign of the state, but for various offences against him as their feudal lord,—such as, declining to do him homage,—to swear fealty,—to attend his court,—to serve him in the field,—for betraying his secrets,—abetting his enemies,—affronting his person,—debauching his wife, his daughters, or near relations,—and, in a word, for doing anything that made them unworthy of being the companions of their superior lord, the members of his court, and the peers of his other barons. These escheats and forfeitures formed so capital a part of the royal revenue, that a particular court or office, called the escheatry, was erected for the management of them.

When an archbishopric, bishopric, abbey, or priory of royal foundation, became vacant, the temporalities were seized and enjoyed by the king during the vacancy. This, it is probable, was intended to correspond to the profits arising from the wardship of the temporal barons; and in some reigns, when many of the richest sees were kept vacant several years, it must have made a great addition to the revenues of the crown.

The kings of England, in this period, were not always contented with the ordinary annual rents which they received from the cities, towns, socmen, and tenants of their demesnes, and of the escheats and forfeitures in their hands; but on some occasions they exacted certain extraordinary payments, called tallages or cuttings, from the French word tailler, to cut; because by them a certain proportion of the goods of these cities, towns, socmen, and tenants, as a tenth, fifteenth, a twentieth, or thirtieth part, was cut off and appropriated to the king's use. As neither the frequency nor the quantity of these tallages was ascertained in the former part of this period, they became the occasion of great oppression to the subjects, and a source of much treasure to the crown.

The ignominious tax, called danegild, though the reason for which it had been imposed no longer existed, continued to be levied through a great part of this period. It seems to have been a stated article in the annual charge against the sheriffs of the several counties, who collected and paid it into the exchequer. The annual danegild for the county of Surrey was 185*l.* 6*s.*, for Essex 252*l.* 6*s.* These appear at present to be trifling sums, but they were of considerable value in the times we are now considering.

Tolls levied at bridges, and in fairs and markets, with the customs on goods exported and imported, made a part of the royal revenue, that will be more particularly described in another place.

Fines, free gifts, and oblations, formed one of the most abundant sources of the riches of the kings of England in this period. It is hardly possible to enumerate all the various occasions on which valuable presents were made to these princes. No franchise or privilege of any kind could be obtained from the crown without a fine or oblation proportioned to its value. Great fines were paid by prodigious numbers of people, in order to obtain justice, and that they might be allowed the benefit of a legal trial; while others gave great gifts to procure the royal interposition for preventing law proceedings against them; and not a few agreed to give one half, or a third, or fourth part, of their lawful debts to the king, that they might procure payment by his authority. In a word, justice was openly sold by these sovereigns to their subjects; which made the famous articles in the great charter against selling delaying, and denying justice, very necessary. No office, either in church or state, could be obtained without a bribe; and in some reigns, even bishoprics were exposed to sale, and bestowed on the highest offerers. There was hardly any business so contemptible, or so dishonourable, in which some of our princes in this period did not engage for money; nor did they disdain to accept of dogs, hawks, hens, lampreys, shads, and such paltry presents, when they could not obtain more valuable bribes. For money they sold even their love and hatred, and were pleased or angry, friends or enemies, as they were paid. To complete their shame, all these articles of their revenues are regularly entered in the public records, where they still remain undeniable monuments of their venality.

Amerciaments formed another very ample source of wealth to the kings of England in this period. These were often excessive, and were imposed on a thousand different occasions, not only for real crimes, but for trivial or imaginary offences, and on the most frivolous pretences. In the records of those times we meet with many persons who were severely amerced for making foolish speeches or returning foolish answers, and even for having short memories, or being ignorant of things which they could not possibly know. On these accounts amerçiaments were the sources of infinite vexations to the subjects, as well as of great riches to the sovereigns of England in this period. They fell heavy, not only on the common people, but upon the greatest prelates and most powerful barons of the kingdom; which gave occasion to the 27th article of the great charter, in which it is declared,—“That earls and barons shall not be amerced except by their peers, and according to the degree of their offence.”

Moneyage was a tax that had been levied in Normandy long before the conquest, and was levied in England by the first and second Norman kings. By it, one shilling was paid on every hearth once in every three years, to prevail upon the king not to debase the coin. For these princes insisted on being paid, not only for doing good, but for not doing all the evil that was in their power. This tax was abolished by the charter of liberties granted by Henry I.

The farms of counties, and of cities, towns, and corporations, or gilds, brought very considerable sums into the royal coffers in this period. The profits arising from law proceedings in the county-courts, were divided between the king and the earls of the county, two-thirds belonging to the former, and one-third to the latter. The king's part of these profits was farmed from year to year by the sheriffs, together with some other small articles of revenue, for a certain sum of money, which they paid into the exchequer. The far greatest part of the cities and towns of England belonged to the royal demesnes, and their inhabitants held their lands and houses immediately of the king; who commonly granted the farm of all the rents and gilds due to him from all the citizens or burgesses, for their lands and houses, to the community, or to the chief magistrate, in name of the community, for a certain rent to be paid yearly into the exchequer. For the further encouragement of towns and cities, and for promoting commerce and arts, the monarchs of England, in this period, formed the inhabitants of these towns and cities, of certain professions, as merchants, goldsmiths, weavers, &c. into corporations or gilds, to whom they granted various privileges, for which they paid certain sums of money yearly into the exchequer.

When a sum of money was due to the king, an additional sum was payable to the queen-consort, called (aurum reginae) queen-gold. The proportion in some cases, perhaps in all, was one pound, mark, or shilling, on every hundred pounds, marks, or shillings; or, as we now express it, one per cent.

The Jews settled in England in this period were both very numerous and very wealthy; but their wealth was entirely at the mercy of the king, who seized any proportion of it he pleased at any time he thought proper. A degree of power which is seldom used with moderation, and which was much abused by some of our princes, who extorted prodigious sums of money from the Jews, by the most cruel and violent methods. Of the greatness of these sums, we may form some conception from the following examples. Isaac, the Jew of Norwich, was fined to King John in the enormous sum of ten thousand marks (equal in value and efficacy to one hundred thousand pounds of our money at present), to be paid at the rate of one mark a-day during life. A considerable part of this sum was accordingly paid by Isaac in his lifetime, and the remainder by his heirs. A Jew of Bristol is said to have paid an equal sum to the same prince. In a word, the revenues squeezed from the Jews on various pretences were so great, that a particular exchequer, called the exchequer of the Jews, was established for their receipt, and a number of officers appointed for their management.

From the above enumeration of the several sources of the revenues of the Norman kings of England in this period, though far from being complete, it is sufficiently evident that these revenues were very great. We are assured by an author who was born in England only nine years after the conquest, that those of William I. amounted to the incredible sum of 1061*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* per day, which (neglecting the fraction) was equal in efficacy to 15,915*l.* of our money per day, and to 5,808,975*l.* per year. This account, extravagant as it may appear, is not very different from that which is given by Roger Hoveden, a contemporary historian, of the revenues of England in the reign of Richard I. When Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, was about to resign the office of high justiciary, A.D. 1196, he proved from his books, that the revenue he had collected in England in the two preceding years, was no less than eleven hundred thousand marks of silver. A great sum, equivalent to 11,000,000*l.*, at the above rate of computation, in two years, or 5,500,000*l.* in one year. But though it should be allowed that both these accounts are exaggerated, we have still no reason to be surprised, that the kings of England in this period kept such splendid and numerous courts—lived in so much affluence—entertained all their prelates and nobles at the three great festivals—endowed so many monasteries, built so many strong castles and magnificent churches—carried on so many wars—and, after all, left so much money in their treasury when they died.

It is now time to take a view of some of the most important changes that were made in the laws of England, and in the forms of judicial proceedings in the reign of William I. It is indeed true, that William at his coronation took a solemn oath,—“To keep and establish right laws, and to prevent rapine and unjust judgment.” But he either paid no regard to that oath, or did not think himself bound by it to support the laws which he found established. For we have the clearest evidence that he had a predilection for the laws and customs of his native country, and endeavoured to introduce them into England. This is asserted in the plainest terms by Eadmerus, a man of learning, virtue, and integrity, who flourished in those times. “William, having a desire that the customs and laws which his ancestors and he himself had observed in Normandy should be observed in England, made those men bishops, abbots, and princes (earls and barons), who would esteem it dishonourable to oppose his laws in anything, and who dared not to lift up their heads against him. The English,” says Ingulphus, who had been secretary to the conqueror, “were so much abominated, that, whatever their merit might be, they were deprived of all their offices; and strangers, though of inferior abilities, were put into their places.” In consequence of this conduct, in the course of a few years, all the archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, and barons, together with all the judges and pleaders in all the courts of England, were Normans.

This naturally produced many changes, and introduced many Norman laws and customs, without particular statutes for that purpose. One natural consequence of this total change of judges and pleaders in the English courts, was the introduction of the Norman or French language into these courts, because it was the only language the pleaders could speak, or the judges understand. The clerks and scribes also, in all these courts, were necessarily Normans; which occasioned the disuse of the Saxon and the introduction of the French manner of writing. This produced various changes in the forms of legal deeds and charters, particularly in the manner of their confirmation, which, in the Anglo-Saxon times, had been by the subscriptions of many witnesses, with the sign of the cross prefixed to each of their names; but, in the Norman times, by seals impressed upon them or appended to them. Almost all the advocates, as well as the clerks, in the courts of England in this period, were clergymen, from which the clergy got the name of clerks; and the Anglo-Norman clergy were so generally practitioners in law, that it became a proverb,—“There is no clergyman who is not a cause-pleader.” This, however, did not contribute much to the impartial administration of justice; for the best writers of this period represent those clerical advocates as the most covetous and venal of all men.

Fire and water ordeals had been used in Normandy, as well as Britain, before the conquest, and were therefore continued in England after that event. But the judicial combat, or duel, though it had been long established in France and Normandy, and other countries on the continent, both by laws and custom, was first introduced into England by the Normans. This, like other ordeals, was an appeal to the judgment of God for the discovery of the truth or falsehood of an accusation that was denied, or a fact that was disputed, founded on this supposition,—“That Heaven would always interpose, and give the victory to the champions of truth and innocence.” As the judicial combat was esteemed the most honourable, it soon became the most common method of determining all disputes among martial knights and barons, both in criminal and civil causes. When the combatants were immediate vassals of the crown, the combat was performed with great pomp and ceremony in presence of the king, with the constable and marshal of England, who were the judges; but if the combatants were the vassals of a baron, the combat was performed in his presence. If the person accused was victorious, he was acquitted of the crime of which he had been accused; if he was defeated, he was thereby convicted, and subjected to the punishment prescribed by law for his offence. If he was killed, his death was considered both as the proof and punishment of his guilt. If the accused was vanquished, he was, by the laws of some countries, subjected to the same punishment that would have fallen upon the accused; but in England the king had a power to mitigate or remit the punishment. In civil cases the victor gained and the vanquished lost his cause. Many wise laws were made for regulating the times and places of such judicial combats, the dress and arms of the combatants, and every other circumstance; which are too voluminous to be here inserted. Several kinds of persons were by these laws exempted from the necessity of defending their innocence, or their properties, by the judicial combat; as women, priests, the sick, infirm, or maimed, with young men under twenty, and old men above sixty years of age. But all these persons might, if they pleased, employ champions to fight in their causes. It may not be improper, for the further illustration of this singular mode of trial, to give a very brief narration of two judicial combats that were fought in this period, one in a criminal, and the other in a civil cause.

Henry de Essex, hereditary standard-bearer of England, fled from a battle in Wales, A.D. 1158, threw from him the royal standard, and cried out, with others, that the king was slain. Some time after he was accused of having done this with a treasonable intention, by Robert de Montfort, another great baron, who offered to prove the truth of his accusation by combat. Henry de Essex denied the charge, and accepted the challenge. When all preliminaries were adjusted, this combat was accordingly fought, in the presence of Henry II. and all his court. Essex was defeated, and expected to be carried out to immediate execution. But the king, who was no friend to this kind of trial, spared his life, and contented himself with confiscating his estate, and making him a monk in the abbey of Reading.

The priority of Tinmouth, in Northumberland, was a cell of the abbey of St. Alban's. One Simon of Tinmouth claimed a right to two corrodiés, or the maintenance of two persons in the priory, which the prior and monks denied. This cause was brought before the abbot of St. Alban's and his court-baron, who appointed it to be tried by combat on a certain day before him and his barons. Ralf Gubion, prior of Tinmouth, appeared at the time and place appointed, attended by his champion, one William Pegun, a man of gigantic stature. This combat was fought, Pegun was defeated, and the prior lost his cause; at which he was so much chagrined, that he immediately resigned his office. This judicial combat is the more remarkable, that it was fought in the court of a spiritual baron, and that one of the parties was a priest.

The trial of criminal and civil causes by a jury of twelve men, which makes so distinguished a figure in English jurisprudence, seems to have been introduced in the reign of William I., and was probably one of those customs which he had seen observed in his native country, and which he wished to see observed in England. For this custom had prevailed in Scandinavia in very remote ages, was brought from thence into that part of France which was possessed by Rollo and his followers, and from them called Normandy, where it was preserved till it was imported into England at the conquest. This custom was not established at once by any positive statute, but came into use by slow degrees, and was far from being common in the former part of this period, when almost all causes were tried by ordeals of one kind or other. But in the reign of Henry II., after a law was made allowing the defendant, in a criminal or civil process, to defend his innocence, or his right, either by battle, or by a jury of twelve men, called the grand assize, this last method, as being the most rational, became more and more frequent, till at length it obtained a complete victory over the judicial combat, and every other ordeal.

This victory however was not obtained till long after the conclusion of this period.

That there was a very great similarity between the laws of England and Normandy, soon after the conquest, is undeniable, and may be seen by any one who will take the trouble of comparing the work of Ranulph de Glanvill, chief justiciary to Henry II., of the laws and customs of England, with the grand coutumiere of Normandy. This similarity does not subsist only in matters of essential justice, which are or ought to be the same in all countries; but in the rules of descents, the terms of limitations, the forms of writs, and many other things of an indifferent nature, which could neither have arisen from necessity, nor have fallen out by accident. The only question is, how this similarity was produced; whether by the exportation of the English laws into Normandy, or the importation of the Norman laws into England? Something of both these might have happened in the course of time; but in the reign of William I., it is evident, both from the nature of things, and the testimony of historians, that the current of the exchange of laws and customs ran strong from Normandy into England.

But notwithstanding all the changes that were made in the ancient constitution, government, and laws of England by the conquest, it must not be imagined that they were quite destroyed. This was very far from being the case. Many of them were preserved, and even adopted, by the conquerors. Roger Hoveden, and several other historians after him, tell a very formal story on this subject: That in the fourth year of his reign, William the Conqueror, by the advice of his barons, summoned twelve of the most noble and learned of the English out of every county, and that when they were assembled, he commanded them to make a collection of the ancient laws of their country. That they accordingly performed this, and collected the following laws, which William commanded to be observed. They then subjoin a copy of these laws. But, to say nothing of the great improbability that Norman barons would make such a proposal in favour of the English and their laws, there is a passage in one of these laws themselves, which demonstrates that this story cannot be true; for in the eleventh of these laws, concerning the tax called danegild, there is this passage: "That this tax had never been levied on the lands of the church till the reign of William the younger, called William Rufus." Now it is perfectly impossible that a transaction which happened in the reign of William Rufus, could be mentioned in a collection of laws made in the fourth year of his father's reign. But though this story cannot be true, as it is related by these writers, it is highly probable, or rather certain, that William I., in some period of his reign, gave his sanction to a system of ancient English laws, with some additions and alterations of his own. For we are told by Ingulphus, a writer of undoubted credit, who was an intimate friend and favourite of the Conqueror, "I brought with me, at the same time (A.D. 1081), from London to my monastery, certain laws of the most righteous King Edward, which my illustrious lord King William had promulgated as authentic and perpetual, and to be inviolably observed through the whole kingdom of England, under the severest penalties." These laws are published by the learned Mr. Selden, in his notes on Eadmerus, from an ancient transcript of the original, which, he says, was still preserved at Croiland in Lincolnshire. These laws are written in the French and Norman language of the eleventh century; and consequently are very obscure, and in some places hardly intelligible. They are all of a penal nature, fifty in number, and are evidently a compilation from several systems of Anglo-Saxon laws. In another system of laws published by the Conqueror, there is one commanding all the laws of Edward the Confessor to be observed, with the additions that he had made to them, for the benefit of the English. This probably refers to those laws which Ingulphus brought with him from London.

The great veneration that William I. professed to entertain for the memory of Edward the Confessor, from whose last will he pretended to derive a title to the crown, might contribute something to preserve some of the ancient English laws and customs. But their preservation was chiefly owing to the invincible attachment of the native English to their ancient laws. This was so great, that they seem to have been written on their hearts, and they never ceased to cry for their restoration. On some occasions, when their assistance was wanted, their cries were heard; and from time to time, many of those liberties which had been torn from them by the hand of violence, were restored. This will appear in part in the subsequent section, but more fully in the following volumes of this work.

SECTION II.

History of the changes in the Constitution, Government, and Laws of England, in the reigns of William II., Henry I., Stephen, Henry II., Richard I., and John, from 1087 to 1215.

As the most important changes in the English constitution were made, either in the reign of William I., by the establishment of the feudal system; or in the reign of John, by the limitation and mitigation of the severities of that system, it will not be necessary to dwell long on the five intermediate reigns.

The succession to the crown of England, after the death of Edward the Confessor, became so unsettled, that it seemed to be set up as an object of ambition to every bold invader, who had but a slight pretence, together with power and courage to seize the glittering prize. To say nothing of Harold and the Conqueror, the three successors of this last, William, Henry, and Stephen, are esteemed by many no better than usurpers, and most certainly reigned with a disputed title.

This proved a most fortunate circumstance to the native English, and to their posterity, as it contributed not a little to raise them from that insignificance into which they had been depressed. It even contributed to the preservation of what was left, and to the restoration of what had been lost, of their ancient liberties. For the Norman barons having estates both in Normandy and England, naturally desired to see the ducal and royal crown on the same head, that they might enjoy their estates in both countries. Many of these barons therefore favoured and were ready to support the pretensions of Robert duke of Normandy, eldest son of William I., to the crown.

England, first against his younger brother William, and afterwards against his youngest brother Henry. This obliged both these princes to have recourse to the native English, who were still formidable by their numbers, after all the losses they had sustained. "William Rufus," says a contemporary historian, "seeing almost all the Normans in England conspiring against him, invited, by letters, the bravest and most respectable among the English who were yet remaining, to come to him; and complaining to them of the disloyalty of the Normans, he prevailed upon them to engage in his quarrel, by promising them good laws, and abatement of taxes, and the liberty of hunting.—He called them his dear English, exhorted them to collect their countrymen, under the penalty that every one who did not come, should be called a Nidering, a name which he knew none of them could endure. In consequence of this such multitudes of the English crowded to the king, that he soon formed an invincible army." It is very true, that as soon as the storm was blown over, William violated all his promises, and proved a greater tyrant and oppressor than his father. But still this transaction was of some use, as it raised the English from their neglected state, and taught them their own importance.

As the title of Henry I. was liable to the same objection with that of his brother William; so he was exposed to the same danger, on his accession to the throne, and had recourse to the same expedient, with this only difference, that he put his promises in writing, in the form of a charter, and extended them to all his subjects. This charter contained many mitigations of the most distressing articles of the feudal system, to gain the Normans, with an express restoration of the laws of Edward the Confessor, to please the English. It cannot be denied, that the written promises of Henry were shamefully violated as well as the verbal ones of William; but his charter being in writing, and copies of it being sent into every county, and deposited in every monastery, had greater effect, by diffusing and cherishing the love of liberty, and equal laws, among the Normans, as well as English. It served also as a model, on which the Great Charter of Liberties, in the reign of King John, was formed. Henry I. promulgated also a system of laws as he had promised in his charter, consisting of the laws of Edward the Confessor, with some alteration that had been made in them by his father the Conqueror.

As the usurpation of King Stephen was more unjustifiable in many respects than that of the two former kings, so he was more liberal of his promises of good laws and good government, than any of his predecessors. These promises were made with great solemnity on the day of his coronation, and were soon after confirmed by a charter. But the credit of royal promises and royal charters was now become so low, that the clergy and some of the barons swore fealty to Stephen, only as long as he kept his promises and observed his charters. His conduct soon justified their suspicions. By violating all his promises, he excited a civil war, which raged during his whole reign, and effectually prevented any amendment of the constitution.

It was in this turbulent reign that the pandects of Justinian were brought into England from Rome by some of Archbishop Theobald's attendants; and Roger Vacarius, prior of Bec, read lectures upon them to very crowded audiences, both of the clergy and laity. Great opposition, however, was made to the introduction of those laws; and John of Salisbury tells us, that he had seen some who were so much enraged against them, that whenever they met with a copy of the Roman law, they tore it in pieces, or threw it into the fire. King Stephen, out of hatred (as the learned Mr. Selden thinks) to Archbishop Theobald, joined in this opposition, by publishing an edict, imposing silence on Vacarius, and prohibiting any one to read the books of the civil law. But this edict did not put a stop to the study of the civil law, as will afterwards appear.

Though the title of Henry II. to the crown was more clear and unexceptionable than those of his three predecessors, he thought it prudent, on his accession, to conciliate the affections of his subjects by granting them a charter, confirming that of his grandfather Henry I. This great prince, in the course of his long reign, made several improvements in the law, especially in its forms, in the manner of its administration, and the practice of its courts. This appears very plainly from that most ancient treatise of the laws and customs of England, written by, or at least published under the name of, Ranulph de Glanvill, who was chief justiciary to this king. Some of these improvements merit a place in history.

The unhappy separation of the ecclesiastical from the civil courts made by William I., had by this time produced the most fatal consequences. For the former of these courts had not only become terrible to persons of all ranks, by their interdicts, excommunications, and other censures; but the clergy, in consequence of this separate jurisdiction, to which they alone pretended they were responsible, had emancipated themselves in a great measure from all subjection to civil authority, and committed the most horrid crimes with impunity. Henry II., if we may believe one of the best of our ancient historians, was assured by his judges, that the clergy, in the first ten years of his reign, had committed no fewer than one hundred murders, besides many thefts, robberies, rapes, and other crimes, for which they could not punish them. To put a stop to those intolerable evils, and reduce the clergy to the rank of subjects, Henry, in a great council, A.D. 1164, enacted the famous constitutions of Clarendon. These were sixteen in number; and though an outline of their purport has already been given in the body of the history, a more particular account will not be superfluous.

1. All pleas between clergymen and laymen shall be tried in the king's courts.
2. Churches in the king's gift shall not be filled without his consent.
3. All clergymen, when accused of any crime, shall be tried in the king's courts; and when convicted, shall not be protected from punishment by the church.
4. Clergymen shall not go out of the kingdom without the king's leave.
- 5, 6. Regulate the manner of proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts.
7. None of the king's ministers or vassals shall be excommunicated without his knowledge.
8. Appeals from the archbishop to be made to the king.
9. Pleas between a clerk and a layman, whether an estate was in free-alsms or a lay-fee, to be tried in the king's court by a jury.
10. One of the king's tenants might be interdicted, but not excommunicated, without the consent of the civil judge of the place.
11. All prelates, who hold baronies of the king shall perform the same services with other barons. 12. The revenues of vacant sees and abbeys belong to the king. The election of prelates shall be with the king's consent; and they shall swear fealty, and do homage to the king, before their consecration. 13, 14, 15. Direct the manner of proceeding, in case any of the king's barons shall disseise any of the clergy of the lay fees which they held under them. 16. The sons of villains shall not be ordained without the leave of their masters. But the salutary effects of these constitutions were in a great measure prevented by the invincible opposition of Thomas Becket.

Justice was not always administered in those ancient times, by the barons and sheriffs in the inferior courts, with the greatest wisdom and impartiality; partly owing to the ignorance of the judges, and partly to the prevalence of faction among the suitors in these courts. Nor was it an easy matter to procure relief from an iniquitous sentence pronounced by a baron or sheriff, on account of the great distance and unsettled state of the king's court, which constantly attended his person. To remedy those inconveniences, Henry II., with the advice of a great council of his prelates, earls, and barons, at Northampton, A.D. 1176, divided the whole kingdom into six parts or circuits, and appointed three judges, learned in the law, to hold courts in each of these, by a commission from the king, empowering them to hear and determine all causes not exceeding the value of one half of a knight's fee, unless the matter was of such importance or difficulty as to require the judgment of the king's court in his royal presence. These justices itinerant took an oath to administer justice to all persons with impartiality. They had also authority to judge in all criminal causes and pleas of the crown, and to transact a variety of other affairs for the public good. A small change was made in this excellent institution, A.D. 1179, by dividing the kingdom into four circuits, and allowing a greater number of judges to each of these circuits. It is easy to conceive how great a check the circuits of these judges of superior rank, knowledge, and integrity, must have given to the wantonness and partiality of the inferior courts, and how great an advantage they were to the people, by bringing justice within their reach. It must, however, be confessed, that though the honour of bringing this wise institution to a settled state is due to Henry II., there is sufficient evidence that courts were held, occasionally at least, by itinerant judges in more ancient times.

This wise prince was no friend to the superstitious modes of trial by fire and water ordeals, nor to the barbarous one by single combat, especially in civil causes. He therefore endeavoured to introduce trials by juries, or by the oaths of twelve men of the vicinage, called the grand assize, as more rational. With this view he made a law, allowing the defendant, in a plea of right, to support his title, either by single combat, or by a grand assize, "which," says Glanvill, "is a benefit granted to the people by the king's clemency, upon consultation with his nobles, in tenderness of life, whereby men might decline the doubtful success of battle, and try the right to their freehold in the other way." This was a great improvement in English jurisprudence, and from hence we may date the more frequent use of juries than in former times.

Though Richard I. spent much of his time out of the kingdom, and in the toils of war, he was not inattentive to matters of police and law. The laws which he made for the government of his fleet in his voyage to the Holy Land, are truly curious, particularly the last of these laws, which is to this purpose:—"If any one is convicted of theft, let his head be shaved like a champion's; let melted pitch be poured upon it, and feathers shaken over it, that he may be known, and let him be set on shore at the first land to which the ship approaches." To say nothing of the other maritime and mercantile laws, he made some excellent regulations for establishing an uniformity of weights and measures over the whole kingdom. This prince gave also very long and particular directions to the justices itinerant for the regulation of their conduct on their circuits. These directions were contained in two capitularies, one relating to the pleas of the crown, and the other to the affairs of the Jews, who, on account of their numbers and riches, were regarded by government with great attention. Richard I. gave also very particular directions to the justices of his forests, who held forest-courts in all parts of England, at which all archbishops, bishops, earls, and barons, as well as persons of inferior rank, were obliged to attend, and answer to interrogatories. These directions, which are too long to be here inserted, set the rigour of the forest-laws in so strong a light, that we need not wonder the barons in the next reign insisted upon some articles being inserted in the Great Charter for mitigating their severity.

Though King John was certainly one of the worst princes that ever filled the throne of England, his reign will be for ever memorable for the melioration of the constitution by the Great Charter of Liberties that was then obtained. His merit, however, in this melioration, was very small, as he contributed to it only by rendering himself odious by his vices, contemptible by his follies, and impotent by his losses, which both constrained and encouraged his subjects to demand, and enabled them to obtain, by means already related, this great palladium of English liberty.

We are indebted to the labours of a learned judge for an accurate history and correct edition of the Great Charter of King John, and of the similar charters of his son Henry III., and grandson Edward I. Of that edition of the charter, a plain and almost literal translation is subjoined, which may be agreeable to some readers.

It is not the province, though it were in the power, of an historian, to give a complete commentary on this famous charter. All the purposes of general history, it is hoped, will be sufficiently answered by a short analysis, pointing out, in a few words, the grievances and hardships that were intended to be removed, with the liberties and privileges that were designed to be granted by the Great Charter of King John. And although this has to a certain extent been done in the narration of the current events of John's reign, it will not be improper, under the present head, to give a more detailed account of this most important national document.

The privileges and liberties that were granted or confirmed to the people of England by this charter, may be divided into these four classes. 1. Those that were granted to the church and clergy. 2. To the earls, barons, knights, and others, who held of the king in capite. 3. To cities, towns, and merchants, for the encouragement of trade. 4. To the whole body of freemen. For none of the parties concerned in this charter ever entertained a thought of emancipating slaves or villains; and therefore they are mentioned only once, and that for the benefit of their masters.

As Archbishop Langton, and six other bishops, were at the head of the barons who procured this charter, we may be certain that the interests of the church would not be forgotten. But the power and wealth of the clergy were then so great, and their grievances so few, that they had hardly anything to complain of or to ask. This is no doubt the reason that there are so few articles in the charter, particularly respecting the church and clergy.

The famous constitutions of Clarendon, made by Henry II., A.D. 1164, had been the great object of the execration and horror of the popes, and of those English clergy who were of their party, for half a century before the granting of the Great Charter. There is hardly a name in the Latin language, expressive of abhorrence and detestation, which is not bestowed by the monkish writers of those times on these hated regulations. After a long and violent struggle, in which Archbishop Becket lost his life, Henry II. had been obliged to give up the greatest part of his favourite constitutions. To guard against the restoration of those detested laws, and to eradicate their remains, had been the chief concern of the English clergy for many years. It was evidently with this view that the several articles respecting the church and clergy were inserted in the Great Charter, which seems to be the true key for the right understanding of these articles.

It is declared in the first article, "that the English church shall be free, and have her rights entire, and her liberties unhurt." By the freedom here stipulated for the church of England, we are most probably to understand the exemption of the clergy from the jurisdiction of the civil courts, to which they had been subjected by the third constitution of Clarendon. This pernicious exemption was contended for by Becket, and the great body of the clergy, as if it had constituted the very essence of Christianity, on which the existence of the church depended; and when they had obtained it, they defended it with equal obstinacy. One of the rights of the church, which is particularly mentioned in this first article, is directly contrary to the twelfth constitution of Clarendon. It is the right which John had granted by a particular charter about a year before, to the monks of cathedral churches and abbeys, freely to choose their own bishops and abbots.

The twenty-second article of the charter seems to indicate very plainly, that the freedom granted to the clergy implied an exemption of their persons as clergymen, and of their benefices belonging to the church, from civil jurisdiction. For by that article it is declared, that no clergyman shall be amerced according to the value of his ecclesiastical benefice, but according to his secular estate. A clergyman, therefore, who had no secular estate, was not liable to be amerced. One reason for inserting that article seems to have been that some clergymen, who had secular estates, had been so unreasonable as to plead, that these estates should be exempted from civil jurisdiction, as well as their ecclesiastical benefices.

None of the constitutions of Clarendon was more disagreeable to the pope and clergy than the fourth, which prohibited all archbishops, bishops, and clerks, from going out of the kingdom without the king's leave. For by this law the clergy were prevented from prosecuting their appeals and other affairs at the court of Rome, and that court was deprived of much power and riches. This restraint was effectually removed by the forty-second article of the Great Charter, which permitted all persons, the clergy not excepted, to go out of the kingdom and return into it when they pleased.

As the earls, barons, and other military tenants of the crown, were the chief instruments of procuring the Great Charter; there are several articles in it particularly calculated for their relief and benefit, by mitigating some of the most oppressive rigours and abuses of the feudal system of tenures, under which they groaned. These articles, though they were of great importance, will not require much illustration; as the remedy proved by the charter clearly enough points out the evils intended to be remedied.

By the second article of the charter, the reliefs of the heirs of earls, barons, and other military tenants of the crown, are fixed and ascertained according to the ancient rate of reliefs.

By what means this ancient rate of reliefs had been laid aside, we are not informed. But there is sufficient evidence, that, in the late reigns, as well as in that of King John, the reliefs of earls and barons had been arbitrary and uncertain. Henry I. says, in his charter which he granted at his accession, "If any of my earls, barons, or other vassals die, their heirs shall not be obliged to redeem their land, as they were in the time of my brother; but they shall be put in possession of it on paying a just and reasonable relief." Glanvill, who flourished in the reign of Henry II., acquaints us, "that the reliefs for baronies were not fixed; but were according to the pleasure and mercy of the king." This was also the law of Scotland in this period. It is easy to imagine how great an instrument of oppression the uncertainty of reliefs might be in the hands of such princes as William Rufus or King John, and how great an advantage it was to the military tenants of the crown to have them ascertained.

Though the king reaped great profits from the wardship of the heirs of his earls, barons, and other vassals, when they were minors, and ought therefore to have put them in possession of their lands when they came of age, without exacting any relief or payment of any kind, it appears to have been common to demand a fine proportioned to the value of the estate. To correct this abuse, it is declared, (art. 3,) "that when an heir who had been a ward, comes of age, he shall have his inheritance without relief or fine."

Sometimes a king of England, in this period, appointed the sheriff of the county, or some other person, to manage the estate of an earl or baron who was his ward, and to pay the profits arising from it into the exchequer. At other times he sold or granted the wardship, with all its profits, to some particular person. In both these cases, the tenants on the estate of the royal wards were often much oppressed, and the estates wasted, by the managers, the grantees, or purchasers, for their own profit. The persons who had the custody of those estates also permitted the castles, houses, mills, parks, &c. upon them to go to ruin, because they would not be at the expense of repairs. By the fourth and fifth articles of the Great Charter, some partial remedies are provided against these abuses; in which the most remarkable circumstance is that the managers of these estates are prohibited from wasting the men, as well as the cattle, woods, and other things upon them. This shows, that the unhappy men who were annexed to their estates, were viewed in the same light, by the mighty champions of liberty, the authors of the Great Charter, as the negroes in our plantations are viewed by their proprietors.

If the heirs of earls, barons, and other military tenants of the crown, were liable to great losses in their fortunes from their sovereign's right of wardship, they were liable to still greater injuries from his right of disposing of them in marriage. In consequence of this unnatural right, the heirs and heiresses of the greatest families and fortunes were frequently sold or granted in marriage to persons disagreeable to, or unworthy of them; or were obliged to preserve themselves from so great a calamity, by paying exorbitant fines. To set some bounds to this intolerable tyranny, it was granted by the sixth article of the Great Charter, "that heirs should not be married to their disparagement, or without the knowledge of their relations." But this was evidently too general and indefinite to be an effectual remedy to so great an evil.

Not only heirs and heiresses, but also widows, were subjected to great oppressions by the feudal system. They were often obliged to pay heavy fines to obtain possession of their dower, and for liberty to remain unmarried, or to marry whom they pleased. Thus Maud countess of Warwick, in the thirty-first year of Henry II., gave seven hundred marks to the king, equal in value and efficacy to seven thousand pounds of our money at present, that she might have her dower, and be at liberty to marry whom she pleased. Lucia countess of Chester paid five hundred marks to King Stephen, that she might not be compelled to marry within five years. King John had carried this part of feudal oppression, as well as all the rest, to a greater height than any former prince; for Alicia countess of Warwick paid him no less than one thousand pounds, that she might not be forced to marry till she pleased. The seventh and eighth articles of the Great Charter were intended to restrain these abuses.

While the kings of England acted as if they had been the sole judges both of the quantity of the feudal prestations, of aids, scutages, and tallages, and of the frequency of exacting them (as they often did in this period), the property of their vassals was insecure. For when the king could take any proportion of their goods at any time he pleased, they had, properly speaking, nothing that they could call their own. To prevent this most dangerous abuse in the sovereign, and to prevent his granting permission to inferior feudal lords to be guilty of abusing, in the same manner, their power over their vassals, is the intention of the twelfth and fifteenth articles of the Great Charter. These articles, however, did not prevent those abuses, which were not effectually removed till long after the conclusion of this period.

So very tyrannical and encroaching had some of our princes been, that when the military vassal of an inferior lord happened to hold a small piece of land of the crown by soccage, or burgage-tenure, they claimed the wardship and marriage of his heir, though they most evidently belonged to the lord of whom he held by military tenure. This most unreasonable claim was relinquished by the thirty-seventh article of the Great Charter.

Because it would have been impossible to enumerate all the various unjust vexations to which the military vassals of the crown were liable, and to provide particular remedies for each of them, a general provision is made in the sixteenth article,—“that no man shall be constrained to do more service for a knight's fee than what is due.” But this provision was too general to be of much use.

Such were the mitigations of some of the greatest rigours of the feudal system, obtained from King John, in this famous charter, by the barons; but none of them were capable of forming an idea of the perfect freedom from all the servilities of that system, which their posterity now enjoy.

One thing which seemed at least to render the above limitations of the power of the sovereign as a feudal lord of greater value, and more universal benefit, was this, that, by the sixtieth article of this famous charter, the same limitations are imposed upon all inferior feudal lords towards their vassals. This article, which was highly reasonable, was probably inserted at the desire of the king; and in the event was so far from extending the benefit of the limitations in the charter, that it contributed not a little to render them ineffectual. For though the great barons were very desirous to prevent the tyrannical exercise of the feudal authority of the sovereign towards themselves, many of them were much inclined to exercise it in that manner towards their vassals, and continued to do so after this charter was granted. This both encouraged our kings to violate all its limitations, and furnished them with a ready answer to all the complaints of their barons. So uncertain are the effects of political regulations, and so different do they sometimes prove in fact, from what they promised in theory.

The great barons in this period had in general little knowledge of trade, and little regard for merchants; besides, the cities and towns of England, for almost a century after the conquest, London and a few others excepted, were very inconsiderable, and many of their inhabitants were little better than slaves to the king, or to the barons in whose territories they were situated. But about the middle of the twelfth century they began to emerge from this obscurity into some degree of consideration. Many small towns were made free burghs by the royal charters of Henry II., Richard I., and King John; and had merchants, guilds, and other fraternities established in them, with various privileges, which soon filled them with inhabitants. Many of these free burghs favoured the cause of the barons. The citizens of London, in particular, embraced their party with so much zeal, that they gave them possession of their city, to which they were chiefly indebted for the success of their enterprise. This was probably the reason that the privileges of cities and towns, and the interests of trade, were not quite neglected in the Great Charter.

It was granted by the thirteenth article of that charter, that the city of London, and all the other cities, burghs, towns, and ports of the kingdom, should enjoy all their liberties and freecustoms, both by land and water. In times when law and justice had their regular course, such a stipulation would have been thought unnecessary. But this was far from being the case when fines from cities, towns, and corporations, for license to use their legal rights and liberties, constituted a considerable branch of the royal revenue. By the twenty-third article it is declared, that towns shall not be compelled to build bridges or embank rivers, except where they are obliged to it by law. It was probably at the desire of the citizens of London that the thirty-third article was inserted, commanding all crues or weirs (then called keydels) to be removed out of the rivers Thames and Medway, and other rivers; because they obstructed the navigation of these rivers. This appears plainly from a precept of Henry III. granted about twelve years after this, strictly requiring "that for the common utility of the city of London, all keydels in the rivers Thames and Medway, and particularly those near the Tower of London, be immediately removed." It is also probable that the thirty-fifth article, commanding the London measures of wine, ale, and corn, with an uniformity of weights to be observed over all the kingdom, was dictated by the Londoners. Lending money on interest was, in this period, called usury, and prohibited to Christians by the canons of the church, and even by the laws of the land. This branch of business therefore fell entirely into the hands of the Jews, who were the only money lenders, and commonly great extortioners. It was probably at the suggestion of the Londoners, who had borrowed great sums of the Jews, that the tenth article was inserted in the charter, "that money owing to Jews should pay no interest during the minority of the debtor;" though it must be confessed that this article was equally advantageous to feudal superiors who had the wardship of minors.

One of the greatest obstructions to the progress of commerce in this period, was an impolitic and ungenerous jealousy of strangers in general, and of foreign merchants in particular, that prevailed in England, as well as in several other countries. In consequence of this these merchants were subjected to many restraints and hardships. They were not allowed to come into the kingdom but at certain times, nor to stay above forty days, nor to expose their goods to sale, except at certain fairs. They were often obliged to pay great fines to the king for license to trade, and much higher customs and tolls of all kinds than natives. Both their persons and their goods were exposed to great violences when a war happened to break out between England and the country to which they belonged. But about this time juster notions of trade began to be entertained by some persons, most probably by the chief citizens of London, and by their influence, an article (the forty-first), very favourable to foreign merchants both in times of peace and war, was inserted in the Great Charter. The language of this article is so plain that it needs no illustration.

The great barons, who were the chief instruments of procuring this famous charter, may be viewed as acting in the two capacities, first, of the military vassals of the crown; second, of the subjects of the kingdom. They consulted their interest in the first capacity, by the limitations of the rigours of the feudal tenures which they procured, in which all who held lands by military services shared with them. They consulted their interest in the second capacity by the amendments they procured in the general police of the kingdom, in which all their fellow-subjects, who were freemen, were partakers. These amendments were numerous and important, tending to remove or alleviate the several grievances of which the people in general complained.

The greatest of all the grievances of which the people of England complained in this period, was, that the mere will and arbitrary commands of the sovereign were substituted in the place of law, and men were seized, imprisoned, stripped of their estates, outlawed, banished, and even destroyed, without any trial. That this complaint was not without foundation, might be proved by giving examples of every one of these tyrannical acts; but it will certainly be sufficient to give one example in which they are all included, and that taken from the history of the best prince who reigned in this period. Henry II. was so much enraged against Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, for his opposition to the constitutions of Clarendon, and his flight out of the kingdom, that he apprehended all his relations, friends, and dependants, to the number of four hundred persons, men, women, and children, confiscated all their estates and goods, and banished them out of the kingdom in the middle of winter, A.D. 1165, obliging all the adults among them to take an oath at their departure, that they would go to Sens, and present themselves to the archbishop. All this was done, not only without any trial, but even without any suspicion or possibility of guilt, as many of the sufferers were infants, by the mere arbitrary command of the king, in order to distress the archbishop by the sight of so many persons connected with him by the ties of blood or friendship, ruined on his account, and to oppress him with the charge of their support. To put a stop to such outrageous exertions of arbitrary power, the following concession was made by King John in the thirty-ninth article of his charter: "No freeman shall be apprehended, or imprisoned, or disseised, or outlawed, or banished, or any other way destroyed, nor will we go upon him, nor will we send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land:" the most valuable stipulation in the whole charter, and the grand security of the liberties, persons, and properties of the people of England, which cannot be unjustly invaded if this law is not violated. The expressions,—we will not go upon him,—we will not send upon him,—signify, that the king would not sit in judgment, or pronounce sentence, on any freeman, either in person, or by his judges, except by the verdict of a jury, or by a process conducted according to the established laws of the land. By this last expression, trials by ordeals, by judicial combats, and by compurgators, are probably intended, as these were all in use at this time, and agreeable to law.

Next to the substitution of arbitrary will in the place of law, the king's personal interfering in law-suits depending before his courts, in order to interrupt or pervert the regular course of justice, was one of the greatest grievances of this period. This was done in so public and shameless a manner, that the bribes received by our kings for these iniquitous practices, were regularly entered in the revenue-rolls of every year, and amounted to great sums. To put a stop to this great abuse, it is promised by King John, in the fortieth article of his charter,—“To no man will we sell, to no man will we deny or delay right and justice.”

The people of England also complained, that too many of the judges had neither a competent knowledge of the law, nor a due regard to justice. To remove the ground of these complaints, King John engaged, in article forty-fifth, “We will not make justiciaries, constables of castles, sheriffs, or bailiffs, unless of such as know the law of the kingdom, and are well inclined to observe it.” Still further to secure the lives of the subjects from being endangered by the ignorance or iniquity of inferior judges, it is provided by article twenty-fourth, “That no sheriff, constable of a castle, coroner, or bailiff, shall hold pleas of the crown,” i. e. try capital crimes, or inflict capital punishments.

The ambulatory, unsettled state of the king's court, which constantly attended the royal person, was a great obstruction to the regular administration of justice, and made a revisal of the proceedings of inferior courts very hard to be obtained. To remove this inconvenience, it is declared by article seventeenth,—“Common pleas shall not follow our court, but be held in some certain place.” Amerciaments for trivial offences, or exorbitant and ruinous ones for real delinquencies, were among the greatest grievances of the people of England in this period. The causes for which amerciaments were imposed, were almost innumerable; and as the rates of them were unsettled, and they brought much money into the royal coffers, they were frequently excessive. This was so much the case, that those who were amerced, were said to be in misericordia regis, or at the king's mercy. To set some bounds to these oppressions, was the intention of the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second articles of the Great Charter; by which it is declared, that earls and barons shall not be amerced, except by their peers, and that according to the degree of their delinquency; that no freeholder or freeman shall be heavily amerced for a slight default, nor above measure even for a great misdemeanor; still saving to a freeholder his freehold, to a merchant his merchandise, and to a rustic his implements of husbandry. The savings to these different kinds of persons are called in the charter their contenement; which signifies such a reservation of their estate and goods, as enabled them to keep their countenance, to live in their former ranks, and pursue their former business. Thus also his arms were the contenement of a soldier, his books of a scholar, and, by the laws of Wales, his harp made a part of the contenement of a gentleman.

The prerogative of pre-emption of all things necessary for their court and castles, commonly called purveyance, which belonged to the kings of England in this period, was a source of infinite vexations and injuries to their people. This was sometimes owing to the avarice, and sometimes to the official insolence and cruelty, of the purveyors, who attended the court in all its motions. The miseries inflicted on the country by these petty tyrants in the reign of William Rufus, are thus pathetically described by a writer of undoubted credit, who flourished in those times, and beheld the scenes he represents: “Those who attended the court, plundered and destroyed the whole country through which the king passed, without any control. Some of them were so intoxicated with malice, that when they could not consume all the provisions in the houses which they invaded, they either sold or burnt them. After having washed their horses' feet with the liquors they could not drink, they let them run out on the ground, or destroyed them in some other way. But the cruelties they committed on the masters of families, and the indecencies they offered to their wives and daughters, were too shocking to be described.” Under better princes these enormities were, no doubt, in some degree restrained; but we can hardly suppose that the courtiers and purveyors of King John were much more modest than those of William Rufus. To prevent in some measure those intolerable oppressions, is the design of the twenty-eighth, the thirtieth, and thirty-first articles of the Great Charter.

The fondness, or rather rage, of our ancient kings, for hunting, was productive of many mischiefs to their subjects. Great tracts of country, in almost every county of England, were desolated, and converted into forests, for their game; and these forests, with the game contained in them, were guarded by the most cruel and sanguinary laws. For it was a received doctrine in this period, before the Great Charter was granted, that the king might make what laws he pleased for the protection of his forests; and that in making and executing these laws, he was not under any obligation to observe the ordinary rules of justice. In consequence of this doctrine, the forest-laws were dictated by such a spirit of cruelty, and executed with such severity, that they were great objects of terror, and sources of distress to those who were so unhappy as to live near the precincts of any royal forests. To mitigate in some degree the cruelty of these forest-laws, and the severity with which they were executed, was the intention of the forty-fourth, forty-seventh, and forty-eighth articles of the Great Charter of King John. These articles, however, were soon found to be insufficient to answer the end for which they were intended: and therefore the barons, in the ninth year of the next reign, obtained a separate charter, called carta de foresta, or, the charter of the forests, containing more precise and particular regulations.

The Great Charter of King John contains several other articles, besides those on which observations have been made above; but these are either of a temporary or private nature, or relate to law-writs, and forms, long ago obsolete; or are of little importance, or so plain that they need no illustration.

The barons who procured this famous charter, were not ignorant, that the king had granted it with the most extreme reluctance, and therefore they took every precaution they could invent to render it effectual, and to secure the rights and liberties they had obtained. The great seal was not only appended to it in due form, but both the king and the barons took a solemn oath, to observe it in all particulars with good faith, and without any dissimulation. Not contented with this, they obtained authority to elect twenty-five barons to be the conservators of the charter, with power to compel the king, and his ministers, to fulfil all the articles of it, and immediately to redress every violation. To put it out of the king's power to break through his engagements and to enable the conservators effectually to support the charter, all the king's foreign auxiliaries, which were at this time almost his only strength, were immediately sent out of the kingdom, and the Tower of London was delivered to the conservators.

But it was not till after a very long and bloody struggle that the people of England obtained the peaceable enjoyment of the rights and liberties contained in the Great Charter of King John, and in the similar charters of his successors.

Translation of the Great Charter of King John, granted June 15th, A.D. 1215, in the seventh year of his reign.

JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou, to all his archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls, barons, justiciaries, foresters, sheriffs, commanders, officers, and to all his bailiffs and faithful subjects, wisheth health. Know ye, that we, from our regard to God and for the salvation of our own soul, and of the souls of our ancestors, and of our heirs, to the honour of God, and the exaltation of holy church and amendment of our kingdom, by the advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen archbishop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church, Henry archbishop of Dublin, William of London, Peter of Winchester, Joceline of Bath and Glastonbury, Hugh of Lincoln, Walter of Worcester, William of Coventry, Benedict of Rochester, bishops, master Pandulph, the pope's subdeacon and familiar brother Eymeric master of the knights-templars in England, and of these noble persons, William Marischal earl of Pembroke, William earl of Salisbury, William earl of Warren, William earl of Arundel, Allan of Galloway constable of Scotland, Warin Fitz-Gerard, Peter Fitz-Herbert, Hubert de Burgh steward of Poitou, Hugh de Nevil, Matthew Fitz-Herbert, Thomas Basset, Allan Basset, Philip de Albany, Robert de Roppel, John Marischal, John Fitz-Hugh, and of others of our liegemen, have granted to God, and by this our present charter, have confirmed, for us and our heirs for ever:—1. That the English church shall be free, and shall have her whole rights and her liberties unhurt; and I will this to be observed in such a manner that it may appear from thence, that the freedom of elections, which was reputed most necessary to the English church, which we granted, and by our charter confirmed, and obtained the confirmation of it from Pope Innocent III., before the rupture between us and our barons, was of our own free will. Which charter we shall observe; and we will it to be observed with good faith, by our heirs for ever. We have also granted to all the freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the underwritten liberties, to be enjoyed and held by them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.—2. If any of our earls or barons, or others who hold of us in chief by military service, shall die, and at his death his heir shall be of full age, and shall owe a relief, he shall have his inheritance for the ancient relief, viz. the heir or heirs of an earl, a whole earl's barony, for one hundred pounds: the heir or heirs of a baron, a whole barony for one hundred pounds; * the heir or heirs of a knight, a whole knight's fee, for one hundred shillings at most; and he who owes less, shall give less, according to the ancient custom of fees.—3. But if the heir of any such be under age, and in wardship, when he comes to age he shall have his inheritance without relief and without fine.—4. The warden of an heir who is under age, shall not take of the lands of the heir any but reasonable issues and reasonable customs and reasonable services, and that without destruction and waste of the men or goods: and if we commit the custody of any such lands to a sheriff, or to any other person who is bound to answer to us for the issues of them, and he shall make destruction or waste upon the ward-lands, we will recover damages from him, and the lands shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer for the issues to us, or to him to whom we have assigned them: and if we granted or sold to any one the custody of any such lands, and he shall make destruction or waste, he shall lose the custody; and it shall be committed to two legal and discreet men of that fee, who shall answer to us in like manner as was said before.—5. Besides, the warden, as long as he hath the custody of the lands, shall keep in order the houses, parks, warrens, ponds, mills, and other things belonging to them, out of their issues; and shall deliver to the heir, when he is at age, his whole estate provided with plough and other implements of husbandry, according to what the season requires, and the profits of the lands can reasonably afford. 6. Heirs shall be married without disparagement, and so that before the marriage is contracted, it shall be notified to the relations of the heir by consanguinity.—7. A widow, after the death of her husband, shall immediately, and without difficulty, have her marriage goods and her inheritance; nor shall she give anything for her dower, or her marriage goods, or her inheritance, which her husband and she held on the day of his death. And she may remain in her husband's house forty days after his death, within which time her dower shall be assigned. No widow shall be compelled to marry herself while she chooses to live without a husband, but so that she shall give security that she will not marry herself, without our consent, if she holds of us, or without the consent of the lord of whom she holds, if she holds of another.—9. Neither we nor our bailiffs shall seize any land or rents for any debt, while the chattels of the debtor are sufficient for the payment of the debt; nor shall the sureties of the debtor be distrained, while the principal debtor is able to pay the debt; and if the principal debtor fail in payment of the debt, not having wherewith to pay, the sureties shall answer for the debt; and if they please, they shall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until satisfaction be made to them for the debt which they had before paid for him, unless the principal debtor can show that he is discharged from it by the said sureties.—10. If any one hath borrowed anything from the Jews, more or less, and dies before that debt is paid, the debt shall pay no interest as long as the heir shall be under age, of whomsoever he holds; and if that debt shall fall into our hands, we will not take anything, except the chattels contained in the bond.—11. And if any one dies indebted to the

* This is marks in Matthew Paris, which is probably the right reading.

Jews, his wife shall have her dower, and shall pay nothing of that debt; and if children of the defunct remain who are under age, necessities shall be provided for them, according to the tenement which belonged to the defunct; and out of the surplus the debt shall be paid, saving the rights of the lords of whom the lands are held. The same rules shall be observed with respect to debts owing to others than Jews.—12. No scutage or aid shall be imposed, except by the common council of our kingdom, but for redeeming our body,—for making our eldest son a knight, and for once marrying our eldest daughter; and for these only a reasonable aid shall be demanded. This extends to the aids of the city of London. And the city of London shall have all its ancient liberties, and its free customs, as well by land as by water. Besides, we will and grant, that all other cities and burghs, and towns and sea-ports, shall have all their liberties and free customs.—14. And to have a common council of the kingdom, to assess and aid, otherwise than in the three foresaid cases, or to assess a scutage, we will cause to be summoned the archbishops, bishops, earls, and greater barons, personally, by our letters; and besides, we will cause to be summoned in general by our sheriffs and bailiffs all those who hold of us in chief, to a certain day, at the distance of forty days at least, and to a certain place; and in all the letters of summons, we will express the cause of the summons; and the summons being thus made, the business shall go on at the day appointed, according to the advice of those who shall be present, although all who had been summoned have not come.—15. We will not give leave to any one, for the future, to take an aid of his freemen, except for redeeming his own body, making his eldest son a knight, and marrying once his eldest daughter; and that only a reasonable aid.—16. Let none be distrained to do more service for a knight's fee, nor for any other free tenement, than what is due from thence.—17. Common pleas shall not follow our court, but shall be held in some certain place. Assizes upon the writs of Novel disseisin, Mortdancer (death of the ancestor), and Darrien presentment (last presentation), shall not be taken but in their proper counties, and in this manner. We, or our chief justiciary when we are out of the kingdom, shall send two justiciaries into each county, four times a-year, who, with four knights of each county, chosen by the county, shall take the aforesaid assizes, at a stated time and place, within the county.—18. And if the aforesaid assizes cannot be taken on the day of the county-court, let as many knights and freeholders, of those who were present at the county-court, remain behind, as by them the aforesaid assizes may be taken, according to the greater or less importance of the business.—20. A freeman shall not be amerced for a small offence; but only according to the degree of the offence; and for a great delinquency, according to the magnitude of the delinquency, saving his contentment; a merchant shall be amerced in the same manner, saving his merchandise, and a villein, saving his implements of husbandry. If they fall into our mercy, none of the foresaid amerciaments shall be assessed, but by the oath of honest men of the vicinage.—21. Earls and barons shall not be amerced but by their peers, and that only according to the degree of their delinquency.—22. No clerk shall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the manner of others as aforesaid, and not according to the quantity of his ecclesiastical benefice.—23. Neither a town nor a particular person shall be distrained to build bridges or embankments, except those who anciently, and of right, are bound to do it.—24. No sheriff, constable, coroner, or bailiff of ours, shall hold pleas of our crown.—25. All counties, hundreds, wapentakes, and tithings, shall be at the ancient rent, without any increment, except our demesne-mauors.—26. If any one holding of us a lay-fee dies, and the sheriff or our bailiff shall show our letters-patent of our summons for a debt which the defunct owed to us, it shall be lawful for the sheriff or our bailiff to attach and register the chattels of the defunct found on that fee, to the amount of that debt, at the view of lawful men, so that nothing shall be removed from thence until our debt is paid to us. The clear overplus shall be left to the executors to fulfil the last will of the defunct; and if nothing is owing to us by him, all the chattels shall fall to the defunct, saving to his wife and children their reasonable shares.—27. If any freeman shall die intestate, his chattels shall be distributed by his nearest relations and friends, at the view of the church, saving to every one the debts which the defunct owed to him.—28. No constable or bailiff of ours shall take the corn or other goods of any one, without instantly paying money for them, unless he can obtain respite from the free will of the seller.—29. No constable (governor of a castle) shall distrain any knight to give money for castle-guard, if he is willing to perform it by his own person, or by another good man if he cannot perform it himself, for a reasonable cause. Or if we have carried or sent him into the army, he shall be excused from castle-guard, according to the space of time he hath been in the army at our command.—30. No sheriff or bailiff of ours, or any other person, shall take the horses or carts of any freeman, to perform carriages, without the consent of the said freeman.—31. Neither we, nor our bailiffs, shall take another man's wood, for our castles or other uses, without the consent of him to whom the wood belongs.—32. We will not retain the lands of those who have been convicted of felony, above one year and one day, and then they shall be given up to the lord of the fee.—33. All kydeles (wears) for the future shall be quite removed out of the Thames, the Medway, and through all England, except on the sea-coast.—34. The writ which is called Precipe for the future shall not be granted to any one concerning any tenement by which a freeman may lose his court.—35. There shall be one measure of wine through all our kingdom, and one measure of ale, and one measure of corn, viz. the quarter of London; and one breadth of dyed-cloth and of russets, and of halberjects, viz. two ells within the lists. It shall be the same with weights as with measures.—36. Nothing shall be given or taken for the future for the writ of inquisition of life or limb; but it shall be given gratis, and not denied.—37. If any hold of us by fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, and holds an estate of another by military service, we shall not have the custody of the heir, or of his land, which is of the fee of another, on account of that fee-farm, or soccage, or burgage, unless the fee-farm owes military service. We shall not have the custody of the heir, or of the land of any one, which he holds of another by military service, on account of any petty serjeantry which he holds of us by giving us knives, arrows, or the like.—38. No bailiff, for the future, shall put any man to his law, upon his own simple affirmation, without credible witnesses produced to that purpose.—39. No freeman shall be seized, or imprisoned or disseised, or outlawed, or any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him, nor will we send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.—40. To none will we sell, to none will we deny, to none will we delay right or justice.—41. All merchants shall be safe and secure in coming into England, and going out of England, and staying and travelling through England, as well by land as by water, to buy and to sell, without any unjust exactions, according to ancient and right customs, except in time of war, and if they be of a country at war against us. And if such are found in our dominions at the beginning of a war, they shall be apprehended without injury of their bodies and goods, until it be known to us, or to our chief justiciary, how the merchants of our country are treated in the country at war against us; and if ours are safe there, the others shall be safe in our country.—42. It shall be lawful to any person for the future to go out of our kingdom, and to return safely and securely, by land and by water, saving his allegiance, except in time of war, for some short space, for the common good of the kingdom, except prisoners, outlaws according to the law of the land, and people of the nation at war against us, and merchants who shall be treated as is said above.—43. If any one holdeth of any escheat, as of the honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Boulogne, Lancaster, or of other escheats which are in our hands, and shall die, his heir shall not give any other relief, or do any other service to us, than he should have done to the baron, if that barony had been in the hands of the baron; and we will hold it in the same manner that the baron held it.—44. Men who dwell without the forest, shall not come, for the future, before our justiciaries of the forest, on a common summons, unless they be parties in a plea, or sureties for some person or persons who are attached for the forest.—45. We will not make men justiciaries, constables, sheriffs, or bailiffs, unless they understand the law of the land, and are well disposed to observe it.—46. All barons who have founded abbeys, of which they have charters of the kings of England, or ancient tenure, shall have the custody of them when they become vacant, as they ought to have.—47. All forests which have been made in our time, shall be immediately disforested; and it shall be so done with water-banks, which have been made in our time, in defiance.—48. All evil customs of forests and warrens, and of foresters and warreners, sheriffs and their officers, water-banks, and their keepers, shall immediately be inquired into by twelve knights of the same county, upon oath, who shall be chosen by the good men of the same county; and within forty days after the inquisition is made, they shall be quite destroyed by them never to be restored; provided that this be notified to us before it is done, or to our justiciary, if we are not in England.—49. We will immediately restore all hostages and charters, which have been delivered to us by the English, in security of the peace, and of their faithful service. We will remove from their offices the relations of Gerard de Athyes, that, for the future, they shall have no office in England, Englard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyone de Chancell, Gyone de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martin, and his brothers; Philip Mark, and his brothers; and Geoffrey his grandson; and all their followers.—51. And immediately after the conclusion of the peace, we will remove out of the kingdom all foreign knights, cross-bowmen, and stipendiary soldiers, who have come with horses and arms to the molestation of the kingdom.—52. If any have been disseised or dispossessed by us, without a legal verdict of their peers, or their lands, castles, liberties or rights, we will immediately restore these things to them; and if a question shall arise on this head, it shall be determined by the verdict of the twenty-five barons, who shall be mentioned below, for the security of the peace. But as to all those things of which any one hath been disseised or dispossessed, without a legal verdict of his peers, by King Henry our father, or King Richard our brother, which we have in our hand, or others hold with our warrants, we shall have respite, until the common term of the Croisaders, except those concerning which a plea had been moved, or an inquisition taken, by our precept, before our taking the cross. But as soon as we shall return from our expedition, or if by chance we shall not go upon our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice therein.—53. But we shall have the same respite, and in the same manner, concerning the justice to be done about disforesting or continuing the forests which Henry our father, or Richard our brother, had made; and about the wardship of lands which are of the fee of some other person, but the wardship of which we have hitherto had, on account of a fee which some one held of us by military service; and about abbeys which had been founded in the fee of another, and not in ours, in which abbeys the lord of the fee hath claimed a right. And when we shall have returned, or if we shall stay from our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice in all these pleas.—54. No man shall be apprehended or imprisoned on the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other man, than her husband.—55. All fines that have been made with us unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land; and all americiaments that have been imposed unjustly, or contrary to the law of the land, shall be remitted, or disposed of by the verdict of the twenty-five barons of whom mention is made below for the security of the peace, or by the verdict of the major part of them, together with the aforesaid Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, if he can be present, and others whom he may think fit to bring with him; and if he cannot be present, the business shall proceed notwithstanding without him; but so, that if one or more of the aforesaid twenty-five barons have a similar plea, let them be removed from that particular trial, and others, elected and sworn by the residue of the same twenty-five, be substituted in their room, only for that trial.—56. If we have disseised or dispossessed any Welshman of their land, liberties or other things, without a legal verdict of their peers, in England or in Wales, they shall be immediately restored to them; and if a question shall arise about it, then let it be determined in the marches by the verdict of their peers; if the tenement be in England, according to the law of England: if the tenement be in Wales, according to the law of Wales: if the tenement be in the marches, according to the law of the marches.

The welsh shall do the same to us and our subjects.—57. But concerning those things of which any Welshman hath been disseised or dispossessed without a legal verdict of his peers, by King Henry our father, or King Richard our brother, which we have in our hand, or others hold with our warranty, we shall have respite, until the common term of the Croisaders, except those concerning which a plea had been moved, or an inquisition taken, by our precept, before our taking the cross. But as soon as we shall return from our expedition; or if by chance we shall not go upon our expedition, we shall immediately do complete justice therein, according to the laws of Wales, and the parts aforesaid.—58. We will immediately deliver up the son of Leweline, and all the hostages of Wales, and charters which have been given to us for security of the peace.—59. We shall do to Alexander king of Scotland, concerning the restoration of his sisters and hostages, and his liberties and rights, according to the form in which we act to our other barons of England, unless it ought to be otherwise by charters which we have from his father William, late king of Scotland, and that by the verdict of his peers in our court.—60. But all these aforesaid customs and liberties which we have granted in our kingdom, to be held by our tenants, as far as concerns us, all our clergy and laity shall observe towards their tenants, as far as concerns them.—61. But since we have granted all these things aforesaid, for God, and to the amendment of our kingdom, and for the better extinguishing the discord arisen between us and our barons, being desirous that these things should possess entire and unshaken stability for ever, we give and grant to them the security underwritten, viz. That the barons may elect twenty-five barons of the kingdom, whom they please, who shall with their whole power, observe and keep, and cause to be observed, the peace and liberties which we have granted to them, and have confirmed by this our present charter, in this manner. That if we, or our justiciary, or our bailiffs, or any of our officers, shall have injured any one in any thing, or shall have violated any article of the peace or security, and the injury shall have been shown to four of the aforesaid twenty-five barons, these four barons shall come to us, or to our justiciary if we are out of the kingdom, and making known to us the excess committed, require that we cause that excess to be redressed without delay; and if we shall not have redressed the excess, or, if we have been out of the kingdom, our justiciary shall not have redressed it within the term of forty days, computing from the time in which it shall have been made known to us, or to our justiciary if we have been out of the kingdom, the aforesaid four barons shall lay that cause before the residue of the twenty-five barons; and these twenty-five barons, with the community of the whole land, shall distress and harass us by all the ways in which they can, that is to say, by the taking of our castles, lands, and possessions, and by other means in their power, until the excess shall have been redressed, according to their verdict; saving our person, and the persons of our queen and children; and when it hath been redressed, they shall behave to us as they had done before; and whoever of our land pleaseth, may swear, that he will obey the commands of the aforesaid twenty-five barons, in accomplishing all the things aforesaid, and that with them he will harass us to the utmost of his power: and we publicly and freely give leave to every one to swear who is willing to swear; and we will never forbid any man to swear. But all those of our land, who, of themselves, and their own accord, are unwilling to swear to the twenty-five barons, to distress and harass us together with them, we will compel them by our command to swear as aforesaid. And if any one of the twenty-five barons shall die, or remove out of the land, or in any other way shall be prevented from executing the things above said, those who remain of the twenty-five barons shall elect another in his place, according to their pleasure, who shall be sworn in the same manner as the rest. But in all those things which are appointed to be done by these twenty-five barons, if it happen that all the twenty-five have been present, and have differed in their opinions about anything, or if some of them who had been summoned would not, or could not be present, that which the major part of those who were present shall have provided and decreed, shall be held as firm and valid, as if all the twenty-five had agreed in it. And the aforesaid twenty-five shall swear, that they will faithfully observe, and, to the utmost of their power, cause to be observed, all things mentioned above. And we will obtain nothing from any one, by ourselves, or by another, by which any of these concessions and liberties may be revoked or diminished. And if any such thing hath been obtained, let it be void and null; and we will never use it, either by ourselves or by another.—61. And we have fully remitted and pardoned to all men, all the ill-will, rancour, and resentments which have arisen between us and our subjects, both clergy and laity, from the commencement of the discord. Besides, we have fully remitted to all the clergy and laity, and as far as belongs to us, we have fully pardoned all transgressions committed on occasion of the said discord, from Easter, in the sixteenth year of our reign, to the conclusion of the peace. And, moreover, we have caused to be made to them testimonial letters patent of my Lord Stephen, archbishop of Canterbury, my Lord Henry, archbishop of Dublin, and of the aforesaid bishops, and of Master Pandulf, concerning this security, and the aforesaid concessions. Wherefore, our will is, and we firmly command, that the church of England be free, and that the men in our kingdom have and hold all the aforesaid liberties, rights, and concessions, well and in peace, freely and quietly, fully and entirely, to them and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever as aforesaid. An oath hath been taken, as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all these things mentioned above shall be observed in good faith, and without any evil intention, before the above-named witnesses, and many others. Given by our hand in the meadow, which is called Runingmed, between Windsor and Staines, this fifteenth day of June, in the seventeenth year of our reign.

SECTION III.

The History of Learning in Great Britain, from the landing of William Duke of Normandy, A.D. 1066, to the death of King John, A.D. 1216.

NATIONS are liable to various revolutions in the state of their minds and extent of their knowledge, as well as in their power and wealth, and other external circumstances. The same people, who, in one period, are grossly ignorant, and even regard all literary pursuits with supreme contempt, in another period become ingenious and inquisitive, and apply to the cultivation of the sciences with the greatest ardour. This is a revolution more to their honour than the greatest victories, and therefore certainly merits a place in history. We have seen the inhabitants of Britain involved in that profound darkness which covered the face of Europe, and almost of the whole world, for several ages after the fall of the western empire. We shall now see the day of science beginning to dawn upon them: faintly indeed at first, and liable now and then to be overcast, but never quite extinguished.

Of the period we are now considering it will be necessary to give only a brief account. 1. Of the several sciences that were cultivated—the improvements that were made in them—and the reasons of these improvements; 2. Of the most considerable men of learning who flourished; 3. Of the chief seminaries of learning that were founded, or improved, in the course of this period.

Though the ancient division of the sciences into the trivium and quadrivium, is frequently mentioned by the writers of the twelfth century, it does not seem to have been strictly adhered to in the schools. For there is sufficient evidence, that all the following parts of learning were cultivated, in some degree, in Britain, in this period, viz. grammar, rhetoric, logic, metaphysics, physics, ethics, scholastic divinity, the canon law, the civil law, the common law, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, astrology, and medicine. Of the state of all these branches of learning in Britain in the times we are now delineating, it is proper to take a short view.

Grammar, or the study of languages, was prosecuted by many persons with much ardour and no little success. The languages that were chiefly studied in England in this period, were the French and Latin, the former being the language of the court, and the latter that of the church. "William the Conqueror (says Ingulphus, who was his friend and secretary) had so great an abhorrence of the English language, that he commanded all the laws and law proceedings to be in French; and even the children at school were taught the first elements of grammar and letters in French, and not in English." All Englishmen therefore who wished to appear at court, to converse with the great, or to be fit for any office, were under a necessity of acquiring the French language. But the Latin language was studied with still greater keenness by all who were of any learned profession, or aspired to any reputation for learning; because it was not only the language of the liturgies of the church, but that in which all the sciences were taught, all books were composed, all accounts were kept, all letters of business or compliment were written, in which all scholars daily conversed, many of the clergy preached, not only before synods and councils, but even to the common people. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, in a letter to his nephew of the same name, writes to this purpose

"I command and charge you not to be idle, but to prosecute daily those studies for which I left you in England. In particular, study to know all the elegancies of grammar; accustom yourself to write something every day, especially in prose; and labour to acquire a plain and rational, rather than an intricate way of writing. Speak always in Latin, except in cases of absolute necessity." We have some reason to believe, that even the colloquial Latin of scholars in this period was tolerably pure and elegant. Giraldus Cambrensis mentions it as a very uncommon thing, that an old hermit, with whom he frequently conversed, did not speak Latin very correctly, but sometimes violated the rules of grammar. Some of the learned in this period had attained a very surprising facility in speaking and writing Latin. Peter of Blois, archdeacon of Bath, asserts, that the bishop of Bath, to whom he writes, the archbishop of Canterbury, and several others, had seen him dictate letters in Latin, to three different scribes, on different subjects, and write a letter in the same language himself, at the same time. It appears from the writings of several authors of the twelfth century, particularly of John of Salisbury and Peter of Blois, that they were intimately acquainted with the Latin classics, as they not only quote them very frequently, and with great propriety, but also imitate their style and manner with considerable success. These writers too recommend the study of grammar with the greatest warmth, and bestow upon it the highest praises. "Grammar, which is the science of speaking and writing well, is the first of all the liberal arts and sciences; the nurse, if I may so speak, of all philosophy, and of every literary study. She receives them at their birth, from the womb of nature, in a tender state, cherishes them in their infancy, with a mother's care, gradually improves their strength, attends and adorns them in every period of their progress. To philosophise successfully, without grammar, is as impossible as without both eyes and ears." In a word, whoever has perused the works of the divines, historians, and philosophers, who wrote in France and England in the twelfth century, will readily acknowledge the truth of the following declaration of one of the most learned writers of literary history: "Before we descend to particulars, we may affirm in general, that the latinity of no age, from the decline to the revival of learning, was so terse and elegant as that of the twelfth century."

The Greek and Hebrew languages were very far from being so much studied, or so well or so generally understood in Britain, in this period, as the Latin. But as many Jews resided and taught in England, their ancient language could not be unknown. Plain evidences of some acquaintance with it, as well as with the Greek, appear in the works of Peter of Blois, John of Salisbury, and several others. But by how many and in what degree the Hebrew and Greek languages were then understood in Britain, we are not well informed. We meet with only two Englishmen in this period who were famous for their knowledge of the Arabian language. These were Adelard of Bath, and Robert of Reading, who returned into England in the reign of Henry I., after they had spent several years in the East in learning that language, and translating books out of it into Latin.

From the study of grammar, or the art of speaking correctly, the youth of those times generally proceeded to the study of rhetoric, or the art of speaking eloquently. This part of learning was neglected, and even represented as unnecessary and useless, by some philosophers of this period, who spent their whole time, and employed all the powers of their minds, on the subtilties of Aristotelian logic, which was then the most admired and fashionable study. "Eloquence," said they, "is either given or denied by nature. If it is given, all pains about it are unnecessary; if it is denied, all pains to acquire it will be in vain." But the necessity and many advantages of the study of eloquence were most elegantly displayed both in prose and verse, by several writers of those times, particularly by John of Salisbury and Alan de Lisle. "The gifts of nature," says the former, "are necessary; but they are not sufficient to make a complete orator without art and study. There is no natural genius so strong, that negligence will not enfeeble; nor so sublime, that it will not depress. No man ever attained the reputation of being superlatively eloquent, even in one language, by the mere force of natural genius, without the help of art. For he is not to be esteemed eloquent who can speak with tolerable ease and fluency, and so as to be understood. He alone is eloquent, who can express the thoughts of his mind, and the feelings of his heart, with so much sweetness, power, and energy, as not only to convince and persuade, but to charm and transport his hearers with delight. How admirable an accomplishment is this! If wisdom and virtue merit the first place in our esteem, eloquence undoubtedly claims the second. How honourable is it to excel in the powers of reason and perfections of speech, which are the peculiar excellencies of human nature? How ornamental is eloquence in youth? how venerable in old age? how profitable in every stage of life? Who attain to fame and admiration, to riches, honours, and preferments, to the direction of all assemblies, and success in all undertakings, with so much ease and certainty as the eloquent."—Bulæus, in his history of the university of Paris, gives several examples of eloquence from the French and English writers of the twelfth century, some of which are truly excellent, and would do honour to any age; but they are too long to be here inserted.

From rhetoric the youth of this period proceeded to the study of logic, on which they employed much time and labour. Ingulphus acquaints us, that after he had made himself a perfect master of the first and second book of Tully's Rhetoric, he applied to the study of Aristotle's logic, and made greater proficiency in it than many of his contemporaries. This is a sufficient proof that the logic of Aristotle was studied by many of the English youth at the very beginning of this period, and even a little before. For Ingulphus had left Oxford, and settled in the court of William Duke of Normandy, several years before the conquest. The truth is, that from about the middle of the eleventh century, the philosophy, and particularly the logic of Aristotle, became so much in vogue, both in France and England, that it was studied with great ardour, not only by all men who made any pretensions to learning, but even by some ladies of the highest rank. The same Ingulphus tells us, that Edgitha, the amiable consort of Edward the Confessor, after she had examined him in Latin prose and verse, often proceeded to attack him with the subtilties of logic, in which she very much excelled; and when she had entangled him with her acute and artful arguments, and obtained the victory, she always dismissed him with a present of some pieces of money. It is well known, that the fair unfortunate Eloisa, so much beloved by the accomplished Peter Abelard, was one of the most acute logicians of the twelfth century. The fondness of the learned for the Aristotelian logic increased so much in the course of this century, that many persons spent their whole lives in the study of it, and it was esteemed the most necessary and excellent of all the sciences. But very unfortunately, this admired science, which had the discovery and establishment of truth for its professed object, soon degenerated into mere sophistry, and deserved no better name than that of the art of quibbling. "I wish (says John of Salisbury) to behold the light of truth, which these logicians say is only revealed to them. I approach them, I beseech them to instruct me, that, if possible, I may become as wise as one of them. They consent, they promise great things, and at first they command me to observe a Pythagorean silence, that I may be admitted into all the secrets of wisdom, which they pretend are in their possession. But by and by they permit, and even command, me to prattle and quibble with them. This they call disputing, this they say is logic; but I am no wiser." The truth seems to be, that many studious men, in this period, by spending too much time, and employing too intense thought, on logical subtilties, run into the two extremes, of speculating sometimes on things too high and difficult, and at other times on things too low and contemptible, for human investigation. That they run into the first of these extremes there is the clearest evidence, as we find among the subjects of their investigations and disputes,—of the substantial form of sounds,—of the essence of universals, &c. &c. That they sometimes fell into the latter extreme, is no less evident, from the many ridiculous trifling questions that were keenly agitated by them, of which the following one may serve for an example: when a hog is carried to market with a rope tied about its neck, which is held at the other end by a man, whether is the hog carried to market by the rope or by the man. This appears to us to be too ridiculous to be mentioned; but it appeared in a very serious light to the logicians of this period, who declared with great gravity, that it was one of those questions that could not be solved, the arguments on both sides were so perfectly equal. In a word, the far greatest part of the questions that were investigated by the logicians of those times, as John of Salisbury justly observes, "were of no use, in the church or the state, in the cloister or the court, in peace or war, at home or abroad, or any where but in the schools."

The metaphysics and natural philosophy of this period, though they were taught with much parade, and studied with much diligence, do not deserve the name of sciences, or merit the attention of posterity. They consisted of a prodigious number of abstract and subtle speculations, about entity and non-entity, spirit, primary matter, body, substance, accidents, substantial forms, occult qualities, solidity, extension, cohesion, rest, motion, time, place, number, magnitude, &c. which contributed nothing to the real knowledge of nature, or benefit of human life. Adelard of Bath, already mentioned for his skill in the Arabian language, published a dialogue, on the causes of things, between him and his nephew, who, he said, read lectures on that subject, rather perplexing than instructing his hearers. Philip de Tahn, about the same time, composed a work on the nature of beasts, for the instruction of Alicia, the second queen of Henry I., which gives a very unfavourable view of the state of natural philosophy, as it is wholly fanciful, and turns every thing into allegory. Henry II., who was a great patron of learning and learned men, sent Giraldus Cambrensis into Ireland, to examine the natural history of that country. His topography of Ireland (the writing of which, he says, was the labour of three years) was the consequence of this commission; and shows how ill qualified he was for the task in which he was engaged, by the great number of ridiculous incredible stories with which it abounds. To give one example of this, out of a hundred that might be given: "When St. Kewen (says he) was one day praying with both his hands held up to heaven, out of the window of his chamber, a swallow laid an egg in one of them; and such was the patience and good-nature of the saint, that he neither drew in nor shut his hand till the swallow had built her nest, laid all her eggs, and hatched her young. To preserve the remembrance of this fact, every statue of St. Kewen in Ireland hath a swallow in one of its hands."

The observations that have now been made on the metaphysics and natural philosophy, may be applied to the ethics or moral philosophy of this period. This science was esteemed an important part of a learned education, and as such it was taught and studied; but in so improper a manner that it contributed very little to enlighten the mind, to amend the heart, or to regulate the manners. Taking Aristotle for their guide in this, as well as in logics and physics, they disputed with much warmth and subtilty about liberty and necessity,—about the means, the ends, the acts of moral philosophy,—whether it was a practical or speculative science, &c. &c.; but took little pains to show the foundations of moral obligation, or to illustrate the nature, limits, and motives, of the various duties of men and citizens. This mode of philosophising was severely censured by John of Salisbury in many places. "They err (says he), they imprudently err, who think that virtue consists of words, as a wood of trees. No! good actions are the glory of virtue, and the inseparable companions of true philosophy. But those men who are fonder of the reputation than the reality of wisdom, are noisy and contentious; they run about the streets, they frequent the schools, they start a thousand frivolous and perplexing questions, and confound both themselves and others by a deluge of words."

That extravagant fondness for Aristotelian logic, which was the reigning taste of this period, and of some succeeding ages, infected all the sciences in some degree; but most of all, divinity. It was this that produced that species of theology which was so long admired, and is so well known by the name of school-divinity, and its teachers by the title of the school-men. When these divines composed commentaries on the Scriptures, it was not with a view to explain the real meaning of the words, or to illustrate the truths that they contained, but in order to extract certain mystical or allegorical senses out of them, and to found certain curious questions upon them for subjects of disputation. An incredible multitude of such commentaries were written in those times, which have been long ago consigned a prey to worms and dust. But the chief delight and business of the school-men was to write voluminous systems of divinity, consisting of a prodigious number of questions on all subjects, which they discussed with the greatest logical acuteness. Some of these questions were bold and impious, others trifling and curious, and not a few obscene. With their obscenities and impieties, which are truly horrid, these pages shall not be stained; and their frivolities are so ridiculous, that they are quite unworthy of a place in history. Their curiosity, though excessive, and far from being innocent, was neither so criminal as the former, nor so ridiculous as the latter, and therefore a few examples of it may be given. They canvassed, with great eagerness, the following questions, among a thousand others of the same kind:—Was Christ the same between his death and resurrection, that he was before his death and after his resurrection? Doth the glorified body of Christ stand or sit in heaven? Is the body of Christ that is eaten in the sacrament, dressed or undressed? Were the clothes in which Christ appeared to his disciples after his resurrection real or only apparent, &c. &c.

The bishops of Rome had long been engaged in the ambitious project of erecting a spiritual monarchy, superior to all others, even in worldly power. With this view they had assembled many councils, composed of prelates from all Christian countries, in which they had enacted many laws, commonly called canons, for the government of that monarchy. This obliged the bishops, and their officials, to make the canons of the church their study, in order to direct them when they acted as judges in their spiritual courts. But it was not till after the publication of the decretals of Gratian, about the middle of the twelfth century, that the canon law attained the rank of a science, and was taught and studied in the schools. It soon became the most fashionable study among the clergy, as it was found to pave their way to the highest honours and the richest benefices. Long before the end of this period, it was taught with great applause and profit at Oxford, Paris, Orleans, and many other places. But the subtilties of the Aristotelian logic gave a tincture to this as well as to the other sciences, which made John of Salisbury complain,—“That the laws themselves were become traps and snares, in which plain honest men, who were unacquainted with logical quirks and subtilties, were caught.” Peter of Blois speaks with still greater severity of some students and practitioners in the canon law—“It is the chief study of the ecclesiastical judges of our days, to multiply litigations, to invent delays, to invalidate contracts, to suppress truth, to encourage falsehood, to increase extortions, and, in a word, to confound all law and justice, by their quirks and subtilties.”

The study of the Roman or civil law, was introduced into England about the same time with that of the canon law. From the departure of the Romans, their laws were little known, and of no authority in this island, for more than seven hundred years. But the study of them having been revived at Bononia, Paris, and other seminaries of learning on the continent, about A.D. 1130, it soon after made its way into England. A copy of the Justinian code, as hath been already observed, was brought from Rome by some of the family of Archbishop Theobald, A.D. 1140; and a few years after, Roger Vacarius, prior of Beck in Normandy, opened a school at Oxford, in which he read lectures on the civil law to very crowded audiences. But King Stephen, A.D. 1149, imposed silence on Vacarius; who returned into Normandy, and was chosen abbot of Beck. A kind of persecution was raised against the professors and students of the civil law, by the common lawyers, and others, but John of Salisbury says, "That, by the blessing of God, the more the study of it was persecuted, the more it flourished." Henry II., who succeeded Stephen, being a much greater politician, was far from discouraging the study of the civil law; which, in conjunction with that of the canon law, prevailed very much in the universities, but still more in the cathedral schools. We learn from a very curious letter of Peter of Blois, that the most intricate and knotty questions in law and politics were sometimes referred to the teachers and students of the civil and canon law in the family of Archbishop Theobald, or archiepiscopal school of Canterbury: "In the house of my master, the archbishop of Canterbury, there are several very learned men, famous for their knowledge of law and politics, who spend the time between prayers and dinner in lecturing, disputing, and debating causes. To us all the knotty questions of the kingdom are referred, which are produced in the common hall, and every one in his order, having first prepared himself, declares, with all the eloquence and acuteness of which he is capable, but without wrangling, what is wisest and safest to be done. If God suggests the soundest opinion to the youngest amongst us, we all agree to it without envy or detraction."

Though the common law of England was not yet taught in the schools as a science, it was studied with great diligence as a profession; and many persons, by their skill in it, acquired both fame and wealth, and obtained the highest offices in the state. The greatest number of these professional lawyers were clergymen, though some of the laity, as, particularly, Aubury de Vere, who flourished in the reign of King Stephen, and Ranulph de Glanville, who was chief justiciary to Henry II. and Richard I., are much celebrated for their knowledge of the common law. The last of these sages composed a kind of system of the common law, with this title, De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliæ. But it was not till some time after the conclusion of this period that the law-college of London, commonly called the Inns of Court, was established; which contributed very much to the improvement of this useful and lucrative branch of learning.

As the subtilties of Aristotelian logic could not be applied with success to numerical calculations or mathematical demonstrations, these sciences do not seem to have been much studied, or improved, in this period; and therefore a few short observations on the state of them will be sufficient.

Nothing ever contributed so much to facilitate arithmetical operations, as the invention of the Arabian figures for representing numbers. But whether these figures were known and used in Britain in this period, is a little doubtful. From the revenue-tolls of Henry II., Richard I., and King John, it appears that they were not then used in the Exchequer; for all the sums in these rolls are marked in Roman letters. But the learned Dr. Wallis has produced several authorities, which make it very probable, that the Arabian arithmetic, called algorism, performed by the Arabian figures, was known to some learned men in England in the twelfth century; and indeed it is hardly possible that Adelard of Bath, Robert of Reading, and several others, who travelled into Spain, Egypt, and other countries, in the course of that century, to make themselves masters of the Arabian language and learning, could have returned without some knowledge of these figures.

Though the Elements of Euclid, and several other treatises on geometry, were translated out of the Greek and Arabian languages into Latin in this period, we have the clearest evidence that this most useful science was very little studied. "The science of demonstration (says John of Salisbury) is of all others the most difficult; and, alas! is almost quite neglected, except by a very few who apply to the study of the mathematics, and particularly of geometry. But this last is at present very little attended to amongst us, and is only studied by some people in Spain, Egypt, and Arabia, for the sake of astronomy. One reason of this is, that those parts of the works of Aristotle that relate to the demonstrative sciences, are so ill translated, and so incorrectly transcribed, that we meet with insurmountable difficulties in every chapter." After so decisive a testimony of one who was so well acquainted with the state of learning in the age in which he flourished, it is in vain to look for any great improvements in geometry in this period.

When geometry was so much neglected, astronomy could not be successfully cultivated. There is, however, sufficient evidence, that a considerable degree of attention was paid to the motions, situations, and aspects, of the heavenly bodies; though it is probable that this was done rather with a view to astrological predictions, than to discover the true system of the universe. Several treatises on astronomy were translated out of the Greek and Arabian languages into Latin, particularly the planisphere of Ptolemy by Ralf of Bruges, and a treatise on the astrolabe by Adelard of Bath. The astrolabe, which seems to have been much the same with the armillary sphere of the moderns, was used in taking observations of the sun and stars. Ingulphus laments the loss of an astronomical table, more than of anything else, that was destroyed when his abbey of Croyland was burnt, A.D. 1091. He calls it a Nadir, and describes it in this manner: "We then lost a most beautiful and precious table, fabricated of different kinds of metals, according to the variety of the stars and heavenly signs. Saturn was of copper, Jupiter of gold, Mars of iron, the Sun of latten, Mercury of amber, Venus of tin, the Moon of silver. The eyes were charmed, as well as the mind instructed, by beholding the colures circles, with the zodiac and all its signs, formed with wonderful art, of metals and precious stones, according to their several natures, forms, figures, and colours. It was the most admired and celebrated Nadir in all England." From the above description of this curious table, it appears to have been a delineation of the Ptolemæan system, the centre of it representing the earth, and the planets placed around it exactly in the order of that system.

None of the mathematical sciences were cultivated with so much diligence, in this period, as the fallacious one of judicial astrology. None indeed were honoured with the name of mathematicians but astrologers, who were believed by many to possess the precious secret of reading the fates of kingdoms, the events of war, and the fortunes of particular persons, in the face of the heavens. "Mathematicians (says Peter of Blois) are those who, from the position of the stars, the aspect of the firmament, and the motions of the planets, discover things that are to come." These pretended prognosticators were so much admired and credited, that there was hardly a prince, or even an earl or great baron in Europe, who did not keep one or more of them in his family, to cast the horoscopes of his children, discover the success of his designs, and the public events, that were to happen. The most famous of these astrologers published a kind of almanack every year, containing schemes of the planets for that year, with a variety of predictions concerning the weather, and other events. We have the following quotation from one of these almanacks, in a letter of John of Salisbury: "The astrologers call this year (1170) the wonderful year, from the singular situation of the planets and constellations, and say—that in the course of it the councils of kings will be changed, wars will be frequent, and the world will be troubled with seditions: that learned men will be discouraged; but towards the end of the year they will be exalted." From this specimen we may perceive, that their predictions were couched in very general and artful terms. But by departing from this prudent conduct not long after this, and becoming a little too plain and positive, they brought a temporary disgrace on themselves and their art. For, in the beginning of the year 1186, all the great astrologers in the Christian world agreed in declaring, that, from an extraordinary conjunction of the planets in the sign Libra, which had never happened before, and would never happen again, there would arise, on Tuesday, September 16th, at three o'clock in the morning, a most dreadful storm, that would sweep away not only single houses, but even great towns and cities;—that this storm would be followed by a destructive pestilence, bloody wars, and all the plagues that had ever afflicted miserable mortals. This direful prediction spread terror and consternation over Europe, though it was flatly contradicted by the Mahometan astrologers of Spain, who said, there would only be a few shipwrecks, and a little failure in the vintage and harvest. When the awful day drew near, Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, commanded a solemn fast of three days to be observed over all his province. But to the utter confusion of the poor astrologers, the 16th of September was uncommonly serene and calm, the whole season remarkably mild and healthy; and there were no storms all that year (says Gervase of Canterbury), but what the archbishop raised in the church by his own turbulence. In the midst of the general wreck of astrological reputation, William, astrologer to the constable of Chester, saved his character, by subjoining to his prediction this alternative,—"If the nobles of the land will serve God, and fly from the devil, the Lord will avert all these impending plagues." But though astrology was in itself deceitful, and sometimes involved its professors in disgrace, it contributed greatly to promote the study of astronomy; and there is the clearest evidence, that the astrologers of this period could calculate eclipses, could find the situation of the planets, and knew the times in which they performed their revolutions, &c.

Medicine had been practised as an art in Britain in the darkest ages. In this period it began to be studied as a science. The medical schools of Salernum, in the kingdom of Naples, and of Montpellier in France, were famous in those times, and frequented by many persons from all parts of Europe. This science was also taught and studied in the universities of Paris and Oxford. But the following description of the theoretical and practical physicians of the twelfth century, given by one of the most learned and ingenious men who flourished in that age, will present us with a more satisfactory view of the state of medicine in this period, than anything that can be said by any modern writer. "The professors of the theory of medicine are very communicative; they will tell you all they know, and perhaps, out of their great kindness, a little more. From them you may learn the nature of all things, the causes of sickness and of health, how to banish the one and to preserve the other; for they can do both at pleasure. They will describe to you minutely the origin, the beginning, the progress and the cure of all diseases. In a word, when I hear them harangue, I am charmed, I think them not inferior to Mercury or Esculapius, and almost persuade myself that they can raise the dead. There is only one thing that makes me hesitate. Their theories are as directly opposite to one another as light and darkness. When I reflect on this I am a little staggered. Two contradictory propositions cannot both be true. But what shall I say of the practical physicians? I must say nothing amiss of them. It pleaseth God, for the punishment of my sins, to suffer me to fall too frequently into their hands. They must be soothed, and not exasperated. That I may not be treated roughly in my next illness, I dare hardly allow myself to think in secret what others speak aloud." In another work this writer picks up more courage, and speaks his mind of the practical physicians with equal freedom. "They soon return from college, full of flimsy theories, to practise what they have learned. Galen and Hippocrates are continually in their mouths. They speak aphorisms on every subject, and make their hearers stare at their long, unknown, and high-sounding words. The good people believe that they can do anything, because they pretend to all things. They have only two maxims which they never violate; never mind the poor—never refuse money from the rich."

The clergy were almost the only persons in this period who taught and practised physic, as well as the other sciences; and we meet with very few celebrated for their medical knowledge who were not priests or monks. This profession became so lucrative, and so many monks applied to the study and practice of it, deserting their monasteries, and neglecting their own profession, that a canon was made in the council of Tours, A.D. 1163, prohibiting monks to stay out of their monasteries above two months at one time, teaching or practising physic. No restraint of this kind was laid on the secular clergy, and many of the bishops and other dignitaries of the church acted as physicians in ordinary to kings and princes, by which they acquired both riches and honour. These very reverend physicians drew much of their medical knowledge from the writings of Rhazds, Avicenna, Avenzoar, Averhois, and other Arabians, whose works had been translated into Latin by Constantine, a monk of Mount Casine, near Salernum, and others.

It is not improbable that the scientific way of teaching and studying physic, which was introduced by the medical schools of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, gave rise to the distinction between physicians and surgeons, which appears to have taken place towards the end of this period. For a contemporary poet, in describing the attempts that were made to cure the wound which Richard I. received before the castle of Chalus, A.D. 1199, plainly distinguishes these two professions, and the different parts they acted on that occasion. There is even sufficient evidence, that some persons about the same time applied more particularly to the study of the materia medica, and the composition of medicines, and were on that account called apothecaries. We are told in the annals of the church of Winchester, that Richard Fitz-Nigel, who died bishop of London A.D. 1198, had been apothecary to Henry II. Whoever will give himself the trouble to peruse the prescriptions of the Salernian school, which were written in the eleventh century for the use of a king of England, will perceive, that the materia medica of those times was far from being scanty, and that they were acquainted with some very complicated and artificial mixtures, particularly theriac, which consists of above fifty ingredients.

It seems to be impossible to give any satisfactory account of the state of experimental philosophy, anatomy, chemistry, botany, and some other parts of learning, from the genuine monuments of this period; which plainly indicates that these sciences were then either totally neglected, or very little cultivated.

By comparing the above delineation of the state of learning, with that which was given of it in the former period, we cannot but observe, that the circle of the sciences was now considerably enlarged, and that some of them were cultivated with greater diligence and success. This is agreeable to the testimony of the best contemporary historians. "Before the arrival of the Normans (says William of Malmesbury), learning was almost extinct in England. The clergy contented themselves with the slightest smattering of letters, and could hardly stammer through the offices of the church. If any one amongst them understood a little grammar, he was admired as a prodigy." But so sudden and advantageous a change in this respect took place after the conquest, that the same sensible writer acquaints us, that learning was in a more flourishing state in England and Normandy, so early as the reign of Henry I., than it was in Italy. This happy change seems to have been owing to the following causes:—

to the throne of England, contributed in several ways to the revival of learning in Britain. That prince had received a good education, was fond of reading and the conversation of learned men, to whom he was a most munificent patron, advancing them to the highest dignities and richest benefices in the church. This had excited an extraordinary ardour for literary pursuit among the clergy in Normandy, and had afterwards the same effect in England. Beside this, many of the most learned men on the continent came over into Britain, after the conquest, and by their example and instructions diffused the love and knowledge of letters. William took great care of the education of his royal offspring, and Henry I., his youngest son, became the most learned prince, and the greatest promoter of learning, of the age in which he flourished. This procured him the surname of Beauclerk, or the fine scholar. He married his only daughter, the heiress of all his dominions, to Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, who is greatly celebrated for his learning. The eldest son of this marriage, Henry II., received a learned education, under the direction of his excellent uncle, Robert, earl of Gloucester, who was more illustrious for his knowledge and virtue than his royal birth. Henry II. never lost that taste for letters he had acquired in his youth; and through his whole life, as we are assured by one who was intimately acquainted with him, he spent his leisure hours, either in reading, or in discussing some literary question in a circle of learned men. His three sons, Henry, Geoffrey, and Richard, had all a considerable tincture of letters, and a taste for poetry. Under the patronage of these great princes, learning could hardly fail to revive, and in some degree to flourish.

The erection of above one hundred monasteries in England, in the course of this period, may be reckoned among the causes of the revival of learning,—by increasing the number both of teachers and students,—by multiplying the inducements to pursue and the opportunities to acquire knowledge,—but chiefly by making books much more common and attainable than they had been in any former period. It will by-and-by appear that every convent was a kind of college in which several parts of learning were taught and studied. The government of these religious houses was commonly bestowed on men of learning; and being attended with considerable degrees of power and dignity, afforded strong incentives to study. A library was then esteemed so essential to a monastery, that it became a proverb, "A convent without a library, is like a castle without an armory." Some of these monastic libraries were very valuable. Though the abbey of Croyland was burnt only twenty-five years after the conquest, its library then consisted of nine hundred volumes, of which three hundred were very large. To provide books for the use of the church, and for furnishing their libraries, there was in every monastery a room called the Scriptorium, or writing-chamber, in which several of the younger monks were constantly employed in transcribing books; and to which, in some monasteries, considerable revenues were appropriated. A noble Norman, who was a great encourager of learning, left his own library to that of the abbey of St. Albans, A.D. 1086, and granted two-thirds of the tithes of Hatfield, and certain tithes in Redburn, to support the writers in the scriptorium of that abbey. Where there were no fixed revenues for defraying the expenses of procuring books for the library, the abbot, with the consent of the chapter, commonly imposed an annual tax on every member of the community for that purpose. The monks of some monasteries, in this period, were bitterly reproached for the extravagant sums they expended on their libraries.

The art of making paper, which was invented in the course of this period, contributed also to the revival of, and more general application to, learning, by rendering the acquisition of books much less difficult and expensive than it had formerly been. We have not the satisfaction of knowing to whom we are indebted for that most useful invention. But it appears that our paper was at first made of cotton; and, on that account, called charta bombycina, or cotton paper; and that towards the end of the eleventh or beginning of the twelfth century, it began to be made of linen rags, as it is at present.

Though the learned authors of the literary history of France are of opinion that the Crusades proved an impediment to the progress of learning, I am more inclined to think, with the judicious and elegant historian of Charles V., that they had a contrary effect. That the sciences, as well as the arts, were in a more flourishing state in the Greek empire, and the east, than in those countries which had composed the western empire, is acknowledged on all hands. It seems therefore highly probable, that some of those ingenious and inquisitive men, of which the number was not small, who accompanied the Crusaders in their expeditions into the East, acquired some sciences which they could not have acquired in their own countries, and that they communicated their acquisitions to their countrymen on their return home.

History of the most Learned Men who flourished in Britain from A.D. 1066 to A.D. 1216.

Though the circle of the sciences was enlarged, and learning was cultivated with greater assiduity in this than in the former period; yet this was chiefly, or rather almost only, by the clergy. The great body of the people, and even the far greatest part of the nobility, still continued illiterate, or had but a very slight acquaintance with letters. Of this, if it were necessary, many proofs might be produced; but the following one, it is presumed, will be sufficient. After the flight of Archbishop Becket out of England, A.D. 1164, Henry II. sent a most splendid embassy to the pope, consisting of one archbishop, four bishops, three of his own chaplains, the earl of Arundel, and other three of the greatest barons of the kingdom. When these ambassadors were admitted to an audience, and four of the prelates had harangued the pope and cardinals in Latin, the earl of Arundel stood up, and made a speech in English, which he began in this manner: "We who are illiterate laymen do not understand one word of what the bishops have said to your Holiness." We may be almost certain, that if Henry, who was a learned prince, could have found men of learning amongst his nobility, he would have sent them on this embassy. The truth is, that the general ignorance of the laity of all ranks was so well known, that the historians of this period frequently distinguish the clergy from the laity, by calling the former literati, and the latter laici.

Our readers therefore need not be surprised to find, that all the learned men mentioned of this age belonged either to the secular or regular clergy.

The laws of general history, and the limits of this work, will admit only of a very brief account of a few who were most eminent for their learning in every period.

Ingulph, abbot of Croyland, and author of the history of that abbey, was born in London about A.D. 1030. He received the first part of his education at Westminster; and when he visited his father, who belonged to the court of Edward the Confessor, he was so fortunate as to engage the attention of Queen Edgitha. That amiable and learned princess took a pleasure in examining our young scholar on his progress in grammar, and in disputing with him in logic; nor did she ever dismiss him without some present as a mark of her approbation. From Westminster he went to Oxford, where he applied to the study of rhetoric and of the Aristotelian philosophy, in which he made a greater proficiency than many of his contemporaries. When he was about twenty-one years of age, he was introduced to William, duke of Normandy (who visited the court of England A.D. 1051), and made himself so agreeable to that prince, that he appointed him his secretary, and carried him with him into his own dominions. In a little time he became the prime favourite of his prince, and the dispenser of all preferments, humbling some and exalting others at his pleasure; in which difficult station, he confessed he did not behave with a proper degree of modesty and prudence. This excited the envy and hatred of many of the courtiers: to avoid the effects of which, he obtained leave from the duke to go in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, which was then become fashionable. With a company of thirty horsemen, he joined Sigfrid, duke of Mentz, who, with many German nobles, bishops, clergy, and others, was preparing for a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. When they were all united, they formed a company of no fewer than seven thousand pilgrims. In their way they spent some time at Constantinople, performing their devotions in the several churches. In their passage through Lycia, they were attacked by a tribe of Arabs, who killed and wounded many of them, and plundered them of a prodigious mass of money. Those who escaped from this disaster, at length reached Jerusalem, visited all the holy places, and bedewed the ruins of many churches with their tears, giving money for their reparation. They intended to have bathed in Jordan, but being prevented by the roving Arabs, they embarked on board a Genoese fleet at Joppa, and landed at Brundisium, from whence they travelled through Apulia to Rome. Having gone through a long course of devotions in this city, at the several places distinguished for their sanctity, they separated, and every one made the best of his way into his own country. When Ingulph and his company reached Normandy, they were reduced to twenty half-starved wretches, without money, clothes, or horses; a faithful picture of the foolish disastrous journeys into the Holy Land, so common in those times. Ingulph was now so much disgusted with the world, that he resolved to forsake it, and become a monk in the abbey of Fontenelle in Normandy; in which, after some years, he was advanced to the office of prior. When his old master was preparing for his expedition into England, A.D. 1066, he was sent by his abbot with one hundred marks in money, and twelve young men, nobly mounted and completely armed, as a present from their abbey. Ingulph having found a favourable opportunity, presented his men and money to his prince, who received him very graciously; some part of the former affection for him reviving in his bosom. In consequence of this he raised him to the government of the rich abbey of Croyland in Lincolnshire, A.D. 1076, in which he spent the last thirty-four years of his life, governing that society with great prudence, and protecting their possessions from the rapacity of the neighbouring barons by the favour of his royal master. The lovers of English history and antiquities are much indebted to this learned abbot for his excellent history of the abbey of Croyland, from its foundation, A.D. 664, to A.D. 1091, into which he has introduced much of the general history of the kingdom, with a variety of curious anecdotes that are nowhere else to be found. Ingulph died of the gout, at his abbey, 1st December, A.D. 1109, in the seventy-ninth year of his age.

Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Pavia, A.D. 1005, where he was educated in grammar and logic. After the death of his father, he spent some years in the study of rhetoric and civil law, at Bologna; from whence he returned to his native city, and commenced an advocate in the courts of law. Thinking this too narrow a sphere, he removed into France, and opened a school at Avranches, which was soon crowded with students of high rank. In a journey to Rouen, he had the misfortune to be robbed, and left bound in a wood, where he was found next morning by some peasants, who carried him, almost dead, to the abbey of Bec. Here he was treated with so much tenderness that when he recovered, he became a monk in that abbey, A.D. 1041. At the end of three years he was chosen prior of his convent, and opened a school, which in a little time became very famous, and was frequented by students from all parts of Europe. Amongst others, some of the scholars of Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, and master of the academy of Tours, left that school, and went to study at the abbey of Bec. This, it is said, excited the envy of Berenger, and gave rise to that long and violent controversy between him and Lanfranc, on the subject of the eucharist, which made a mighty noise in the church. When our author resided in the abbey of Bec, his literary fame procured him the favour of his sovereign, William duke of Normandy, who made him one of his counsellors, employed him in an important embassy to the pope, and appointed him, A.D. 1062, abbot of his newly-erected monastery of St. Stephen's, at Caen. Here he established a new academy, which became no less famous than his former one at Bec. When the see of Canterbury became vacant by the deposition of Stigand, the Conqueror procured his election to that see, August 15th, A.D. 1070, and with some difficulty prevailed upon him to accept of that high station. He proved a great benefactor to the church of Canterbury, by asserting its right to the primacy of England,—by recovering many of its possessions,—and by rebuilding the cathedral. He enjoyed a high degree of the favour of William I., and had the chief direction of all affairs, both in church and state, under William II., to the time of his death, which happened May 28th A.D.

1089, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. Several of our ancient historians who were almost his contemporaries, speak in very advantageous terms of the genius and erudition of Lanfranc; and some of them who were personally acquainted with him, represent him as the most learned man in the age in which he flourished. His writings consist of commentaries on St. Paul's epistles, sermons on various subjects, letters, and his famous treatise on the eucharist against Berenger, in which he employed all his abilities in support of that opinion which had been broached by Paschasius Radbertus, in the gloom of the ninth century, had been gradually gaining ground among the clergy through the tenth and eleventh, and terminated in transubstantiation towards the end of the twelfth. This treatise had rendered Lanfranc a prodigious favourite with the literary historians of the church of Rome, who load him with the most extravagant and lavish praises.

Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, the disciple and successor of Lanfranc, was born at Aoust, in Piedmont, A.D. 1034, of noble and pious parents, who were at great pains to give him a good education. Having lost his mother Ermengarda, when he was about seventeen years of age, he abandoned his studies, and indulged his youthful passions to such a degree, that his father refused to see him, or admit him into his house: on which he left his native country and travelled into France. After some time, attracted by the fame of Lanfranc, he settled at the abbey of Bec, and prosecuted his studies with so much ardour under that great master, that he excelled all his fellow-students in learning. Having become a monk in that abbey, A.D. 1060, he was chosen, three years after, to succeed Lanfranc, both as prior, and teacher of the sciences; in both which stations he acquitted himself so much to the satisfaction of the society, that he was unanimously elected abbot, on the first vacancy, A.D. 1078. The abbey of Bec had several estates in England, which obliged our abbot sometimes to visit this kingdom; and in these visits he gained the friendship of some of the greatest men. He happened to be here A.D. 1093, when William II. in a fit of sickness, was prevailed upon to fill the see of Canterbury, which he had kept four years vacant, and nominated him to that high office. After a long and obstinate opposition to his own advancement, in which some persons suspected his sincerity, he was consecrated December 4th, A.D. 1093. The quarrels of this prelate with William II., and afterwards with Henry I. about investitures, have been already mentioned. These obliged him to spend much of his time on the continent, and rendered his pontificate uncomfortable to himself and hurtful to the kingdom. After a tedious indisposition, he expired at Canterbury, April 21st, A.D. 1109, in the seventy-sixth year of his age. Anselm was one of the most voluminous writers of the age in which he flourished. He excelled chiefly in logic and metaphysics, and the application of them to theological subjects; which made him to be considered as one of the fathers of scholastic divinity.

Eadmerus, the faithful friend and historian of Archbishop Anselm, was an Englishman; but his parents, and the particular time and place of his nativity, are not known. He received a learned education, and very early discovered a taste for history, by recording every remarkable event that came to his knowledge. Being a monk in the cathedral of Canterbury, he had the happiness to become the bosom-friend and inseparable companion of two archbishops of that see, St. Anselm, and his successor Ralph. To the former of these he was appointed spiritual director, by the Pope; and that prelate would do nothing without his permission. His election to the see of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, and its consequences are matter of history. But Eadmerus is most worthy of the grateful remembrance of posterity for his historical work, particularly for his excellent history of the affairs of England in his own time, from A.D. 1066 to A.D. 1122; in which he has inserted many original papers, and preserved many important facts that are nowhere else to be found. This work has been highly commended, both by ancient and modern writers, for its authenticity, as well as for regularity of composition and purity of style. It is indeed more free from legendary tales, than any other work of this period; and it is impossible to peruse it with attention, without conceiving a favourable opinion of the learning, good sense, sincerity, and candour, of its author.

Turgot, a contemporary of Eadmerus, was an Anglo-Saxon, of a good family in Lincolnshire, and received a learned education. When he was a young man, he was delivered by the people of Lindsay, as one of their hostages, to William the Conqueror, and confined in the castle of Lincoln. From thence he made his escape into Norway, and resided several years in the court of King Olave, by whom he was much caressed and enriched. Returning to his native country, he was shipwrecked on the coast of Northumberland, by which he lost all his money and effects, escaping death with great difficulty. He travelled to Durham; and applying to Walter, bishop of that see, declared his resolution to forsake the world, and become a monk; in which he was encouraged by that pious prelate, who committed him to the care of Aldwine, the first prior of Durham. Being admitted into that priory, he recommended himself so much to the whole society, by his learning, piety, prudence, and other virtues, that, on the death of Aldwine, A.D. 1087, he was unanimously chosen prior, and not long after was appointed by the bishop archdeacon of his diocese. In the faithful discharge of the duties of these two offices, he spent the succeeding twenty years of his life, sometimes residing in the priory, and at other times visiting the diocese, and preaching at different places. Some of his leisure hours he employed in collecting and writing the history of the church of Durham or Northumberland, from A.D. 635 to A.D. 1096, in four books. But not having published this work, or made any transcripts of it, according to the custom of those times, it fell into the hands of Smeon, precentor of the church of Durham, who published it under his own name, expunging only a few passages that would have discovered its real author. This curious fact is demonstrated by the learned Mr. Selden, in his preface to the ten ancient historians, published by Sir Roger Twysden; and shows that literary fame was even then an object of ambition. Turgot was promoted to the see of St. Andrew's, in Scotland, A.D. 1107, and died at Durham, A.D. 1115. This learned divine composed several other works, particularly the lives of Malcolm Canmore, king of Scotland, and of his pious consort Queen Margaret, from which John Fordun has quoted several facts.

Robert White (in Latin, Robertus Pullus) was born in England toward the end of the eleventh century; and having received a learned education in his own country, he went, as was usual in those times, to the university of Paris for his further improvement. Here he continued several years, and acquired a shining reputation by his learned lectures in philosophy and theology, which were attended by crowded audiences. He was invited by Asceline, bishop of Rochester, A.D. 1136, to return into his own country, where his labours were much wanted for the revival of learning; and no less earnestly pressed by the famous St. Bernard to continue at Paris, where he did so much good. But he complied with the invitation of the bishop, who had appointed him as archdeacon; and read lectures on the Scriptures at Oxford five years, which attracted prodigious numbers of students to that university. Being of a studious unambitious disposition, he declined a bishopric that was offered him by Henry I. At length he became so famous, that he was called to Rome, A.D. 1143, by Celestine II., appointed a cardinal by Lucius II., and made chancellor of the holy see by Eugenius III.; and was esteemed the most learned of all the college of cardinals. He is believed to have died about A.D. 1150. He composed many theological works; but none of them have been printed, except his book of Sentences, which is a body of scholastic divinity, written in a better style, and with greater perspicuity, than was common in those times.

Nicolas Breakspear, the only Englishman who ever sat in St. Peter's chair, was born near St. Alban's, and in his youth performed the meanest menial offices about the abbey of that place, in which his father was a monk. Being rejected, for want of learning, by the abbot, when he desired to become a monk, and reproached by his father for his indolence, he left England, and went to Paris, where he applied to study with the greatest ardour. From Paris he travelled into Provence, and was admitted a monk in the abbey of St. Rufus, where he still continued to prosecute his studies, and recommended himself so effectually, that, on the first vacancy, he was chosen abbot. The monks, however, soon became weary of the government of a foreigner, and made bitter complaints against their new abbot to Pope Eugenius III. This proved a very fortunate event to our countryman. For the pope was so much pleased with the learning and eloquence he displayed in his own defence, that he thought him worthy of a higher station in the church, made him bishop of Alba, A.D. 1146, and a cardinal. Not long after he was sent as papal legate into Denmark and Norway; and acquitted himself so well in that station, that a vacancy happening in the papal throne about the time of his return to Rome, he was unanimously chosen pope, in November 1154, and took the name of Adrian IV. Henry II., pleased with the elevation of one who had been his subject, sent three bishops and the abbot of St. Alban's to congratulate the new pope on his election. The ambassadors met with a most gracious reception, and obtained from his holiness every favour the king of England desired, particularly a grant of the kingdom of Ireland, in which grant the high pretension to the property of all the islands in the sea was advanced: a proof that, though Adrian's origin was low, his spirit and his claims were as high as any of his predecessors. But this pontiff soon found the vanity of ambition even when it is most successful; for his pontificate, which lasted only four years and ten months, was one continued scene of disquiet and trouble; and, if we may believe some writers, his death was violent, A.D. 1159. Though Adrian was a man of genius and learning, none of his works have been published, except his letters.

England produced a great number of historians in the twelfth century, and it may not be improper to give a brief account of the most considerable of them, without interruption, though it should make us depart a little from the exact order of time.

William of Malmesbury, who is well entitled to stand at the head of our historians of the twelfth century, was born in Somersetshire, and, on that account, is sometimes called William Somerset. When he was but a child (as he himself acquaints us), he discovered a fondness for learning, which was encouraged by his parents, and increased with his years. "I applied," says he, "to the study of several sciences, but not with equal diligence. I went through a course of logic, but prosecuted it no further; with physic, or the art of curing diseases and preserving health, I was at more pains; for ethics, which lead to a good and happy life, I had still a higher veneration; but history, which is equally pleasant and profitable, was my favourite study. Having, at my own expense, procured the copies of some foreign histories, I then, at my leisure, began to inquire into the memorable transactions of my own country; and not finding any satisfactory history of them already written, I resolved to write one, not to display my learning, which is no great matter, but to bring things to light that are covered with the rubbish of antiquity." This design he executed with great ability and diligence, by writing a general history of England in five books, from the arrival of the Saxons, A.D. 449, to the 26th of Henry I., A.D. 1126; and a modern history in two books, from that year to the escape of the empress Maud out of Oxford, A.D. 1143; with a church history of England in four books. In all these historical works (which are written in a Latin style more pure than that of any of his contemporaries), he discovers great diligence, much good sense, and a sacred regard to truth, accompanied with uncommon modesty. "I do not," says he, "set a high value on the applause of my contemporaries, which I hardly expect; but I hope, that when both favour and malevolence are dead, I shall obtain from posterity the character of an industrious, though not of an eloquent historian." This excellent person, to whom all the lovers of English history are so much indebted, spent his life in the humble station of a monk and library-keeper in the abbey of Malmesbury, where he died, A.D. 1143.

Simeon of Durham, the contemporary of William of Malmesbury, merits a place among the historians and antiquaries of this period, for the great pains he took in collecting the monuments of our history, especially in the north of England, after they had been scattered by the Danes in their devastations of that country. From these he composed a history of the kings of England, from A.D. 616 to A.D. 1130, with some smaller historical pieces. Simeon both studied and taught the sciences, and particularly the mathematics, at Oxford, and became precentor of the church of Durham, where he died, probably soon after the conclusion of his history, which was continued by John, prior of Hexham, to A.D. 1156. Richard, who succeeded John in the government of the priory of Hexham, wrote the history of the bishops of that church, and of four years of the reign of King Stephen, from A.D. 1135 to A.D. 1139.

Ailred, abbot of Revesby in Lincolnshire, was born of noble parents, and educated in the court of David, king of Scots, with his son Prince Henry, who was one of the most studious as well as one of the bravest princes of his age. After the death of Henry, Ailred retired into the abbey of Revesby; and became so famous for his piety and learning, that he might have attained to the highest dignities of the church, if he had not modestly declined them, and contented himself with the government of his own abbey, where he died A.D. 1166. He left behind him many monuments of his piety and learning, besides his historical works, for which he is introduced in this place. Several of his theological treatises are printed among the works of his friend St. Bernard, and his historical pieces in the collection of the ten ancient historians published by Sir Roger Twysden, London, A.D. 1652.

Henry of Huntingdon was the son of one Nicolas, a married priest, and was born about the beginning of the twelfth century, or end of the eleventh. For he acquaints us, that he was made an archdeacon by Robert Bloet, bishop of Lincoln, who died A.D. 1123. He was educated by Albinus of Anjou, a learned canon of the church of Lincoln, and in his youth discovered a great taste for poetry, by writing eight books of epigrams, as many of love-verses, with three long didactic poems, one of herbs, another of spices, and a third of precious stones. In his more advanced years he applied to the study of history; and at the request of Alexander, bishop of Lincoln, who was his great friend and patron, he composed a general history of England, from the earliest accounts to the death of King Stephen, A.D. 1154, in eight books. In the dedication of this work to Bishop Alexander, he tells us, that in the ancient part of his history he had followed venerable Bede, adding a few things from some other writers; that he had compiled the sequel from several chronicles he had found in different libraries, and from what he had heard and seen. Towards the conclusion of this work, he very honestly acknowledges, that it was only an abridgment; and that to compose a complete history of England, many more books were necessary than he could procure. Mr. Wharton has published a long letter of this author to his friend Walter, abbot of Ramsey, on the contempt of the world, which contains many curious anecdotes of the kings, nobles, prelates, and other great men, who were his contemporaries.

Roger de Hoveden was born in Yorkshire, most probably at the town of that name, now called Howden, some time in the reign of Henry I. After he had received the first parts of education in his native county, he studied the civil and canon law, which were then become the most fashionable and lucrative branches of learning. He became domestic chaplain to Henry II., who employed him to transact several ecclesiastical affairs: in which he acquitted himself with honour. But his most meritorious work was, his Annals of England, from A.D. 731, when Bede's ecclesiastical history ends, to A.D. 1202. This work, which is one of the most voluminous of our ancient histories, is more valuable for the sincerity with which it is written and the great variety of facts which it contains, than for the beauty of its style, or the regularity of its arrangement.

William Little, who is better known by his Latin name Gulielmus Neubrigensis, was born at Bridlington in Yorkshire, A.D. 1136, and educated in the abbey of Newborough in the same county, where he became a monk. In his advanced years he composed a history of England in five books, from the Norman conquest, to A.D. 1197, which, for veracity, regularity of disposition, and purity of language, is one of the most valuable productions of this period. In his preface to this work, he made some very severe strictures on Geoffrey of Monmouth's British history, which have drawn upon him the displeasure of several ancient Britons, though it cannot be denied that his strictures were in general well-founded, and discover a degree of critical discernment that was not very common in those times.

Gervase of Canterbury, a monk of the monastery of Christ's-church in that city, was one of the most voluminous historians of this period. His chronicle of the kings of England, from A.D. 1122 to A.D. 1200, and his history of the archbishops of Canterbury, from St. Augustine to Archbishop Hubert, who died A.D. 1205, are his two most considerable performances of this kind. A strict attention to chronology in the disposition of his materials, is one of the chief excellencies of this historian.

Ralph de Diceto, archdeacon of London, was the contemporary of Gervase, and composed also two historical works, entitled Abbreviationes Chronicorum, and Imagines Historiarum, which are published in the same collection.

Benedict, abbot of Peterborough, was educated at Oxford, became a monk in the monastery of Christ's-church in Canterbury, and some time after was chosen prior by the members of that society. Though he had been a great admirer of Archbishop Becket, and wrote a life of that prelate, he was so much esteemed by Henry II., that by the influence of that prince he was elected abbot of Peterborough, A.D. 1177. He assisted at the coronation of Richard I., A.D. 1189, and was advanced to be keeper of the great seal, A.D. 1191. But he did not long enjoy this high dignity, as he died on Michaelmas-day, A.D. 1193. Besides his life of Archbishop Becket, he composed a history of Henry II. and Richard I. from A.D. 1170 to A.D. 1192; which has been much and justly esteemed by many of our greatest antiquaries, as containing one of the best accounts of the transactions of those times. A beautiful edition of this work was published at Oxford, in two volumes, by Mr. Hearne, A.D. 1735. The gratitude due for the information received from the perusal of the English historians of the twelfth century, who, in merit, as well as in number, are superior to those of any other nation of Europe, in that period, is in danger of making us forget the proportion that must be observed in the several parts of an historical work, towards those who were the chief ornaments of their country in other branches of learning.

John of Salisbury was born at Old Sarum, from which he derived his name, about A.D. 1116. For, according to his own account, after he had gone through a course of education in England, he went to the university of Paris, for his further improvement, A.D. 1136, at which time, it is probable, he was at least twenty years of age. In this famous seat of learning he spent no fewer than twelve years, attending the lectures of the most celebrated professors of the several sciences, particularly grammar, rhetoric, the Aristotelian philosophy, and theology. At his return into England he studied the civil law under Vacarius, who taught with great applause at Oxford, A.D. 1149. By this long and ardent application to study, under the best masters, he acquired a prodigious fund of knowledge, and became one of the most learned men of the age in which he flourished. Embracing the monastic life at Canterbury, he was the bosom-friend and chief confidant of two successive archbishops of that see, Theobald and Thomas Becket. To the last of these, while he was chancellor of England, our author dedicated his famous work, De nugis curialium, et vestigiis philosophorum (of the fopperies of courtiers, and the footsteps of philosophers), in an elegant Latin poem, containing some of the politest compliments to his patron. This work is indeed the most curious and valuable monument of the English literature of the twelfth century; and it is impossible to peruse it without admiring the virtue and good sense, as well as the genius and erudition, of its author. His connexion with Archbishop Becket involved him in many troubles; and he was the very first person banished out of England by Henry II., A.D. 1164, for his attachment to that prelate. He continued almost seven years in exile, though he had the most inviting offers made him, not only of leave to return home, but also of the royal favour and preferment, if he would abandon the party of the archbishop. But to this he never would consent, declaring his resolution to die in exile, rather than forsake his friend and patron in his adversity; though he was far from approving of his conduct in every particular. His friendship for Becket was as active as it was steady, and prompted him to undertake no fewer than ten journeys into Italy, besides many others into different parts of France, in negotiating his affairs. At length he obtained permission to return into England a little before the archbishop, A.D. 1171, and was a mournful spectator of the murder of his beloved friend and patron. In the time of his exile our author had gained the favour of many persons of the highest rank, particularly of Pope Alexander III., of the king of France, and of the archbishop of Sens, by whose interest he was elected bishop of Chartres in that province, A.D. 1172. Having enjoyed this dignity almost ten years, he died A.D. 1182. John of Salisbury composed many other works, besides that already mentioned, particularly a very learned defence of grammar, rhetoric, and logic, against one whom he calls Cornificius, which contains a most curious account of the state of these sciences in this period. A collection of his letters, consisting of above three hundred, with a life of Thomas Becket, were published at Paris, A.D. 1611.

Peter of Blois (Petrus Blesensis) was born about A.D. 1120, at the city of Blois in France, from whence he derived his name. His parents, being opulent, gave him a learned education. In his youth, when he studied in the university of Paris, he was excessively fond of poetry; and when he was a little further advanced in life, he became no less fond of rhetoric, to the study of which he applied with the greatest ardour. From Paris he removed to Bologna in Italy, to acquire the civil and canon law, in the knowledge of both which he very much excelled. He appears from his writings to have cultivated medicine, and several branches of the mathematics, with no little care and success. The study of theology was the chief delight and business of his life, in which he spent the greatest part of his time, and made the greatest progress. But unfortunately it was that scholastic theology, which consisted in vain attempts to prove and explain the many absurd opinions which then prevailed in the church, by the subtilties of Aristotelian logic. In attempting to explain in this manner the most absurd of all opinions that ever existed amongst mankind, he was the very first person who employed the famous word transubstantiation, which was soon after adopted by the church of Rome, and has ever since made so great a noise. Being appointed preceptor to William II., king of Sicily, A.D. 1167, he obtained the custody of the privy seal; and next to the archbishop of Palermo, the prime minister, had the greatest influence in all affairs. But his power was not of long duration; for the archbishop being banished, A.D. 1168, our author soon after left the court of Sicily, and returned into France. He was not long, however, without a royal patron, being invited into England by Henry II., who employed him as his private secretary, made him archdeacon of Bath, and gave him some other benefices. When he had spent a few years at court, he conceived a disgust at that way of life (of which he has drawn a very unpleasing picture in one of his letters), and retired into the family of Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, who made him his chancellor about A.D. 1176. In this station he continued to the death of the archbishop, A.D. 1183, enjoying the highest degree of favour with that prelate, though he used much freedom in reproving him for his remissness in the government of the church. Our author remained in the same station in the family of Archbishop Baldwin, who succeeded Richard, acting both as his secretary and chancellor. He was also sent by that prelate on an embassy to Rome, A.D. 1187, to plead his cause before Pope Urban III., in the famous controversy between him and the monks of Canterbury, about the church of Hackington. After the departure of his friend and patron Baldwin for the Holy Land, A.D. 1190, our author was involved in various troubles in his old age, the causes of which are not distinctly known, and died about the end of the twelfth century. He appears from his works, which may be justly reckoned among the most valuable monuments of the age in which he flourished, to have been a man of great integrity and sincere piety, as well as of a lively inventive genius, and uncommon erudition. His printed works consist of one hundred and thirty-four letters, which he collected together at the desire of Henry II.; of sixty-five sermons, delivered on various occasions; and of seventeen tracts on different subjects. Of the quickness of our author's invention, a very remarkable example has been already mentioned; and whoever will give themselves the trouble to peruse his works, will meet with many proofs of his erudition.

Girald Barry, commonly called Giraldus Cambrensis, i. e. Girald of Wales, was born at the castle of Mainarper, near Pembroke, A.D. 1146. By his mother he was descended from the princes of South Wales; and his father, William Barry, was one of the chief men of that principality. Being a younger brother, and intended for the church, he was sent to St. David's, and educated in the family of his uncle, who was bishop of that see. He acknowledges, in his history of his own life and actions, that in his early youth he was too playful; but being severely reproached for it by his preceptors, he became a very hard student, and greatly excelled all his school-fellows in learning. When he was about twenty years of age, he was sent, A.D. 1166, for his further improvement, to the university of Paris; where he continued three years, and became, according to his own account, a most excellent rhetorician; which rendered him very famous. On his return into Britain, he entered into holy orders, and obtained several benefices both in England and Wales. Observing, with much concern, that his countrymen, the Welsh, were very backward in paying the tithes of wool and cheese, which he was afraid would involve them in eternal damnation, he applied to Richard, archbishop of Canterbury, and was appointed his legate in Wales for rectifying that disorder, and for other purposes. He executed this commission with great spirit, excommunicating all without distinction who refused to save their souls, by surrendering the tithes of their cheese and wool. Not satisfied with enriching, he also attempted to reform the clergy, and dilated the archdeacon of Brechin to the archbishop, for the unpardonable crime of matrimony; and the poor old man refusing to put away his wife, was deprived of his archdeaconry; which was bestowed upon our zealous legate. In discharging the duties of this new office, he acted with great vigour, which involved him in many quarrels: but if we may believe himself, he was always in the right and always victorious. His uncle, the bishop of St. David's, dying A.D. 1176, he was elected his successor by the chapter: but this election having been made without the permission, and contrary to the inclination, of Henry II., our author prudently declined to insist upon it, and went again to Paris to prosecute his studies, particularly in the civil and canon law and theology. He speaks with great raptures of the prodigious fame he acquired by his eloquent declamations in the schools, and of the crowded audiences who attended them, who were at a loss to know whether the sweetness of his voice, the beauty of his language, or the irresistible force of his arguments, was most to be admired. Having spent about four years at Paris, he returned to St. David's; where he found everything in confusion; and the bishop being expelled by the people, he was appointed administrator by the archbishop of Canterbury, and governed the diocese in that capacity to A.D. 1184, when the bishop was restored. About the same time he was called to court by Henry II., appointed one of his chaplains, and sent into Ireland A.D. 1185, with Prince John. By this prince he was offered the united bishoprics of Ferns and Leighlin; but declined them, and employed his time in collecting materials for his topography of Ireland, and his history of the conquest of that island. Having finished his topography, which consisted of three books, he published it at Oxford, A.D. 1187, in the following manner, in three days. On the first day he read the first book to a great concourse of people, and afterwards entertained all the poor of the town; on the second day he read the second book, and entertained all the doctors and chief scholars; and, on the third day, he read the third book, and entertained the younger scholars, soldiers, and burgesses. "A most glorious spectacle," says he, "which revived the ancient times of the poets, and of which no example had been seen in England." He attended Baldwin, archbishop of Canterbury, in his progress through Wales, A.D. 1186, in preaching a crusade for the recovery of the Holy Land, in which, he tells us, he was far more successful than the primate; and particularly that the people were prodigiously affected with his Latin sermons, which they did not understand, melting into tears, and coming in crowds to take the cross. Although Henry II., as our author assures us, entertained the highest opinion of his virtues and abilities; yet he never would advance him to any higher dignity in the church, on account of his relation to the princes and great men of Wales. But on the accession of Richard I., A.D. 1189, his prospects of preferment became better; for he was sent by that prince into Wales to preserve the peace of that country, and was even joined in commission with William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, as one of the regents of the kingdom. He did not, however, improve this favourable opportunity; refusing the bishopric of Bangor in A.D. 1190, and that of Llandaff the year after, having fixed his heart on the see of St. David's, the bishop of which was very old and infirm. In A.D. 1192, the state of public affairs, and the course of interest at court, became so unfavourable to our author's views, that he determined to retire. At first he resolved to return to Paris, to prosecute his studies; but meeting with some difficulties in this, he went to Lincoln; where William de Mont read lectures in theology with great applause. Here he spent about six years in the study of divinity, and in composing several works. The see of St. David's, which had long been the great object of his ambition, became vacant A.D. 1198, and brought him again upon the stage. He was unanimously elected by the chapter; but met with so powerful an adversary in Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury (who opposed his promotion with great violence), that it involved him in a litigation, which lasted five years, cost him three journeys to Rome, at a great expense, and in which he was at last defeated, A.D. 1203. Soon after this he retired from the world, and spent the last seventeen years of his life in a studious privacy, composing many books, of which we have a very correct catalogue. That Girald of Wales was a man of uncommon activity, genius, and learning, is undeniable; but these and his other good qualities were much tarnished by his insufferable vanity, which must have been very offensive to his contemporaries, as it is highly disgusting to his readers.

Many other men of genius and erudition flourished in Britain in this period; but to give a full account of them, belongs rather to the biographer than to the general historian.

SECTION III.

History of the chief Seminaries of Learning in Great Britain, from 1066 to 1216.

ONE cause of the improvements in the sciences which took place in this period, was the increase of seminaries of learning. These may be divided into five classes, viz.:—1. General studies or universities; 2. Episcopal or cathedral schools; 3. Monastic or conventual schools; 4. The schools of cities and towns; and 5. The schools of the Jews. Of each of these classes we shall give a brief account.

That those seats of learning which are now called universities were anciently called studies, is well known; as, the study of Oxford, the study of Paris, &c. But about the end of the twelfth or beginning of the thirteenth century, the modern name seems generally to have prevailed, either because all kinds of learning were taught in them, and students of all countries were admitted to them, or because they were formed into legal communities, which, in the Latin of those times, were called universitates. Of such universities there were only two in Britain, Oxford and Cambridge.

The state of public affairs was so unsettled for a considerable time, both before and after the conquest, and the city of Oxford in particular suffered so much, first from the Danes, and afterwards from the Normans, that it could not be in a flourishing condition as a seat of learning. From Domesday-book we find, that A.D. 1086, there were no fewer than five hundred and twenty-two ruinous or empty houses in Oxford, and only two hundred and forty-three inhabited. It has been warmly agitated, whether the Conqueror's youngest son, afterwards Henry I., was educated at Oxford or Cambridge, without satisfactory evidence on either side. That he built a palace, and sometimes resided in the first of these palaces, is better attested. It is also said, that Robert White, of whom an account has been already given, taught with great reputation at Oxford in the reign of that learned prince. But this seat of the Muses was taken by storm, and reduced to ashes, A.D. 1141, by King Stephen; which dispersed both teachers and scholars. In a little time, however, they returned to their favourite residence; which, before the end of that reign, became famous for the study of the civil law. This university became still more flourishing in the reign of Henry II., who was a learned prince, and a great patron of learning; though a great part of the city, and several schools or halls, were destroyed by an accidental fire, A.D. 1120. Before that time the houses and halls of Oxford had been built of wood, and covered with straw; but after this fire, many of them were built of stone, and covered with tiles or lead. As Richard I. had been born at Oxford, he still retained an affection for it, and granted it so many privileges, that, in his reign, it became a rival to the university of Paris. In the reign of King John, when the university was in a prosperous state, an unfortunate event happened, A.D. 1209, which threatened it with destruction. A scholar, engaged in his diversion, accidentally killed a woman, and made his escape, for fear of punishment. A prodigious mob, with the mayor of the city at their head, immediately assembled, and surrounded the hall t.

which the unfortunate scholar belonged; and not finding him, seized and imprisoned other three, who were entirely innocent, and obtained an order from King John, who hated the clergy, to put them to death; which was executed without delay. The greatest part of his professors and scholars, enraged at this act of cruelty and injustice, abandoned Oxford to the number of 3000, and retired, some to Cambridge, some to Reading, and some to Maidstone, in Kent. They complained also to the pope, and obtained a bull, laying the city under an interdict, and discharging all professors from teaching in it. Their superstitious terrors and secular losses soon brought the people of Oxford to repent of the cruelty they had committed; and they sent a deputation of their most respectable citizens to Nicolas, bishop of Tusculum, the pope's legate, to make their submissions, and promise obedience to all his commands. In consequence of this, the legate issued a bull, dated at Ramsey, 26th June, A. D. 1214, suspending those professors who had not left Oxford, from teaching for three years; prescribing the most humiliating penances to the inhabitants, and stipulating many advantages for the members of the university; and obliged the mayor, with fifty of the chief citizens, to take a solemn oath, in the name of all the rest, that they would comply with every article in that bull. When all these preliminaries were settled, the professors and scholars returned in such multitudes, and were so joyfully received by the citizens, that the university became more flourishing than it had ever been; and at the conclusion of this period consisted of about 4000 members.

Cambridge suffered still more than Oxford, both from the Danes before, and the Normans after, the conquest; and seems to have been longer and more entirely deserted as a seat of learning. This appears from the following distinct account of its revival, given by a writer of undoubted credit. "Joffrid, abbot of Croyland, A. D. 1109, sent to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge, Master Gisleber, his fellow-monk, and professor of theology, with three other monks who had followed him into England; who being well instructed in philosophical theorems, and other ancient sciences, went every day to Cambridge; and having hired a certain public barn, taught the sciences openly, and in a little time collected a great concourse of scholars. For in the very second year after their arrival, the number of their scholars from the town and country increased so much, that there was no house, barn, nor church, capable of containing them. For this reason they separated into different parts of the town, and imitating the plan of Orleans, brother Odo, a famous grammarian and satirist of those times, read grammar, according to the doctrine of Priscian, and Remigius upon him, to the boys and younger students assigned to him, early in the morning. At one o'clock, brother Terricus, an acute sophist, read Aristotle's logics, according to the introductions and commentaries of Porphyry and Averrois, to those who were further advanced. At three, brother William read lectures on Tully's rhetoric and Quintilian's institutions. But Master Gislebert, being ignorant of the English, but very expert in the Latin and French languages, preached in the several churches to the people on Sundays and holidays. From this little fountain, which hath swelled into a great river, we now behold the city of God made glad, and all England rendered fruitful, by many teachers and doctors issuing from Cambridge, as from a most holy paradise." This last observation shows, that the university of Cambridge, after its revival by those learned monks in the beginning of the twelfth century, made such rapid progress, that, before the end of that century, when Peter of Blois wrote, it had attained to a very flourishing condition. The town, and consequently the university, suffered much in the civil war between King John and his barons, having been taken and plundered by both parties, A. D. 1215.

So many of the ingenious youth of Britain, in this period, finished their education in the university of Paris, that it merits a little of our attention, though not strictly within our plan. It was unquestionably the most celebrated seat of learning in Europe in those times, and was called by way of eminence, "The city of letters." All who excelled as teachers, or wished to improve as students, crowded to Paris, as the most proper place for displaying or acquiring talents. In the twelfth century we are assured, that the students in the university constituted one half of the inhabitants of that city. The English in particular were so numerous, that they occupied several schools or colleges; and made so distinguished a figure by their genius and learning, as well as by their generous manner of living, that they attracted the notice of all strangers. This appears from the following verses, describing the behaviour of a stranger on his first arrival in Paris, composed by Negel Wircker, an English student there, A. D. 1170.

*Pexus et ablatus tandem progressus in urbem,
Intrat in ecclesiam, vota precesque facit.
Inde scholas adiens, secum deliberat, utrum
Expediat potius illa vel ista schola.
Et quia subtiles sensu considerat Anglos,
Pluribus ex causis se sociavit iis.
Moribus egregii, verbo vultuque venusti,
Ingenio pollent, consilioque vigent.
Dona placent populis, et detestantur avaros,
Fercula multiplicant, et sine lege bibunt.*

*A stranger dress'd the city first surveys,
A church he enters, to his God he prays.
Next to the schools he hastens, each he views,
With care examines, anxious which to chuse.
The English most attract his prying eyes,
Their manners, words, and looks pronounce them wise.
Theirs is the open hand, the bounteous mind,
Theirs solid sense, with sparkling wit combin'd.
Their graver studies jovial banquets crown,
Their rankling cares in flowing bowls they drown.*

These general studies or universities, as Paris, Oxford, Cambridge, Bologna, &c. possessed several advantages, which attracted greater numbers of students to them than to other seats of learning. They had not only the best libraries, and most famous professors in all the sciences, but being incorporated societies, they were governed by their own magistrates, and enjoyed several peculiar privileges, particularly that of conferring academical honours or degrees. These were introduced in the course of this period, and soon became great objects of ambition, and incitements to learning.

In the darkest of the middle ages, the families of bishops were the chief seminaries of learning, in which young persons were educated for the service of the church. These episcopal or cathedral schools still continued in this period. They were even better regulated, and consequently more useful and more famous. In the most ancient times, the bishop was commonly the chief, if not the only teacher, of his cathedral school; the faithful discharge of which laborious office was hardly compatible with the other duties of his function. But in this period these schools were put under the direction of men of learning, who devoted their whole time and study to the education of youth, and had certain estates or prebends assigned for their support. These teachers of the cathedral schools were called "The scholastics of the diocese;" and all the youth in it who were designed for the church were entitled to the benefit of their instructions. Thus, for example, William de Monte, who had been a professor at Paris, and taught theology with so much reputation, in the reign of Henry II. at Lincoln, was the scholastic of that cathedral. By the eighteenth canon of the third general council of Lateran, A.D. 1179, it was decreed, that such scholastics should be settled in all cathedrals, with sufficient revenues for their support; and that they should have authority to superintend all the schoolmasters of the diocese, and grant them licenses, without which none should presume to teach. The laborious authors of the literary history of France have collected a very distinct account of the scholastics who presided in the principal cathedral schools of that kingdom in the twelfth century, among whom we meet with many of the most illustrious names for learning of that age. To attempt this with respect to England, would be quite unsuitable to the nature of general history. The sciences that were taught in these cathedral schools were such as were most necessary to qualify their pupils for performing the duties of the sacerdotal office, as grammar, rhetoric, logic, theology, and church-music.

The great increase of religious houses in this period very much increased the number of seminaries of learning, as there was a school more or less famous in almost every convent. We may form some idea of the number added to the schools of England by this means, if we consider, that there were no fewer than five hundred and fifty-seven religious houses of different kinds founded in it between the conquest and the death of King John. One design of these monastic schools was, to instruct the younger monks in those branches of learning that were necessary to their decent performance of the service of the church, particularly in the Latin language and church-music. Some degree of knowledge of these parts of learning was so necessary, that without it none could be admitted into the monastic order in any of the chief abbeys; and the famous Nicholas Breakspear, afterwards Pope Adrian IV. was rejected by Richard Abbot of St. Alban's, for want of a sufficient share of learning. In these conventual schools the young monks were carefully instructed in the art of fair and beautiful writing; and those who excelled in that art, were for some years employed in the scriptorium, or writing-chamber, in transcribing books for the use of the church and library. There were such schools also in nunneries for the instruction of the younger nuns; and in some of these schools they did not confine themselves to such parts of learning as were absolutely necessary, but studied also the Greek and Hebrew languages, philosophy, physic, and divinity. In the schools of all the larger monasteries, besides the necessary parts of learning, several other sciences were taught, as rhetoric, logic, theology, medicine, with the civil and canon law. These two last branches of learning, law and physic, being very lucrative, were so diligently studied and practised by the monks, that they were almost the only pleaders and physicians of those times. The abbey school of St. Alban's, for example, was a famous seminary of learning in this period, in which all the sciences, particularly theology, law, and physic, were taught; as appears from the verses of Alexander Neicham, one of the most learned men of the twelfth century, who was educated, and afterwards presided in that school. Many persons of rank and fortune were educated in these conventual schools, to which they frequently became benefactors.

Besides all these seminaries of learning already mentioned, there were established in this period, in all the chief cities and towns of England, a kind of illustrious schools, in which the youth were instructed not only in reading, writing, and grammar, but also in several other branches of learning, as rhetoric, logic, &c. We are told by William Fitz-Stevens, who flourished in the reign of Henry II. that there were three of these illustrious schools in London, firmly established; besides several others that were occasionally opened by such masters as had obtained a high reputation for their learning. "On holidays," says he, "it is usual for these schools to hold public assemblies in the churches, in which the scholars engage in demonstrative or logical disputations, some using enthymems, and others perfect syllogisms; some aiming at nothing but to gain the victory, and make an ostentatious display of their acuteness, while others have the investigation of truth in view. Artful sophists, on these occasions, acquire great applause; some by a prodigious inundation and flow of words, others by their specious but fallacious arguments. After the disputations, other scholars deliver rhetorical declamations, in which they observe all the rules of art, and neglect no topic of persuasion. Even the younger boys in the different schools contend against each other in verse, about the principles of grammar, and the preterites and supines of verbs." There was, about the same time, a very famous academy in the town of St. Alban's (besides that in the abbey), under the government of Matthew, a physician, who had been educated at Salerno, and of his nephew Garinus, who excelled in the knowledge of the civil and canon law. Of this academy Matthew Paris affirms, "That there was hardly a school in all England, at that time, more fruitful or more famous, either for the number or proficiency of its scholars." This plainly intimates, that there were many schools of the same kind in England; which is further evident from the last canon of the council of Westminster, A.D. 1138, prohibiting the scholastics of cathedral churches from taking money for granting licenses to the teachers of the schools in the several towns and villages.

That prodigious numbers of Jews crowded into England soon after the conquest, and resided in all the principal towns for some ages, is attested by all the historians of those times. Their numbers and riches were indeed so great, and the revenues derived from them by government so considerable, that (as we have already seen) a particular exchequer was appointed for their reception. Among these Jews there were many rabbis, and men of learning, who officiated as priests in their synagogues, and professors in their schools, which they had in London, York, Lincoln, Linn, Norwich, Oxford, Cambridge, and every other town where any considerable number of them resided. For though the sciences had been much neglected by the Jews for five or six centuries, they were cultivated by them in the twelfth with surprising ardour, and many of their rabbis of that age made a distinguished figure in the world of letters. In their schools, besides the rites of their religion, they taught the Hebrew and Arabic languages, arithmetic, for which they had much use in their money transactions; and medicine, by which many of them acquired both riches and reputation. Nor were the academies of the Jewish rabbis shut against the Christian youth, but open to all who chose to take the benefit of their instructions.

From this brief account of the seminaries of learning established in Britain in the period we are now examining, it is abundantly evident, that the general ignorance of the laity was owing rather to the state and manners of the times, than to the want of opportunities of acquiring at least a moderate degree of knowledge. But the truth seems to be, that this ignorance prevailed most amongst those in the highest and those in the lowest ranks of life; which was occasioned by the extreme dissipation of the former, who spent almost all their time, when they were not engaged in war, in rural diversions or domestic riots; and by the no less extreme depression of the latter, who were doomed to perpetual servitude and hard labour. For it is well known, that these two extremes are equally unfriendly to intellectual pursuits.

SECTION II.

History of the necessary Arts in Britain, from A.D. 1066 to A.D. 1216.

As agriculture, in its several branches, is the most useful of all arts, it merits our particular attention in every period. That the conquest of England by the Normans contributed to the improvement of this art in Britain, is undeniable. For by that event many thousands of husbandmen, from the fertile and well-cultivated plains of Flanders, France, and Normandy, settled in this island, obtained estates or farms, and employed the same methods in the cultivation of them that they had used in their native countries. Some of the Norman barons were great improvers of their lands, and are celebrated in history for their skill in agriculture. "Richard de Rules, Lord of Brunne and Deeping," says Ingulphus, "was much addicted to agriculture, and delighted in breeding horses and cattle. Besides inclosing and draining a great extent of country, he imbanked the river Wielland, which used every year to overflow the neighbouring fields, in a most substantial manner, building many houses and cottages upon the bank; which increased so much, that in a little time they formed a large town called Deeping, from its low situation. Here he planted orchards, cultivated commons, converted deep lakes and impassable quagmires into fertile fields, rich meadows, and pastures; and, in a word, rendered the whole country about it a garden of delights." From the above description, it appears that this nobleman, who was chamberlain to William the Conqueror, was not only fond of agriculture, but also that he conducted his improvements with skill and success.

The Norman clergy, and particularly the monks, were still greater improvers than the nobility; and the lands of the church, especially of the convents, were conspicuous for their superior cultivation. For the monks of every monastery retained such of their lands as lay most convenient in their own possession, which they cultivated with great care, under their own inspection, and frequently with their own hands. It was so much the custom of the monks of this period to assist in the cultivation of their lands, especially in seed-time, hay-time, and harvest, that the famous Thomas Becket, after he was Archbishop of Canterbury, used to go out to the fields, with the monks of the monasteries where he happened to reside, and join with them in reaping their corn and making their hay. This is indeed mentioned by the historian as an act of uncommon condescension in a person of his high station in the church; but it is a sufficient proof that the monks of those times used to work with their own hands, at some seasons, in the labours of the field. And as many of them were men of genius and invention, they no doubt made various improvements in the art of agriculture. The 26th canon of the general council of Lateran, held A.D. 1179, affords a further proof that the protection and encouragement of all who were concerned in agriculture, was an object of attention to the church. For by that canon, it is decreed, "That all presbyters, clerks, monks, converts, pilgrims, and peasants, when they are engaged in the labours of husbandry, together with the cattle in their ploughs, and the seed which they carry into the field, shall enjoy perfect security; and that all who molest or interrupt them, if they do not desist when they have been admonished, shall be excommunicated."

The implements of husbandry were of the same kind, in this period, with those that are employed at present; but some of them were less perfect in their construction. The plough for example, had but one stilt or handle, which the ploughman guided with one hand, having in his other hand an instrument which served both for cleaning and mending his plough, and breaking the clods. The Norman plough had two wheels; and, in the light soil of Normandy, was commonly drawn by one ox, or two oxen; but in England a greater number, according to the nature of the soil, was often necessary. In Wales the person who conducted the oxen in the plough, walked backwards. Their carts, harrows, scythes, sickles, and flails, from the figures of them still remaining, appear to have been nearly of the same construction with those that are now used. In Wales they did not use a sickle in reaping their corn, but an instrument like the blade of a knife, with a wooden handle at each end. Water mills for grinding corn were very common; but they had also a kind of mills turned by horses, which were chiefly used in their armies, and at sieges, or in places where running water was scarce.

Though the various operations of husbandry, as manuring, ploughing, sowing, harrowing, reaping, threshing, winnowing, &c. are incidentally mentioned by the writers of this period, it is impossible to collect from them a distinct account of the manner in which these operations were performed. Manure seems still to have been the chief manure next to dung, employed by the Anglo-Norman, as it had been by the Anglo-Saxon and British husbandmen. Summer-fallowing of lands designed for wheat, and ploughing them several times, appears to have been a common practice of the English farmers of this period. For Giraldus Cambrensis, in his description of Wales, takes notice of it as a great singularity in the husbandmen of that country, "that they ploughed their lands only once a-year in March or April, in order to sow them with oats; but did not, like other farmers, plough them twice in summer, and once in winter, in order to prepare them for wheat." On the border of one of the compartments in the famous tapestry of Baieux, we see the figure of one man sowing, with a sheet about his neck, containing the seed under his left arm, and scattering it with his right hand; and of another man harrowing with one harrow, drawn by one horse. In two plates of Mr. Strutt's very curious and valuable work we perceive the figures of several persons engaged in mowing, reaping, threshing, and winnowing; in all which operations there appears to be little singular or different from modern practice.

Agriculture seems to have been in a very imperfect state in Scotland towards the end of this period. For in a parliament held at Scone, by king Alexander II. A.D. 1214, it was enacted, that such farmers as had four oxen or cows, or upwards, should labour their lands, by tilling them with a plough, and should begin to till fifteen days before Candlemas; and that such farmers as had not so many as four oxen, though they could not labour their lands by tilling, should delve as much with hand and foot as would produce a sufficient quantity of corn to support themselves and their families. But this law was probably designed for the highlands and most uncultivated parts of the kingdom. For in the same parliament, a very severe law was made against those farmers who did not extirpate a pernicious weed called gilde out of their lands, which seems to indicate a more advanced state of cultivation.

All the branches of gardening were much improved in England by the Normans, who coming from a country abounding with gardens, orchards, and vineyards, naturally laboured to introduce the same accommodations in their new settlements. William of Malmesbury, who flourished in the former part of the twelfth century, celebrates the vale of Gloucester, near to which he spent his whole life, for its great fertility both in corn and fruit trees, some of which the soil produced spontaneously by the way-sides, and others were cultivated, yielding such prodigious quantities of the finest fruits as were sufficient to excite the most indolent to be industrious. "This vale," adds he, "is planted thicker with vineyards than any other province in England; and they produce grapes in the greatest abundance, and of the sweetest taste. The wine that is made in these vineyards hath no disagreeable tartness in the mouth, and is very little inferior in flavour to the wines of France." This is a decisive proof that vineyards were planted and cultivated in England, in this period, for the purpose of making wine. Many of these vineyards were planted by abbots and bishops for the benefit of their monks and clergy. Martin, for example, Abbot of St. Edmundsbury, planted a vineyard for the use of his abbey, A.D. 1140; and Hugh Bishop of Lincoln paid a fine to the king of no less than five hundred marks, that the crops of corn produced on the estates, and wine made in the vineyards, together with the wine presses, belonging to that see in the year in which a bishop died, should be the property of the bishop, though he should happen to die before Martinmas. This fine, it is true, was paid to Henry III. about fourteen years after the conclusion of this period: but the vineyards had been planted long before, and our kings had been accustomed to claim the produce of them when a bishop died before Martinmas.

were made in agriculture, and that England was reputed the most fertile country in Europe, it cannot be denied that there were some very severe famines felt in it in the course of this period. An attentive examination, however, of the circumstances of these famines will serve still further to convince us that agriculture was much improved, and a more constant supply of the necessaries of life provided by the Normans after they had obtained a firm establishment. For of the five great famines that raged in this period, four happened within a few years after the conquest, and were partly produced by the dreadful devastations of war; and the only destructive famine that fell out in the twelfth century (A.D. 1125), was occasioned by prodigious rains and floods in harvest; against the fatal effects of which no skill or industry of the husbandmen can guard.

Architecture, in all its branches, received as great improvements in this period as agriculture. The truth is, that the twelfth century may very properly be called the age of architecture, in which the rage for building was more violent in England than at any other time. The great and general improvements that were made in the fabrics of houses and churches in the first years of this century, are thus described by a contemporary writer. "The new cathedrals and innumerable churches that were built in all parts, together with the many magnificent cloisters and monasteries, and other apartments of monks, that were then erected, afford a sufficient proof of the great felicity of England in the reign of Henry I. The religious of every order enjoying peace and prosperity, displayed the most astonishing ardour in every thing that might increase the splendour of divine worship. The fervent zeal of the faithful prompted them to pull down houses and churches every where, and rebuild them in a better manner. By this means the ancient edifices that had been raised in the days of Edgar, Edward, and other Christian kings, were demolished, and others of greater magnitude and magnificence, and of more elegant workmanship, were erected in their room to the glory of God."

As the prodigious power of religious zeal, whatever turn it happens to take, when it is thoroughly heated, is well known, it may not be improper to give one example of the arts employed by the clergy and monks of this period, to inflame the pious ardour of the kings, nobles, and people, for building and adorning churches. When Joffred, Abbot of Croyland, resolved to rebuild the church of his monastery in a most magnificent manner, A.D. 1106, he obtained from the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, a bull, dispensing with the third part of all penances for sin, to those who contributed any thing towards the building of that church. This bull was directed not only to the king and people of England, but to the kings of France and Scotland, and to all other kings, earls, barons, archbishops, bishops, abbots, priors, rectors, presbyters, and clerks, and to all true believers in Christ, rich and poor, in all Christian kingdoms. To make the best use of this bull, he sent two of his most eloquent monks to proclaim it over all France and Flanders, two other monks into Scotland, two into Denmark and Norway, two into Wales, Cornwall, and Ireland, and others into different parts of England. "By this means," says the historian, "the wonderful benefits granted to all the contributors to the building of this church, were published to the very ends of the earth; and great heaps of treasure and masses of yellow metal flowed in from all countries, upon the venerable Abbot Joffred, and encouraged him to lay the foundations of his church." Having spent about four years in collecting mountains of different kinds of marble, from quarries both at home and abroad, together with great quantities of lime, iron, brass, and other materials for building, he fixed a day for the great ceremony of laying the foundation, which he contrived to make a very effectual mean of raising the superstructure. For, on the long expected day, the feast of the holy virgins Felicitas and Perpetua, an immense multitude of earls, barons, and knights, with their ladies and families; of abbots, priors, monks, nuns, clerks, and persons of all ranks, arrived at Croyland, to assist at this ceremony. The pious Abbot Joffred began by saying certain prayers, and shedding a flood of tears, on the foundation. Then each of the earls, barons, knights, with their ladies, sons, and daughters; the abbots, clerks, and others, laid a stone, and upon it deposited a sum of money, a grant of lands, tithes, or patronage, or a promise of stone, lime, wood, labour, or carriages, for building the church. After this, the Abbot entertained the whole company, amounting to five thousand persons, at dinner. To this entertainment they were well entitled; for the money, and grants of different kinds, which they had deposited on the foundation-stones, were alone sufficient to have raised a very noble fabric. By such arts as these the clergy inspired kings, nobles, and people of all ranks, with so ardent a spirit for these pious works, that in the course of this period, almost all the sacred edifices in England were rebuilt, and many hundred of new ones raised from the foundation. Nor was this spirit confined to England, but prevailed as much in Scotland in proportion to its extent and riches. King David I. alone, besides several cathedrals and other churches, built no fewer than thirteen abbeys and priories, some of which were very magnificent structures.

The sacred architecture of the Anglo-Normans in the beginning of this period, did not differ much in its style and manner from that of the Anglo-Saxons; their churches being in general plain, low, strong, and dark; the arches both of the doors and windows semicircular; with few or no ornaments. By degrees, through much practice, our architects, who were all monks or clergymen, improved in their taste and skill, and ventured to form plans of more noble, light, and elevated structures, with a great variety of ornaments; which led to that bold magnificent style of building, commonly, though perhaps not very properly, called the latter Gothic. It is not improbable that our monkish architects were assisted in attaining this style of building by models from foreign countries, or by instructions from such of their own number as had visited Italy, France, Spain, or the East. But, without entering into uncertain disputes about the origin of this style of architecture, it is sufficient to observe that it began to appear in England in the reign of Henry II., and was distinguished from the more ancient Gothic by the following marks. The walls were much higher though not so thick, and supported on the outside by buttresses; the doors and windows were wider and loftier, and the arches of both were no longer semicircular, but pointed; and were sometimes ornamented with clusters of pillars on each side, and great variety of carvings—the larger windows had mullions of stone for ornament; and for the conveniency of fixing the glass, the pillars that supported the roof were lofty and slender, and frequently surrounded with small pillars that made them appear like a cluster,—the arches of the roof, like those of the doors and windows, were pointed;—the roof was covered with lead, and the fabric ornamented on the top at each end with pinnacles, and with a tower over the middle of the cross; on which, about the end of this period, very lofty spires of wood and stone began to be erected. This mode of architecture, which, with some variations, flourished more than three centuries, produced many stupendous edifices, which are still viewed with pleasure and admiration. Many of these magnificent structures were built with stones brought from the quarries near Caen in Normandy, which very much enhanced the expense of their erection.

The houses of the common people in the country, and of the lower burgesses in towns and cities were very little improved in their structure in the course of this period; that most numerous and useful order of men being much depressed in the times we are now delineating. Even in the capital city of London, all the houses of mechanics and common burgesses were built of wood, and covered with straw or reeds, toward the end of the twelfth century. But the palaces, or rather castles, of the Anglo-Norman kings, barons, and prelates, were very different from the residences of persons of the same rank in the Anglo-Saxon times. For this we have the testimony of a person of undoubted credit, who was well acquainted with them both. "The Anglo-Saxon nobles," says William of Malmsbury, "squandered away their ample revenues in low and mean houses; but the French and Norman barons are very different from them, living at less expense, but in great and magnificent palaces." The truth is, that the rage of building fortified castles was no less violent among the Norman princes, prelates, and barons, than that of building churches. To this they were prompted, not only by the custom of their native country, but also by their dangerous situation in this island. Surrounded by multitudes, whom they had depressed and plundered, and by whom they were abhorred, they could not think themselves safe without the protection of deep ditches and strong walls. The conqueror himself was sensible, that the want of fortified places in England had greatly facilitated his conquest, and might facilitate his expulsion; and therefore he made all possible haste to remedy this defect, by building very magnificent and strong castles in all the towns within the royal demesnes. "William," says Matthew Paris, "excelled all his predecessors in building castles, and greatly harrassed his subjects and vassals with these works." All his earls, barons, and even prelates, imitated his example; and it was the first care of every one who received the grant of an estate from the crown, to build a castle upon it for his defence and residence. The disputes about the succession in the following reigns, kept up this spirit for building great and strong castles. William Rufus was still a greater builder than his father. "This William," says Henry Knyghton, "was much addicted to building royal castles and palaces, as the castles of Dover, Windsor, Norwich, Exeter, the palace of Westminster, and many others, testify; nor was there any king of England before him that erected so many, and such noble edifices." Henry I. was also a great builder both of castles and monasteries. But this rage for building never prevailed so much in any period of the English history as in the turbulent reign of King Stephen, from A. D. 1135 to A. D. 1154. "In this reign," as we are told by the author of the Saxon Chronicle, "every one who was able, built a castle; so that the poor people were worn out with the toil of these buildings, and the whole kingdom was covered with castles." This last expression will hardly appear too strong, when we are informed, that besides all the castles before that time in England, no fewer than eleven hundred and fifteen were raised from the foundation in the short space of nineteen years.

An art so much practised as architecture was in this period, must have been much improved. That it really was so, will appear from the following very brief description of the most common form and structure of a royal castle, or of that of a great earl, baron, or prelate, in this period; and as these castles served both for residence and defence, this description will serve for an account both of the domestic and military architecture of those times, which cannot well be separated.

The situation of the castles of the Anglo-Norman kings and barons was most commonly on an eminence, and near a river; a situation on several accounts eligible. The whole site of the castle, which was frequently of great extent and irregular figure, was surrounded by a deep and broad ditch, sometimes filled with water, and sometimes dry, called the fosse. Before the great gate was an outwork, called a barbican or antemural, which was a strong and high wall, with turrets upon it, designed for the defence of the gate and drawbridge. On the inside of the ditch stood the wall of the castle, about eight or ten feet thick, and between twenty and thirty feet high, with a parapet, and a kind of embrasures, called crennels, on the top. On this wall, at proper distances, square towers of two or three stories high were built, which served for lodging some of the principal officers of the proprietor of the castle, and for other purposes; and, on the inside were erected lodgings for the common servants or retainers, granaries, storehouses, and other necessary offices. On the top of this wall, and on the flat roofs of these buildings, stood the defenders of the castle, when it was besieged, and from thence discharged arrows, darts, and stones, on the besiegers. The great gate of the castle stood in the course of this wall, and was strongly fortified with a tower on each side, and rooms over the passage, which was closed with thick folding doors of oak, often plated with iron, and with an iron portcullis or grate let down from above. Within this outward wall was a large open space or court, called in the largest and most perfect castles, the outer bayle or ballium, in which stood commonly a church or chapel. On the inside of this outer bayle was another ditch, wall, gate, and towers, inclosing the inner bayle, or court, within which the chief tower or keep was built. This was a very large square fabric, four or five stories high, having small windows in prodigious thick walls, which rendered the apartments within it dark and gloomy. This great tower was the palace of the prince, prelate, or baron, to whom the castle belonged, and the residence of the constable or governor. Under ground were dismal dark vaults, for the confinement of prisoners, which made it sometimes be called the dungeon. In this building also was the great hall, in which the owner displayed his hospitality, by entertaining his numerous friends and followers. At one end of the great halls of castles, palaces, and monasteries, there was a place raised a little above the rest of the floor, called the deis, where the chief table stood, at which persons of the highest rank dined. Though there were unquestionably great variations in the structure of castles and palaces in this period, yet the most perfect and magnificent of them seem to have been constructed nearly on the above plan. Such, to give one example, was the famous castle of Bedford, as appears from the following account of the manner in which it was taken by Henry III, A. D. 1224. The castle was taken by four assaults. "In the first was taken the barbican; in the second the outer ballia; at the third attack, the wall by the old tower was thrown down by the miners, where, with great danger, they possessed themselves of the inner ballia, through a chink; at the fourth assault, the miners set fire to the tower, so that the smoke burst out, and the tower itself was cloven to that degree, as to show visibly some broad chinks; whereupon the enemy surrendered."

The castles, monasteries, and greater churches of this period, were generally covered with lead, the windows glazed; and when the walls were not of ashler, they were neatly plastered and whitewashed on both sides. The doors, floors, and roof, were commonly made of oak planks and beams, exactly smoothed and jointed, and frequently carved. It is hardly necessary to observe, that the building one of these great and magnificent castles, monasteries, or churches, of which there were many in England, must have been a work of prodigious expense and labour; and that the architects and artificers, by whom that work was planned and executed, must have attained considerable dexterity in their respective arts. Several of these architects have obtained a place in history, and are highly celebrated for their superior skill. William of Sent, architect to Archbishop Lanfranc, in building his cathedral, is said, by Gervase of Canterbury, to have been a most exquisite artist both in stone and wood. He made not only a model of the whole cathedral, but of every particular piece of sculpture and carving, for the direction of the workmen; and invented many curious machines for loading and unloading ships, and conveying heavy weights by land, because all the stones were brought from Normandy. Matthew Paris speaks even in a higher strain of Walter of Coventry, who flourished towards the end of this period, when he says, that, "so excellent an architect had never yet appeared, and probable never would appear, in the world." This encomium was undoubtedly too high; but it is impossible to view the remains of many magnificent fabrics, both sacred and civil, that were erected in this period, without admiring the genius of the architects by whom they were planned, and the dexterity of the workmen by whom they were executed.

Though the arts of refining and working metals, which are so useful in themselves, and so necessary to the practice of the other arts, were very far from being in an imperfect state among the Anglo-Saxons, they certainly received some improvements in the present period. The art of making defensive armour, in particular, was brought to such perfection, that a knight completely armed was almost invulnerable. A suit of this armour consisted of many different pieces, for the several parts of the body, nicely jointed, to make them sit easy, and allow freedom of motion and exertion of strength; the whole was well tempered, finely polished, and often beautifully gilt, which are sufficient evidences of the dexterity of the artists. But those who wrought in the more precious metals, of gold and silver, had attained to still greater perfection in their art. This appears from the direct testimony of contemporary writers, and from the descriptions of some of the works of these critics. When Re-bert, Abbot of St. Alban's, sent a present of two candlesticks made of gold and silver, with wonderful art, to his countryman, Pope Adrian IV., A.D. 1158, they were greatly admired and praised by that pontiff and his courtiers, who acknowledged they had never beheld any pieces of workmanship of that kind so exquisitely beautiful. A goldsmith, named Baldwine, who flourished in the reign of Henry II., was very famous, and made many admirable pieces of plate for the use of Churches. "Simon, Abbot of St. Alban's," says Matthew Paris, "dedicated to God, and the church of the holy martyr Alban, for the perpetual preservation of his own memory, a very large cup of gold, than which there was not one more noble or beautiful in all England. It was made of the purest gold, by that renowned goldsmith, Master Baldwine, adorned with flowers and foliages of the most delicate workmanship, and set around with precious stones, in the most elegant manner. Besides this, he gave to that church, a vessel for keeping the Eucharist, which was suspended over the high altar, and excited universal admiration. It was made by the hand of the same Baldwine; and though it was of the finest gold, and enriched with precious stones of inestimable value, the workmanship was more excellent than the materials." These artists also excelled in casting figures of all kinds, in brass, silver, and gold, for ornamenting cabinets, shrines, altars, and the like. There was in the same abbey of St. Alban's, a shrine adorned with the whole history of our Saviour's passion, in such cast figures. The excessive riches of the church in this period, and the ambition of many prelates and abbots, to display their piety and gratify their pride, by adorning their cathedrals and abbeys, contributed very much to the improvement of this, and of several other arts, by affording the highest encouragement to the artists. The truth is, that many of the most curious artists of this period were ecclesiastics, and some of them even prelates; and that in some churches, there were certain prebends appropriated to those of their clergy who excelled as architects, workers in stone, wood, or metals, and such arts as were necessary in building and adorning monasteries and cathedrals.

The arts of dressing and spinning wool and flax, weaving both linen and woollen cloth, and several other clothing arts, were well known to the Anglo-Saxons, and practised by them with no little success, before the conquest. There is, however, sufficient evidence that all these arts were improved after that event, in the course of our present period. This was partly owing to the great multitude of manufacturers of cloth, who came from Flanders, and settled in England, in those times. The people of that country were then so famous for their skill in the woollen manufactory, that one of our ancient historians says, "the art of weaving seemed to be a peculiar gift bestowed upon them by nature." By this they were so much enriched, that some of their manufacturers and merchants rivalled princes in wealth and luxury. Besides the great number of Flemings who came over in the army of the Conqueror, there were several considerable emigrations of them from their own country into England, particularly in the reigns of Henry I. and King Stephen. After their settlement in this island, which abounded in the best materials for their manufactories, they pursued their former occupation with great advantage to themselves and to the kingdom. Giraldus Cambrensis, in his Itinerary of Wales, observes, that "the inhabitants of the district of Ross, in Pembrokeshire, who derived their origin from Flanders, were much addicted to, and greatly excelled, in the woollen manufactory.

For the improvement of the clothing arts the weavers in all the great towns of England were formed into gilds or corporations, and had various privileges bestowed upon them by royal charters, for which they paid certain fines into the exchequer. The weavers of Oxford paid a mark of gold for their gild, in the fifth of King Stephen: those of London paid sixteen pounds for theirs in the fifteenth, and those of Lincoln fined two chaseures or hounds for theirs in the twelfth of the same reign. In the twelfth of Henry II. the weavers of Winchester paid one mark of gold as a gresome, and two marks as their annual rate, for enjoying the rights of their gild, and the privilege of choosing their own aldermen; and in the same year the fullers of the same city, who formed another corporation, paid six pounds for their gild.

In the reign of Richard I. the woollen manufactory became the subject of legislation; and a law was made, A.D. 1197, for regulating the fabrication and sale of cloth. By that law it was enacted, "That all woollen cloths shall every where be made of the same breadth, viz. two ells within the lists; and of the same goodness in the middle as at the sides.—That the ell shall be of the same length over all the kingdom, and that it shall be made of iron.—That no merchant in any part of the kingdom of England shall stretch before his shop or booth, a red, or black cloth, or any other thing, by which the sight of buyers is frequently deceived in the choice of good cloth.—That no cloth of any other colour than black shall be sold in any part of the kingdom, except in cities and capital burghs; and that in all cities and burghs, four or six men, according to the size of the place, shall be appointed to enforce the observation of these regulations, by seizing the persons and goods of all who transgress them." This remarkable law demonstrates, that the manufactory of broad cloth was not only established in England in this period, but that it had arrived at considerable maturity, and had become an object of national attention. There is evidence still remaining that this law was for some time very strictly executed; but that in the reign of King John, when every thing became venal, the merchants and manufacturers purchased licenses to make their cloth either broad or narrow as they pleased, which brought considerable sums into the royal exchequer.

That tapestry hangings, with historical figures woven in them, were used in England in this period, we have the clearest evidence. Richard, who was Abbot of St. Alban's from A. D. 1088 to A. D. 1119, made a present to his monastery of a suit of hangings, which contained the whole history of St. Alban. But whether these hangings had been made in England or not is uncertain, although it is not improbable that this curious art might be introduced by some of the many manufacturers from the Netherlands, who settled in Britain in this period.

Silks of various kinds are frequently mentioned both in the records and by the historians of this period, and even seem not to have been very uncommon. For we often meet with accounts of silk vestments, cops, altar-cloths, hangings, &c. in great quantities, purchased by prelates, for the use of themselves, their clergy, and their churches. Nor was the use of silks confined to the church and clergy. They were worn also by kings, queens, princes, and other persons of high rank, especially on solemn occasions. But it is much more probable, that these silks were imported from Spain, Sicily, Majorca, Ivice, and other countries, than that they were manufactured in Britain. The silk manufactory seems to have flourished greatly, at this time, in the two last-mentioned islands, as each of them paid an annual tribute of two hundred pieces of silk to the king of Arragon. Roger king of Sicily having taken the cities of Corinth, Thebes, and Athens, A. D. 1148, got into his hands a great number of silk weavers, brought them, with the implements and materials for the exercise of their art, and settled them at Palermo, in Sicily. A writer who visited this manufactory, A. D. 1169, represents it to have been then in a most flourishing condition, producing great quantities of silks, both plain and figured, of many different colours. "There (adds he) you might have seen other workmen making silks interwoven with gold, and adorned with figures composed of many sparkling gems." It will afterwards appear, that those elegant arts were not long confined to Sicily.

We have already seen that the Anglo-Saxon ladies before the Conquest excelled in the art of embroidery. This art was rather improved than injured by that event, and the English ladies still maintained their superiority in this respect. When Robert Abbot of St. Alban's visited his countryman Pope Adrian IV., he made him several valuable presents, and, amongst other things, three mitres, and a pair of sandals, of most admirable workmanship. His Holiness refused his other presents, but thankfully accepted of the mitres and sandals, being charmed with their exquisite beauty. These admired pieces of embroidery were the work of Christina Abbess of Markgate. Another pope, not long after, admired the embroidered vestments of some English clergymen, asked where they had been made; and being answered, in England, he cried out, "O England! thou garden of delights, thou inexhaustible fountain of riches, from thee I never can exact too much;" and immediately despatched his bulls to several English abbots, commanding them to procure him some of these embroidered cloths and silks for his own dress. From the descriptions of these sacerdotal vestments in our ancient writers, they seem to have merited the admiration which they excited. Some of them (as we are informed by contemporary writers) were almost quite covered with gold and precious stones, and others adorned with the most beautiful figures of men, beasts, birds, trees, and flowers. It may not, however, be improper to suggest, that if these and other works, which appeared so exquisitely beautiful to the writers of this period, were now extant, it is probable that they would not excite so much admiration in the present age, when the arts are so much improved.

No art was more necessary, more cultivated, or more improved in Britain, in this period, than that of war. "The Normans," says William of Malmesbury "are a people who delight in war, and are unhappy when they are not engaged in some military operation. They excel in all the arts of attacking their enemies when their forces are sufficient; and, when these are defective, they are no less expert in military stratagems, and the arts of corruption by money."

The armies of Britain, and of all the nations of Europe, in the feudal times, consisted chiefly of cavalry, composed of earls, barons, knights, and others, who held their lands by knight's service, or of their substitutes. All these were obliged, by their tenures, to take the field when called upon by their sovereign, together with a certain number of knights, well mounted and properly armed, and to serve a certain number of days at their own expense, their lands being considered as their pay. As it often happened, that many who held lands by knights' service were superannuated, or infirm, or otherwise incapable of performing that service in person, they were permitted, or rather obliged, to perform it by proper substitutes. The clergy also, who possessed a great proportion of lands, for which they could not in person perform the military services, because they were prohibited by the canons, were subjected to the same necessity of performing these services by substitutes, that the national defence might be complete. As many of the wars of the kings of England, in this period, were carried on in Normandy and France, the personal performance of their military services became very inconvenient and expensive to the possessors of lands in England; which induced many of them to redeem these services by paying the tax called scutage. With the money arising from this tax, the kings engaged soldiers of fortune to perform the services. The cavalry, therefore, of the British armies, in this period, consisted of such earls, barons, and knights, as were able and willing to perform the military services for their lands in person, and of the substitutes of the clergy and others, either provided by themselves, or hired by the king. If all these, belonging to England, had been collected together, they would have formed a body of sixty thousand horsemen, as there were sixty thousand knights' fees in that kingdom.

The defensive armour of the British cavalry have been already described, except their shields, which they carried on their left arms, and with which they warded off the blows of their enemies. These shields were of an oval form, considerably broader at the top than at the bottom. Even the horses of some of the princes, earls, barons, and chief knights, were covered with armour of steel or iron. The offensive arms of the cavalry were, 1. Long spears, or lances, made of some light strong wood, as fir or ash, and pointed with steel, very sharp, and well tempered; 2. Long and broad swords, double-edged, and sharp-pointed; 3. A short dirk or dagger.

The infantry of the British armies of this period consisted of the freemen of the several British states, who did not hold lands of the sovereign by knights' service, but were possessors of property to a certain extent, for which they were obliged to contribute to the public defence. By the famous assize of arms made by Henry II., A.D. 1181, every freeman who was possessed of sixteen marks, either in land or goods, was obliged to provide the armour and weapons of a man at arms; and every freeman and burgess who possessed ten marks was obliged to provide the armour and arms of an ordinary foot-soldier. The defensive armour of a man at arms was a coat of mail, a helmet, and a shield; and his offensive weapons, a spear and a sword. The defensive armour of an ordinary foot-soldier was a wam-bois, or jacket twilted with cotton, and an iron skull-cap; his offensive arms, a spear, or a bow and arrows, or a sling, with a sword. These arms, by the same assize, were neither to be sold, nor pledged, nor seized for debt, nor any way alienated, but transmitted by every man to his heir; and if any one who possessed them was not capable of using them, he was obliged to provide one who was capable, when he was called into the field. By these politic regulations every man who had any valuable stake in the state was obliged to contribute to the public safety, and was constantly provided with the means of doing it.

Besides these national forces, there were, in this period, several bands of mercenary soldiers of fortune, who made a trade of war, and were occasionally taken into the pay of the kings of England. These were called by various names, as Ruptarii, Bragmanni, Coterelli, and most commonly Brabanzons, because many of them were natives of Brabant. They are painted by the historians of those times in the most odious colours, as a collection of desperate lawless ruffians, who lived by plunder when they were not employed in war. Stephen seems to have been the first English king who took these miscreants into his pay; and his example was imitated by his three successors, Henry II. Richard I. and John. But it was only in times of great confusion, when many of their own subjects had revolted, that our princes had recourse to such destructive auxiliaries. These troops of banditti, rather than of soldiers, became at length so terrible, especially to the clergy, that they were solemnly excommunicated by the third general council of Lateran, A.D. 1179, and a crusade was set on foot for their extermination. One Durand, a common carpenter, pretending to have received a commission from the Virgin Mary in a vision, A.D. 1182, put himself at the head of this crusade, and formed a military society for the destruction of the Brabanzons; which, after a long and bloody struggle, was accomplished.

The sovereign of every feudal state was, by the constitution, generalissimo or commander-in-chief of its forces; and all the British princes of this period performed that office in person, appearing constantly at the head of their armies. This was not altogether owing to the martial character of these princes, but was absolutely necessary to preserve some degree of discipline in armies composed of haughty independent barons and their followers. The constable, who was the highest military officer, commanded under the king, and, with the assistance of the marshal and his officers, superintended the musters, regulated the quarters, marches, and encampments; determined all disputes, and appointed the punishment of delinquents, according to martial law. Every earl commanded the troops of his county, and every baron those of his barony. All these offices or commands were hereditary; which, as John of Salisbury observes, was a defect in the military system of the middle ages, because by this means many persons were invested with offices of great importance, for which they were naturally unqualified. "In our time," says he, "military skill and discipline have much declined, and are almost quite destroyed; because many possess the highest offices, without having passed through the subaltern degrees; who are proud indeed of their commands and titles, but despise the most necessary qualifications. Young men who are gamesters, hunters, hawkers, and even natural fools, who have never handled arms, or acquired any knowledge of the arts of war, take upon them to act the part of generals."

The royal standard was considered as the centre of the whole army. In the day of battle it was carried by some great baron, who was standard-bearer of the kingdom, whose office was very honourable, and commonly hereditary. Henry de Essex was standard-bearer of England in the reign of Henry II., but in a battle against the Welsh, A.D. 1157, he was seized with a panic, and threw down the royal standard, on which the whole army concluded that the king was killed. Being tried for this crime, and convicted, he was condemned to lose his office, his fortune, and his life; which last was spared by the clemency of the king. Every earl and baron had his particular standard painted with the armorial ensigns of his family; and even bishops and abbots had also standards, with different devices, that accompanied their troops when they took the field. These standards served not only to distinguish one body of troops from another, and to be a centre of union to each, but they also contributed to animate the soldiers to fight with courage for their preservation; because to lose their standard was esteemed the greatest disgrace. The shapes and devices of these standards may be seen in Mr. Strutt's Regal and Ecclesiastical Antiquities of England, and his complete View of the Manners, &c. of England.

The several corps in the army had bands of martial music, which served to cheer them in their marches, to rouse and inflame their courage in battle, and to drown the cries and groans of the wounded. These martial musicians made use of various instruments, as horns, trumpets, drums, flutes, fifes, and heroins; the last of which are now unknown. The charge to battle was given by the sound of all the instruments of martial music in both armies, commonly accompanied with the shouts of martial songs of the combatants.

It is not to be imagined that any particular rule was fixed for the arrangement of the troops in the order of battle. This must at all times be liable to great variations, arising from the nature of the ground, the quality of the troops, the genius of the commanders, the dispositions of the enemy, and other circumstances. In general, however, the Normans seem to have drawn up their different kinds of troops in different lines, rather than to have formed them into one solid compact body, which was the most common method of the Anglo-Saxons. In the famous battle of Hastings, the different practice of the two nations was most conspicuous. King Harold formed his whole army into one solid body, which made a kind of castle, impenetrable on all sides, of which the royal standard was the centre. The duke of Normandy, on the contrary, drew up his army in three lines, according to the custom of his country. "In the first line," to use the words of a contemporary historian, who was a witness of what he relates, "he placed the foot, who were armed with bows and arrows, or with slings; in the second line he placed the heavy armed foot, who were defended with coats of mail; and in the third line he placed his cavalry, in which his chief strength consisted, and among whom he was in person." Agreeable to this disposition of the Norman army, the battle was begun by the first line, with a shower of arrows and stones from their bows and slings; which did considerable execution, but could not break the solid phalanx of their enemies, who repulsed them by throwing darts, javelins, and stones. The second line then advanced to the attack; and was in the same manner repulsed. At last the cavalry advanced in a deep and heavy body, and with their lances and swords made a most furious assault upon the English; who stood firm like a wall composed of shields and spears; and if they had not been tempted, by the pretended flight of their enemies, to depart from their original disposition, they would have been invincible. But though the above seems to have been the most common method used by the Normans in the arrangement of their troops, yet so many deviations from it occur in the descriptions of the battles fought in Britain and Normandy in this period, that they cannot be enumerated. In the famous battle of the Standard, for example, they adopted the Anglo-Saxon method, and formed their forces into one compact body, with the standard in the centre. In the great battle (to give only one example more) that was fought between Henry I. and the king of France at Brenneville in Normandy, A.D. 1119, a different disposition was made by Henry, who formed the first and second lines of cavalry, and the third of infantry.

Besides their lances, spears, darts, cross-bows, arrows, slings, which may be called the small arms of the middle ages, they had a kind of field-artillery which they used in battle. This artillery consisted of certain machines made of wood, which, by various contrivances, and combinations of the mechanic powers, threw darts and stones with great force to a great distance. Such machines were used with success in the famous battle of Hastings, and in several other battles. The darts that were shot from these machines, as well as from the cross-bows, were called quarrels, and were pointed with heavy pieces of steel, shaped like pyramids, and very sharp, which made them very destructive. This kind of artillery was more frequently used in sea-fights, than in battles on shore; and in these fights they discharged not only stones and darts, but also pots full of Greek-fire, quick lime, and other combustible materials.

As sea-fights have been mentioned, it may not be improper to give the following description of one that was fought in this period, between the Christian and Turkish fleets, before Ptolemais, translated from an author who was an eye witness of what he describes:—"Modern ships of war," says Geoffrey de Vinesauf, "are either galleys or galliots. Galleys are long, low, and narrow, with a beam extended from the prow, which is commonly called the spur, with which they pierce the ships of the enemy. Galliots have only one bank of oars, are much shorter, more easily wrought, and fitter for throwing fire. When both parties prepared for battle, our men drew up their ships, not in a straight line, but bending a little like a crescent, placing the strongest ships on the points, that if the enemy attempted to break our line, they might be surrounded. The sea was perfectly calm and smooth, as if it had been prepared for the occasion, that neither the rowers nor combatants might miss their strokes. The signal of battle was given by the sound of trumpets on both sides, followed by dreadful shouts and showers of darts. Our men, imploring the Divine assistance, plied their oars, and pushed the spurs of their galleys against the ships of their enemies. Now the battle raged.—Oars are entangled with oars,—grappling-irons fix one ship to another,—the combatants engage hand to hand,—and the boards are set on fire by a flaming oil, which is commonly called Greek-fire. This fire hath a most fetid smell, with livid flames, and consumes even flints and iron: water makes no impression upon it; a sprinkling of sand abates it; but it can only be extinguished by vinegar. O how terrible, how cruel, is a sea engagement! Some are tortured by fire,—some absorbed by the waves,—and others expire with wounds. One of our galleys was set on fire and boarded by the Turks. The rowers plunged into the sea, to save their lives by swimming; but a few knights, who were heavy-armed, fought in despair, slew all the Turks, and brought their galley half-burnt to land. In another of our galleys, the Turks seized the upper bank of oars, while the Christians kept possession of the lower, and by their pulling different ways, it was tossed in a miserable manner. In this engagement the Turks lost one galley and one galliot, with their crews, while we came off triumphant and victorious."

The Greek-fire, mentioned in the above description, seems to have been one of the most terrible instruments of destruction employed in military operations, before the invention of gunpowder. It was called Greek-fire, because it was invented by the Greeks of the Eastern empire, who, for several centuries, kept the composition of it a profound secret. In that period, the emperors of Constantinople used to send quantities of this fire to princes in friendship with them, as the most valuable present they could give them, and as the greatest mark of their favour. But the composition of this liquid fire, as it is sometimes called, seems to have been no longer a secret in the twelfth century, as it was then used in very great quantities, not only by the Christians of all nations in the Holy Land, but also by the Turks. It is said to have been a composition of sulphur, bitumen, and naphtha. It had a very strong and disagreeable smell, as we may easily suppose from its ingredients; burnt with a livid flame, and so intense a heat, that it consumed not only all soft combustible substances, but even stones and metals. When it fell in any considerable quantity, upon a warrior, it penetrated his armour, and peeled his flesh from his bones with exquisite pain, which made it an object of great terror. This liquid fire was kept in phials and pots, and in these was discharged from machines on the enemy. One of its most singular properties was, that it burnt in water, which did not in the least abate its violence; but it yielded to several other things, particularly to sand, urine and vinegar. For this reason, when an army made an assault, in which they expected to be opposed by Greek-fire, they provided themselves with these things for its extinction. "Greek-fire," says Geoffrey de Vinesauf, in describing an assault, "was discharged upon them from the walls of the castle and city, like lightning, and struck them with great terror; but they endeavoured to preserve themselves from it, by sand, vinegar, and other extinguishers."

As Britain abounded, in this period, in fortified towns and castles, much of the art of war consisted in defending and assaulting places of strength. The manner in which these fortifications were constructed has been already described. They were defended by discharges of the various kinds of small arms and artillery then in use, from the ramparts, and by counteracting all the arts and efforts of the besiegers. It would be a very tedious work to enumerate all the arts and all the machines that were employed in this period in assaulting and defending places. For as the combinations of the mechanic powers in forming engines for bursting open gates, undermining, scaling, and battering walls, throwing stones, darts, and fire, and for opposing all these efforts, are almost innumerable, great scope was given to the genius and invention both of the besiegers and besieged. The consequence of this was, that there were few sieges of great importance in which some new machine was not invented. Of these machines above twenty different kinds are mentioned by the writers of this period. But a plain description of a siege, given by a contemporary writer, will probably be more satisfactory to the reader, and give him a clearer idea of the means employed in attacking and defending places, than the most laborious investigation of the constructions and uses of all these machines. For this purpose I have chosen the relation given by an eye-witness of the siege of the castle of Exeter by King Stephen, A.D. 1136: "The castle of Exeter is built on a lofty mount, surrounded with impenetrable walls, strengthened with Cæsarean towers. In this castle Baldwin de Redvers placed a garrison composed of valiant youths, the flower of all England, to defend it against the king, to which he bound them by a solemn oath, and by putting under their protection his wife and children. When the king invested the castle, they mounted the walls in shining armour, and treated him and his army with scorn and defiance. Sometimes they sallied out from secret passages, when least expected, and put many of the besiegers to the sword; sometimes they poured down showers of arrows, darts, and other weapons on the assailants. On the other hand, the king and his barons laboured with the greatest ardour to distress the garrison. Having formed a very strong and well-armed body of foot, he assaulted the barbican, and, after a fierce and bloody struggle, carried it. He next beat down, with his engines, the bridge of communication between the castle and the town: after which he erected lofty towers of wood, with wonderful art, to protect his men, and enable them to return the discharges from the walls. In a word, he gave the besieged no rest, either day or night. Sometimes his men mounted on a machine supported by four wheels, approached the walls, and engaged hand to hand. Sometimes he drew up all the slingers of the army, and threw into the castle an intolerable shower of stones. Sometimes he employed the most skilful miners to undermine the foundations of the walls. He made use of machines of many different kinds; some of which were very lofty, for inspecting what they were doing within the castle; and others very low, for battering and beating down the walls. The besieged, making a bold and masterly defence, baffled all his machinations with the most astonishing dexterity and art." After this siege had lasted three months, and King Stephen had expended upon it, in machines, arms, and other things, no less than fifteen thousand marks, equal in efficacy to one hundred and fifty thousand pounds of our money, the besieged were obliged to surrender for want of water.

The History of the fine or pleasing arts of Sculpture, Painting, Poetry, and Music, in Great Britain, from 1066 to 1216.

MANKIND, in every stage of society, have some taste and capacity for the imitative and pleasing arts; and from the indulgence of that taste, and exertion of that capacity, they derive many of their most rational enjoyments. On this account, the state of these arts is an object worthy of attention in every period of the history of our country.

Sculpture, or the art of forming the figures of men, birds, beasts, &c. in metal, stone, wood, or other materials, flourishes most under the patronage of riches and superstition, among a wealthy people addicted to idolatry. As Britain was one of the richest countries of Europe, in the period we are now delineating, and its inhabitants were much addicted to a superstitious veneration for the image of their saints, we have good reason to believe that sculpture was much cultivated and encouraged. Every church had a statue of its patron saint, while cathedrals and conventual churches were crowded with such statues. We may form some judgment of the number of these statues in conventual churches from the following account given by Matthew Paris, of those that were erected in the abbey church of St. Alban's, by one Abbot:—"This Abbot William removed the ancient statue of the Virgin Mary, and placed it in another part of the church, erecting a new and more beautiful one in its room. He did the same with respect to the ancient crucifix, which stood aloft in the middle of the church, and another image of the Virgin Mary, that stood over the altar of St. Blasius, removing them into the north side of the church, and substituting others of more excellent workmanship in their places, for the edification and consolation of all the laity who entered. This abbot also set up a great crucifix with its images over the great altar." Some of these statues, if we may believe this historian, were executed in a very masterly manner. "It must be mentioned also," says he, "to the praise of Abbot William, that the new statue of the Virgin Mary, which he presented to our church, is admirably beautiful, having been made by Mr. Walter de Colchester, with the most exquisite art and skill."

Besides statues, the sculptors of this period executed many figures, and even historical pieces, in baso and alto relievo, or ornaments of churches, and objects of superstitious veneration. In the same abbey church of St. Alban's, we are told by the same historian, who was a monk of that abbey, there was a curious piece of this kind in wood, over the high altar:—"In the middle," says he, "of this piece, was a representation of the Divine Majesty, with that of a Christian church and of a Jewish synagogue. On one hand was a series of figures representing the twelve patriarchs, and on the other hand another series representing the twelve apostles." In a word, when architecture was cultivated with so much ardour, sculpture could not be neglected; and when so many noble and magnificent churches were built, artists could not be wanting to adorn and furnish them with images, which were esteemed so essential to the worship that was to be performed in these sacred structures.

The art of painting was never wholly lost in any of those countries of Europe, which had been provinces of the Roman empire. For though the barbarous conquerors of those countries destroyed many magnificent edifices and beautiful paintings, not a few of both escaped their ravages, and became the objects of their admiration. Some of these conquerors also, when the rage of war was at an end, discovered a taste for the fine arts, and became their patrons. Even the Anglo-Saxons, who were amongst the most destructive of the northern conquerors who overturned the Roman empire, did not continue long to despise the pleasing arts, particularly that of painting, which was practised by them with considerable success. But the Norman conquest contributed not a little to the improvement of the art of painting as well as of architecture, in Britain; for the Normans being as superstitious, and more magnificent than the Anglo-Saxons, they built more beautiful churches, and adorned them with a greater profusion of paintings. The roof, for example, of the cathedral church of Canterbury, built by Archbishop Lanfranc, was painted, if we may believe a contemporary author, in the most elegant manner. Aldred, archbishop of York, who put the crown on the head of William the Conqueror, added much to the magnitude and beauty of the church of St. John of Beverley. "He enlarged (says his historian) the old church, by adding a new presbytery, which he dedicated to St. John the Evangelist; and he adorned the whole roof, from the presbytery to the great tower, with the most beautiful paintings, intermixed with much gilding of gold, performed with admirable art." In a word, it seems to have been the constant custom of this period, to paint the inner roofs or ceilings of cathedrals and conventual churches; but of what kind these paintings were, and with what degree of delicacy they were executed, we have now no means of judging, as we cannot depend very much on the taste of the monkish writers of those times, who speak of them in the highest strains of admiration. It is, however, highly probable that these paintings were of the historical kind, the subjects of which were taken from the Scriptures: for Dudo of St. Quintin tells us, that Richard I., duke of Normandy, who died A.D. 1002, painted the inside of a magnificent church, which he built at Rouen, with historical paintings.

Portrait paintings appear to have been very common in this period; and it is probable that there were few kings, queens, or princes, who had not their pictures drawn. The learned Montfaucon has published prints of four pictures at full length, representing William the Conqueror, his Queen Matilda, and their two sons Robert and William. These pictures, which are believed by many to have been drawn from the life, were painted in fresco, on the walls of a chapel belonging to the abbey of St. Stephen at Caen, which was built A.D. 1064. They are thus described:—"The conqueror was drawn as a very tall man, clothed in a royal robe, and standing on the back of an hound couchant: on his head was a diadem, ornamented with trifolds; his left hand pointed to his breast, and in his right he held a sceptre surmounted with a fleur-de-lys. Queen Matilda was dressed in a kirtle and mantle, and had on her head a diadem similiar to that of her husband; from the under part whereof hung a veil, which was represented as falling carelessly behind her shoulders; in her right hand was a sceptre, surmounted with a fleur-de-lys, and in her left a book: her feet were supported by the figure of a lyon. Duke Robert was represented as standing on a hound, and clad in a tunique, over which was thrown a short robe or mantle: his head was covered with a bonnet; upon his right hand, clothed with a glove, stood a hawk, and in his left was a lure. The picture of Duke William represented him as a youth, bare-headed, dressed in the same habit as his brother, and standing on a fabulous monster: the left hand of this prince was clothed with a glove, and supported a falcon, which he was feeding with his right. These paintings are supposed to have been coeval with the foundation of the abbey of St. Stephen, and to have been drawn from the life." The learned Montfaucon says, "That these four pictures have all the air and appearance of originals."

There is an anecdote preserved by William of Malmshury, which seems to indicate that portrait painting was practised in great perfection in this period. A company of banditti in Flanders, who pretended to be adherents of Guibert the anti-pope, had formed a plot to intercept and rob Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, in his way to Rome, A.D. 1097. The archbishop having received intelligence of their design, escaped by means of a disguise. That he might not escape in the same manner on his return, the banditti sent an excellent painter to Rome to draw his picture so exactly, that they might know him under any disguise. Of this also the archbishop received intelligence; and was so much alarmed that he went a great way out of his road, to avoid the danger. About the same time the pope and clergy employed the art of painting in promoting a croisade for the recovery of the Holy Land, by sending certain irritating pictures to the courts of princes, and exposing them to the view of the people. In one of these pictures, Christ was represented tied to a stake, and scourged by an Arabian, supposed to be Mahomet; and in another an Arabian was painted on horseback, with his horse staling on the holy sepulchre. These pictures, it is said, excited the indignation both of princes and people, in a very high degree, and contributed not a little to their taking the cross.

Painting, in this period, was not confined to the use of the church, or to the portraits of great men, but was employed for various other purposes; particularly for ornamenting the apartments, furniture, shields, &c. of persons of rank and fortune. In the seventeenth of Henry III. a precept was directed to the sheriff of Hampshire, commanding him, "to cause the King's wainscotted chamber in the castle of Winchester to be painted with the same histories and the same pictures which it had been painted before." This is an authentic proof that wainscoting chambers, and painting the wainscot with historical paintings, was practised in England so long before the 17th of Henry III. A.D. 1233, that the paintings were so much faded or tarnished that they needed to be renewed. Peter de Blois, archdeacon of Bath and chaplain to Henry II., acquaints us, in one of his letters, that the great barons and military men of his time, had their shields and saddles painted with the representations of battles. In that letter he censures the vices, and particularly the ostentatious vanity, of these barons, with no little severity; and amongst other things, says, "They carry shields into the field so richly gilded, that they present the prospect of booty rather than danger to the enemy; and they bring them back untouched, and, as I may say, in a virgin state. They also cause both their shields and saddles to be painted with representations of battles and equestrian combats, that they may please their imaginations with the contemplation of scenes in which they do not choose to engage."

The art of painting glass was known and practised in France, and very probably in England, in this period. Father Montfaucon has given several plates of the paintings in the windows of the abbey of St. Dennis that were painted in the twelfth century, particularly a representation of the progress of the first croisade, in ten compartments. This art, it is believed, was brought into England in the reign of King John.

There was a kind of miniature painting much practised in Britain in this period, and of which many curious specimens are still remaining. This was called illuminating (from which limning is derived); and was chiefly used as we now use copperplates, in illustrating and adorning the Bible and other books. This art was much practised by the clergy, and even by some in the highest stations in the church:—"The famous Osmond (says Brompton), who was consecrated bishop of Salisbury A.D. 1076, did not disdain to spend some part of his time in writing, binding, and illuminating books." Mr. Strutt hath given the public an opportunity of forming some judgment of the degree of delicacy and art with which these illuminations were executed, by publishing prints of a prodigious number of them in his two works. In the first of these works, we are presented with the genuine portraits in miniature, of all the kings, and several of the queens, of England, from Edward the Confessor to Henry VII., mostly in their crowns and royal robes, together with the portraits of many other eminent persons of both sexes.

The illuminators and painters of this period seem to have been in possession of a considerable number of colouring materials, and to have known the arts of preparing and mixing them, so as to form a great variety of colours. In the specimens of their miniature-paintings that are still extant, we perceive not only the five primary colours, but also various combinations of them. There is even some appearance that they were not ignorant of the art of painting in oil, from the following precept of Henry III., dated only twenty-three years after the conclusion of this period:—"Pay out of our treasury to Odo the goldsmith, and Edward his son, one hundred and seventeen shillings and ten pence, for oil, varnish, and colours bought, and pictures made, in the chamber of our queen at Westminster, between the octaves of the Holy Trinity, in the twenty-third year of our reign, and the feast of St. Barnabas the apostle, in the same year, which is fifteen days." This was a considerable sum (equal in quantity of silver to seventeen pounds fourteen shillings of our money, and in efficacy to eighty-eight pounds,) to be expended in painting one chamber in so short a time.

As the Normans were more learned, and no less fond of poetry than the Anglo-Saxons, that most pleasing and delightful art, especially Latin poetry, was cultivated with no less ardour, and with greater success, in this than in the former period. On this account it may be proper to pay a little more attention to this than to any of the other arts.

The vernacular language of England, in this period, was in such an imperfect and unsettled state, that it was hardly fit for transacting the common business of society, and very improper for the sublime and melodious strains of poetry. No sciences were taught, few letters were written, few accounts were kept, few treatises in prose, on any subject, were composed in that language. But so strong a propensity to poetry prevailed, that a prodigious number of poems on different subjects, and in various kinds of verse, were written in that crude unformed tongue. Many of our best poets indeed in this period, sensible of the imperfection of their native language, wrote their poems in Latin, and some in the Romance or Provençal tongue. This makes it necessary to give a very brief account: first, of the English; second, of the Latin; and third, of the Provençal poetry of this period.

As many of the poets of this period were clerks and monks, many of their poems were on religious subjects. Of this kind is a translation of the Old and New Testaments into English verse, supposed to have been made before the year 1200—a version of the psalms, made about the same time—and a large volume of the lives of the saints. The only specimen of these poems our limits can admit is the following version of the hundredth psalm:—

Mirthes to God al erthe that es
Serves to Louerd in fainer.
In go yhe ai in his siht,
In gladnes that is so briht

Whites that louerd god is he thus
He us made and our self noht us,
His folk and shep of his fode:
In gos his yhates that are gode:
In schrift his worches belive,
In ympnes to him yhe schrive.
Heryhes his name for Louerde is hende
In all his merci do in strende and strande.

The minstrels of those times had a set of songs of a religious cast, and on religious subjects, which they sung to their harps, in the courts of kings, and in the halls of barons, on Sundays, instead of those on love and war, and such subjects, which they sung on other days. The following lines are the exordium of one of these Sunday-songs:—

The Visions of Seynt Pout won he was rapt into Paradys.

Lusteneth lordynges leof and dere,
Ze that wolen of the Sondag here:
The Sondag a day hit is
That angels and archangels join i wis,
More in that ilke day
Than any odur, &c.

The monks and other clerical poets of this period, composed many short hymns, in various kinds of verse. The following stanza of one of these hymns may serve as a specimen. The subject of it is our Saviour's crucifixion:—

I syke when y singe for sorewe that y se
When y with wypinge bihold upon the tre,
Art se Jhesu the suete
Is hert blod for lete,
For the love of me;
Ys woundes waxen wete,
Thei wepen, still and mete,
Marie reweth me.

Religion was not the only subject of the English poetry of this period. Love, the favourite theme of many poets, produced its share of verses. The following little poem, in which the poet compares his mistress to a great variety of gems and flowers, may serve as a specimen of this kind of poetry, and of that alliteration which was esteemed a great beauty in this period:—

Ic hot a burde in a bour, ase beryl so bryght,
Ase saphyr in selver semely on syght,
Ase jasje the gentil that lemeth with lyght,
Ase gernet in golde and rubye well ryht,
Ase onycle he is only holden on hyht:
Ase a diamand the dere in day when he is dyht.
He is a coral yend with Cayser and knyght,
Ase emeraude a morewen this may haveth myht.
The myht of the margaryte haveth this mai mere,
Ffor charbocele iche hire chase bi chyn and bi chere,
Hire rede ys as rose that red ys on ryse,
With lilye whyte leves lossum he ys,
The primros he passeth, the penenke of prys,
With alisaundre thareto ache and anys:
Coynte as columbine such hire cande as,
Glad under gore in gro and in grys
Heo is blosme upon bleo brightest under bis
With celydone ant sange as thou thy self sys,
From Weye he is wisist into Wyrhale,
Hire nome is in a note of the nyghtigale;
In a note is hire nome nampneth hit non
Who so ryht redeth ronne to Johon.

Several satirical poems appear among the remains of the English poetry of this period. Some of these are general satires against monks, bishops, lawyers, physicians, and people of other professions. That part of a very curious satire against monks, in which the author lashes them for their incontinence, may serve as an example of this kind of poetry.

After the satirist had described the delightful situation, magnificent fabric, and great provision of meats and drinks of an abbey, with the indolence, gluttony, and drunkenness of its monks, he proceeds thus:—

An other abbai is ther bi
For soth a great nunnerie ;
Up a river of swet milk
Whar is plente grete of silk.
When the summeris dai is hote,
The yung nunnes takith a bote,
And doth ham forth in that river
Both with oris and with stere :
Whan hi beth fur from the abbei
Hi makith him naked for to plei,
And leith dune into the brimme
And doth him sleilich for to swimme
The yung monkes that hi seeth
Hi doth ham up, and forth he fleeth,
And comith to the nunnes anon,
And euch monk him takith on,
And snellich berith forth har prei
To the mochill grei abbei,
And techith the nonnes an oreisun
With jambleus up and dun.
The munke that wol be stalun gode,
And can set a riyt his hode,
He schal hab withoute danger
xii wives each yer,
Al throy riyt and noyt throy grace,
For to do himself solace
And thilk monk that clepeth best
And doth his likam all to rest,
Of him is hope, God hit wote,
To be sone vader abbot.

It was far from being safe at this time to write satirical verses against particular persons, especially against those in power. As in the instance of Henry I., and Luke de Barra: the particulars of which have been given in the reign of that monarch.

But though the kings and great men of those times were thus impatient of satire, they were fond enough of panegyrics; which produced poems of that kind in great abundance. The famous William Longchamp, bishop of Ely, chancellor and chief justiciary of England, the pope's legate, and the great favourite of Richard I. (if we may believe his brother Hugh Nunant, bishop of Chester), "kept a number of poets in his pay, to make songs and poems in his praise; and allured the best singers and minstrels by great gifts, to come over from France, and sing these songs in the streets of the several cities of England." Matilda, queen of Henry I., was so generous, or rather so profuse a patroness of poets, that they crowded to her court from all parts to present her with their panegyrics. So much were the muses both courted and dreaded by the great in this period.

Among the remains of the English poetry of the twelfth century, are several elegiac, pastoral, and descriptive poems; but for specimens of these, we must refer the reader to the very able work of Warton on English poetry, to which we have been so much indebted in this article.

The unsettled state of the English language fluctuating between the Norman spoken by one part of the people, and the Saxon by another, was, no doubt, one reason why the Latin language was studied with so much ardour in England in this period; and that not only our divines, philosophers, and historians, but also many of our poets, wrote in that language. Several learned men, whom we have already mentioned for their other works, were excellent Latin poets, and in that capacity claim a little of our attention.

Henry of Huntingdon, the historian, was also a voluminous Latin poet, and wrote several books of epigrams and love-verses, and a poem upon herbs. This we are told by himself, in the conclusion of his curious letter on the contempt of the world. His invocation of Apollo, and the goddesses of Tempe, in the exordium of his poem on herbs, may serve as a specimen of his poetry:—

Vatum magne parens, herbarum Phœbe repertor, Vosque, quibus resonant Tempe jocosæ, Deæ!
Si mihi sarta prius hederæ florentæ parastis,
Ecce meos flores sarta paratæ, fero.

The famous John of Salisbury was not only well acquainted with the best Roman poets, as appears from the numerous quotations from them in his works, but was himself no contemptible Latin poet. His poem prefixed to his book, De nugis curialium, is equally elegant and witty. It is an address to his book, containing many directions for its conduct.

Eadmer, William of Malmsbury, Peter of Blois, Girald Barry, and several others of whom we have already given some account, have left proofs of their proficiency in Latin poetry, as well as in other parts of learning; but extracts from their works would swell this section beyond its due proportion. It will be more proper to take a little notice of a very few of the Latin poets of this period, who addicted themselves chiefly to poetry, and who have not yet been mentioned.

John Hanvill, or Hautvill, a monk of St. Alban's, flourished towards the end of the twelfth century, and was far from being a contemptible Latin poet. His chief work was a kind of moral heroic poem, in nine books, the hero of which he calls Architrieni, who travelled over the world, and every where found reason to lament the follies, vices, and miseries of mankind. He dedicated this work to his great friend and patron Walter de Constans, who was made bishop of Lincoln, A.D. 1183. Besides his Architrieni, he wrote a volume of Latin epigrams, epistles, and smaller poems, which (as an excellent judge who perused them declares), have considerable merit.

Josephus Iscanus, Joseph of Exeter, was the prince of Latin poets, in this period we are now examining, and wrote two heroic poems. The Trojan war was the subject of one of these poems, which consisted of six books, and was dedicated to Baldwin archbishop of Canterbury. The subject of the other, which was called Antiocheis, was the croisade, in which his sovereign Richard I., and his patron Archbishop Baldwin were engaged. Of the beauty and excellence of the first of these poems we have an opportunity of judging, because it is still extant, and has been published. "Warton says, 'the diction is generally pure, the periods round, and the numbers harmonious; and, on the whole, the structure of the versification approaches nearly to that of polished Latin poetry.'" It is hardly possible to dip into any part of this poem, which consists of no fewer than three thousand six hundred and forty-six lines, without finding passages that will justify this favourable opinion of its merit. The Antiocheis is unhappily lost, except a small fragment, in which the ancient heroes of Britain are celebrated in a strain not unworthy of the Mantuan bard.

Alexander Necham was another elegant Latin poet, who flourished in England at the same time with Joseph of Exeter. He was born and educated at St. Alban's, as appears from some of his verses.

Walter Mapes, the jovial and witty archdeacon of Oxford, and chaplain to Henry II., was a good Latin poet, and a voluminous writer. His poems were chiefly of a satirical or festive strain, and in the rhyming kind of verses, commonly called Leonine, which were much used by the minor poets of those times.

Among the English monks of this period, there were many smart satirical epigrammatists; a considerable number of their epigrams, which are far from being contemptible, are still preserved.

Latin elegies and epitaphs were written upon almost all the kings, princes, prelates, and other eminent persons who died in England in this period; and not a few of these performances approach to classical purity of diction. In a word, every kind of Latin poetry was cultivated by the clergy and monks of the 12th century, with a degree of success that will hardly be credited by those who are not acquainted with their writings.

The language which the Normans brought with them into England, was that which was called lingua Romana, or the Romance language, which was the vulgar tongue of all the provinces of France in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. In this language the Normans had already composed many poems and songs, one of which was sung by the champion Taillifer, at the head of the Norman army, before the battle of Hastings, as we learn from the following lines of Master Wace, an Anglo-Norman poet of this period:—

Taillifer, qui moult bien chantoit,
Sur un cheval qui tost alloit,
Devant eus alloit chantant
De l'Allemagne et de Rollant,
Et d'Oliver, et de Vassaux,
Que moururent a Rainschevaux

It was in this lingua Romana, or Romance tongue, (the daughter of the Latin, and mother of the French,) that many metrical romances were composed by the French and Normans of the eleventh and twelfth centuries: and it was from the language in which they were written, rather than from the extravagant fables which they commonly contained, that these poems were called Romances. In the exordium of a metrical life of Tobiah, written by a monk at the desire of the abbot of Kenilworth, the language in which it is composed is called the Roman or Romance:—

Le prior Gwilleyme me prie,
De l'eglyse seynte Marie
De Kenelworth an Ardenne,
Ki porte le plus haute peyne
De charite, ke nul eglyse
Del reaume a devyse
Ke jeo liz en romaunz le vie
De kelui ki ont nun Tobie, &c.

Some of the French and Norman poets of this period pretended, at least, that their poems were true histories, though they gave them the title of Romances, on account of the language in which they were written. Of this kind was the long historical poem of Maister Robert Wace, chaplain to Henry II., which is sometimes called Roman de Rois d'Angleterre, and sometimes Roman le Rou, et les vies des Ducs de Normandie. Robert de Brunne, in the prologue to his translation of one of these metrical historical poems, written by an Anglo-Norman, says the language of his original was called Romance:—

Frankis spech is cald Romance,
So sais clerkes and men of France.
Pers of Langtoft, a chanon
Schaven in the house of Bridlyngton
On Frankis style this storie he wrote
Of Inglis kings, &c.

Many of these poems, which were originally written in Romance, because it was the language of their authors, and of the court and nobility, to whom they were addressed, were soon after translated into the English of those times, for the entertainment of the native English, who were called lewed, i. e. ignorant men. This is the motive assigned by Robert de Brunne for his translating one of these poems:—

For lewed men I undyrtoke,
In Englyshe tongue to make this boke:
For many beyn of such manere
That talys and rymys wyle bleihty here.

The Provençal poets were very famous in the twelfth and thirteen centuries, not only in their own, but in several neighbouring countries. They were called Troubadours, or Finders, from the fertility of their invention; and were in reality the fathers of modern poetry. No poets were ever more loved, admired, and cherished than these Provençal bards. They were invited to the courts of the greatest princes, where they became the delight of the brave, and the favourites of the fair, by celebrating the achievements of the one, and the charms of the other, in their poems. In a word, the admiration which they acquired was so flattering, that several sovereign princes became Troubadours, and wrote poems in the Provençal language, which was then the most perfect of all the modern languages of Europe. Richard I. of England was one of these royal songsters; some of whose poems, in the Provençal tongue, are still extant; and one of them has been published in the "Catalogue of the Royal and Noble Authors of England." The first stanza of that poem, which was composed in prison in Germany, with a translation, is all the specimen of this kind of poetry that our limits will admit:—

Ja nus hom pris non dira sa raison, Adreitament se com hom dolent non.
Ma per conort pot il faire chanson.
Pro a d'amis, mas poure son li don.
Ontai i auron se por ma reezon,
Sois fait dos yver pris.

No prisoner his condition can explain,
But he will fall into a plaintive strain.
Yet to divert his sorrows he may sing,
Though he have friends, how poor the gifts they bring!
Shame be on them! my ransom they deny,
And I in prison two long winters lie.

[The following remarks are from Sharon Turner's "History of England during the middle ages."]

On the Origin and Progress of Rime in the Middle Ages.

As rime has become the principal characteristic of all English poetry but the dramatic, in which it cannot be successfully naturalized, it deserves a more enlarged consideration.

Of all the forms of modern poesy, though other metrical modes of verse have been tried, and with grand and pleasing effect, yet rime appears to have been the most universally liked, the most frequently praised, and the most abundantly practised. Rhythm, cadence, and metre, may exist without it; but with all these it associates, and adds to them its own peculiar pleasurable-ness; and therefore, in its most perfect composition may be said to present the most perfect versification of English poetry. It is a sovereign which admits of viceroys, companions and allies, but which seems to claim to itself the superior throne, and to have the power of giving to poetry an elegance, a melody, a strength, an intonation, a sweetness, and yet also a pathos and a grandeur, which its absence lessens, and which no substitute can so completely supply.

As its effects greatly impress, its principle, like that of all verbal cadence and rhythm, must be deeply seated in the human mind. There is a charm in peculiar collocations and sequences, and in the consonancies of words, which the cultivated taste as sensibly feels, and with a gratification as agreeable as the duly organized and accustomed ear perceives and relishes the harmonies of musical sound. This mysterious effect upon our minds has always formed one of the sweetest enchantments of poetry. What that music of the soul is, which, independently of audible sound, can be awakened and pleased by unknown sympathies with the measured order of selected words and syllabic prosody, we have yet to discover; but that there are some fine chords of melodious sensibility within us, the universal gratification experienced from peculiar combinations of syllables, well-cadenced prose, and the metres and consonancies of poetry, impressively indicates. It does not depend upon the ear, because the mind perceives and enjoys the grateful beauty without the use of any organical vocality. The effect is, an intellectual sensation without the instrumentality of sense; and this implies, that there must be something responsive to it in the intellect, which occasions the feeling, and makes that feeling so generally delectable. But, however it originates, it comes in various shapes, and is producible by many verbal arrangements. The ending cadence of the hexameter suited the language and delighted the nations of Greece and Rome. The pentameter, which is less rhythmical to us, was yet pleasing to the latter. Their lyrical prosodies had also melodious agencies on their accordant sensibilities, which we cannot adequately enjoy. Instead of these, each of the vernacular tongues of Europe has found and formed from its separate capabilities, positions of words, time, measure, succession, and combination of syllables, modes of enunciation, pauses, flow and cadences of phrase, and connected resemblances of terminal sounds, which constitute the various species of poetical versification, that every nation has appropriated to itself, and loves and cherishes with intellectual delight. Among these, rime has been our property from the era of the Norman conquest; we have withdrawn it, almost without a dissentient voice, from the colloquial poetry of the stage; but we have attached it to every other department of the muse, with a perseverance of approving taste, which no censuring denunciation of it, as the invention of barbarian times, has persuaded us to discontinue.

It is true that it is barbaric to us in its chronology; but it is not barbaric in its primeval ancestry or its mental operation. It certainly came into English composition amid the movements and from the nations of the grand Gothic stem, who broke up the Roman empire, and who introduced the feudal system; the duel, the ordeal, the common law, the jury and the parliament. So far, therefore, like these, it comes from a barbaric lineage; but there is no more reason to brand it as a rude barbarism, a pleasing contagion, or a degrading deterioration, unless all the intellectual improvements which have flowed upon us from the new fountains of mind and pursuits that were opened by our Gothic forefathers, are to be considered as barbarian innovations.

But rime cannot have had a barbarian origin, because rime is one of the chief poetical forms and graces of the most ancient, the first cultivated, and once most civilized nations and languages of the world. That it was one of the greatest characteristics of the ancient eastern poetry, and abounds in the Sanscrit and Chinese, in the Arabic, and in the Persian, and that it existed in the Hebrew and ancient Carthaginian, was shown in a former essay. Some of these nations or their ancestors were the primeval stocks of all the civilization and literary mind of the ancient world; and as rime was unquestionably used by them, we may justly infer, that from them it has descended to their branches and descendants.

That the Keltic and Kimmerian tribes entered Europe and its islands from Asia, and were therefore ramifications of the great Oriental trunk, has been shown in the History of the Anglo-Saxons; of these, the Cymry, or the Welsh, were descendants, as well as the Irish and the Gaelic nations; and among all these people, rime has been an inseparable addition to their poetical compositions; unlike in this respect to the Saxons, who used metre and cadence, without rime, in their poetical effusions. All the remains of the ancient Welsh poetry composed in the fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries, uniformly exhibit the riming terminations. That rime, though not made the characteristic of the cultivated poetry of the Greeks and Romans, was yet not unknown to them, I attempted to prove, not only from its forming one of the figures of rhetorical and poetical diction particularized by their critical writers on elocution, but from the instances of it which were traced from their compositions, and which seemed not to be casual. It was shown decidedly, that it was used in the Latin popular poetry in the fourth century; and an instance, which I was fortunate enough to find in Aldhelm's works, that had escaped the notice of preceding inquirers, demonstrated that it was known in England in the beginning of the seventh century, and was then used in his Latin poems by his venerated ecclesiastic. The instances which I also adduced from poems of Boniface and his friends, soon after Aldhelm, confirmed this certain chronology of its existence.

In times when poetry was so much cultivated, we may be certain, that music could not be neglected, especially when we consider, that the union between these two arts was much greater in those times than it is at present. For in the middle ages, almost all the poets of France and England, like the ancient bards of Gaul and Britain, were musicians, and sung their verses to the music of their harps. These poetical musicians, commonly called minstrels, were the delight of princes, prelates, and barons, who entertained them in their courts and castles, and lavished upon them much of their wealth. Matilda, queen of Henry I., was so fond of music, and so profusely generous to musicians and poets, that she expended almost all her revenues upon them, and even oppressed her tenants, in order to procure money to reward them for their songs. John of Salisbury censures the great people of his time, for imitating Nero in his extravagant fondness for musicians; and says, that "they prostituted their favour, by bestowing it on minstrels and buffoons; and that, by a certain foolish and shameful munificence, they expended immense sums of money on their frivolous exhibitions." "The courts of princes," says another contemporary writer, "are filled with crowds of minstrels, who extort from them gold, silver, horses, and vestments, by their flattering songs. I have known some princes who have bestowed on these ministers of the devil, at the very first word, the most curious garments, beautifully embroidered with flowers and pictures, which had cost them twenty or thirty marks of silver, and which they had not worn above seven days." An art that was so highly honoured, and so liberally rewarded, could not fail to flourish.

Both the vocal and instrumental music of this period was of three kinds, viz. sacred, civil, and martial. Of the last, enough has been already said. Of the state of the other two it may be proper to give a very brief account.

Sacred or church music was cultivated with great ardour by the British clergy of all ranks in this period, both because it attracted the people to the church, and because it rendered the performance of the public service more agreeable to themselves. The Anglo-Norman clergy, in particular, applied with much diligence and success to this delightful art: of which it may not be improper to give one example, out of many that might be given. Thomas, the first Norman archbishop of York who was advanced to that see by William the Conqueror, A.D. 1070, was one of the most pious and learned prelates of the age in which he flourished. Having a fine voice, and a great taste for music, he made that art his particular study, and attained to great perfection in it, both in theory and practice. He composed many pieces of music for the use of his cathedral, in a grave, solemn, manly style, avoiding all light effeminate airs, as unsuitable to the nature of religious worship. When he heard any of the secular minstrels sing a tune which pleased him, he adopted and formed it for the use of the church, by some necessary variations. "There was nothing," says one of his historians, "which Archbishop Thomas studied so much as to have a good and virtuous clergy in his cathedral. With them he sometimes read, sometimes disputed, sometimes sung, or played upon the organ: he even spent some of his leisure hours in making organs, and in teaching his clergy to make them, and to set hymns both in prose and verse to music." When so great and learned a prelate employed so much time in the study and practice of church-music, and was so highly commended for it, we have reason to think that it was an object of great and general attention among the clergy.

The invention of the new musical scale, or modern gamut, by an Italian monk named Guido Aretine, a native of Arezzo, about A.D. 1022, contributed not a little to increase the ardour of the clergy in their application to music, by facilitating the acquisition of musical knowledge. This invention made a mighty noise in the church at that time. The author of it was sent for thrice to Rome, to explain and teach it to the clergy of that city. Aretine, in a letter to the pope, affirms, that any person, by the help of his invention, may make as great proficiency in music in one year, as before he could have made in ten. He insinuates to his holiness, that he had been inspired by Heaven with this happy thought, which had atoned for all his sins, and secured the salvation of his soul. There is no room to doubt that this invention was well known to Archbishop Thomas, who had spent some time at Rome soon after his elevation to the see of York, and that it was by this scale that he and the other English composers of this period regulated their musical compositions.

The church-music of Britain did not continue long in the grave and solemn style. Before the end of the twelfth century it had lost the primitive simplicity of plain song, and become soft, effeminate, and artificial, in a very high degree. Of this change in the church-music of his time, John of Salisbury thus complains: "This soft effeminate kind of music has even debased the dignity, and stained the purity of religious worship. For in the very presence of God, and in the centre of his sanctuary, the singers endeavour to melt the hearts of the admiring multitude with their effeminate notes and quavers, and with a certain wanton luxuriancy of voice. When you hear the soft and sweet modulations of the choristers; some leading, others following; some singing high, others low; some falling in, others replying; you imagine you hear a concert of sirens, and not of men; and admire the wonderful flexibility of their voices, which cannot be equalled by the nightingale, the parrot, or any other creature, if there be any other more musical. Such is their facility in rising and falling, in quavering, shaking, and trilling, in blending and tempering all the different kinds of sounds, that the ear loses its capacity of distinguishing, and the mind, overpowered with so much sweetness, cannot judge of the merit of what it hears. When they have thus far departed from the bounds of moderation, they are more apt to excite unhal- lowed passions than devout affections in the hearts of men." Though this music was certainly very much misplaced when it was introduced into the church, yet, if it really answered the description which is here given of it, we cannot entertain a very contemptible opinion, either of the skill of the composers, or of the ability of the performers.

By civil music is to be understood that which was in common use in civil society, for alleviating the cares and labours of the poor, and exhilarating the festivities of the rich. The minstrels, a very numerous and much-respected order of men, were the professors and practitioners of this pleasing art, from their excellence in which they derived all their honours and advantages. Not being under the same restraint with the composers for the church, they indulged their imaginations, and invented tunes of many different kinds, from the most slow and solemn, to the most quick and joyous.

In general, as we are told by Giraldus Cambrensis, the genius of the English music was slow and grave, whilst that of the Scotch, Irish, and Welsh music, was quick and gay. The same writer expresses great surprise at the masterly execution of these three last nations on the harp: "It is wonderful, that in such quick and rapid motions of the fingers any musical proportion is preserved, and that without violating any of the rules of art, the music is rendered harmonious, in the midst of warbling, and intricate modulations, by sounds, rapid yet sweet, unequal yet proportioned, discordant yet consonant, and the harmony is completed, whether they play upon fourth or fifths. They always begin upon B flat, and return upon the same, which makes the whole uniformly sweet and sonorous. They begin and end their modulations with so much delicacy, and intermix the sounds of the bass strings, with the wanton and sportive tinklings of the treble, in such a manner that, by the excellency of their art, they even conceal their art. Hence it is that those who are intimately acquainted with the theory of music are penetrated and transported with delight, while those who are ignorant of the rules of art are apt to be teased and wearied with what appears to them a confused and noisy jumble of discordant sounds."

From the account which is given by the same writer, of the manner in which the people of Wales, and the north of England, sung their songs, it seems to be very evident that they were not unacquainted with the laws, or at least with the practice of harmony, or counter-point: "In Wales," says he, "they do not sing in one uniform musical modulation, as in other places, but in several different tones or modulations, in so much that in a company of singers you hear almost as many different parts as there are voices, all forming one pleasing delightful harmony in B flat. The English also, in the country about York, and beyond the Humber, use a similar symphonious harmony in singing, consisting only of two parts, the one, the deep murmuring bass, the other, the high and sweet-sounding treble."

The chief, if not the only instrument that was used in sacred music, was the organ. We have already heard of a great and learned prelate, and his clergy, who spent some part of their time in making these instruments, which indicates that they were esteemed necessary at least in cathedral churches. The figures of two organs, of this period, differing considerably in their structure from one another, and from those now in use, may be seen in Mr. Strutt's "View of the Manners, &c." In civil music, if we may believe Giraldus Cambrensis, the Scots, Irish, and Welsh, used but few instruments: "The Irish," says that author, "use only two musical instruments, the harp and the timbrel; the Scots use three, the harp, the timbrel, and the bag-pipe; the Welsh also use three, the harp, the pib-corn, and the bag-pipe. The Irish harps have brass strings. It is the opinion of many, that the Scotch music at present not only equals, but even very much excels the Irish; for which reason they go to Scotland as to the fountain-head of perfection in that art." The English seem to have been acquainted with a greater variety of musical instruments, some of which, it is probable, were introduced by the Normans. The violin is mentioned in books written in this period, and represented in illuminations. Some of their violins had five strings. Mr. Strutt has collected from illuminations, the figures of no fewer than sixteen different kinds of musical instruments, if some of the figures do not represent different sizes of the same instrument. The harp, however, seems to have been the favourite and most admired instrument of the English, as well as the other British nations in this period. That was the instrument to the sound of which the minstrels, the admired musicians of this period, sung their songs and poems.

SECTION III.

The history of Commerce, Coin, and Shipping, in Great Britain, from the landing of William duke of Normandy, 1066, to the death of King John, 1216.

No apology is necessary for introducing the history of commerce into the history of Britain, which has derived so many advantages from that source. But it is much to be regretted, that genuine authentic materials, for executing this part of my plan in this period to the entire satisfaction of the reader, are very difficult, if not impossible, to be collected. All our ancient historians being monks, they paid little attention to the affairs of trade, and dropped only a few incidental hints on this important subject. Let us attend to the information which these hints convey.

It is sufficiently well known,—that the foreign trade of Britain was almost annihilated by the departure of the Romans,—that it continued in a very languid state in the times of the heptarchy,—that it gradually revived after the establishment of the English monarchy,—and that towards the end of the last period it was not inconsiderable. This last circumstance is confirmed by the testimony of a contemporary historian, William of Poictou, who was chaplain to the duke of Normandy, and attended him in his expedition into England. "The English merchants add to the opulence of their country, rich in its own fertility, still greater riches, and more valuable treasures, by importation. These imported treasures, which were considerable both for their quantity and quality, were either to have been hoarded up to gratify their avarice, or to have been dissipated to satisfy their luxurious inclinations. But William seized them, and bestowed part of them on his victorious army, and part of them on churches and monasteries. To the pope and church of Rome he sent an incredible mass of money in gold and silver, and many ornaments that would have been admired even at Constantinople."

It has been disputed, whether the Norman conquest was an event favourable or unfavourable to the foreign commerce of Britain. The truth seems to be, that in some respects it was, and in others it was not favourable. Every violent revolution must give a temporary check to commerce, by fixing the attention of all the members of society on other objects, and by rendering property precarious. The feudal form of government that was established in England soon after the conquest, had more of a martial than of a mercantile spirit in it; and was better calculated for defending a kingdom by arms, than for enriching it by commerce. The Conqueror himself having obtained his crown, and the great Norman barons their princely fortunes, by the sword, arms became the most honourable and lucrative profession; trade was held in little estimation, and those who were engaged in it, were exposed to many injuries. Many of the chief towns in England, the greatest seats of trade, suffered much between the conquest, and the time when Domesday-book was composed. In all these respects the conquest was unfriendly to commerce, and obstructed its progress for some time.

But, on the other hand, the conquest contributed to increase the trade of England in several ways, after the disorder inseparable from such revolutions was at an end. It opened a free communication with Normandy, and afterwards with several other rich provinces of France, which came under the dominion of our Anglo-Norman kings; and this soon produced a brisk and constant trade between England and these provinces. It made also a very great addition both to the ships and sailors of England, which are the chief instruments of foreign trade. For William was so far from burning the fleet in which he brought his army into England, as some modern writers have affirmed, that his first care was to erect fortifications for its protection. The frequent expeditions of the Conqueror and his successors to the continent, obliged them to give constant attention to trade and maritime affairs

The settlement of the Jews in England about the time of the conquest, brought great sums of money into the kingdom, and contributed to increase both internal and foreign commerce, in which they were constantly employed.

It is quite unnecessary to spend any time in delineating the internal trade of Britain in this period, as there was little or nothing remarkable in the manner in which it was conducted. Fairs and markets, which are the principle scenes of internal commerce, continued to be held in many places on Sundays, in spite of all the canons that had been made against it. This was one of the abuses which the famous preacher Eustace, abbot of Flay, in Normandy, came over into England to correct, A. D. 1200; and he was so successful, that he prevailed upon the people of London, and of several other towns, not to hold their markets on Sundays. But we are informed by one of our best historians, that some of these towns soon after returned to their former practices.

To prevent any degree of obscurity or confusion in our delineation of the foreign trade of Britain in this period, it may be proper to consider the following particulars in the order in which they are here mentioned. 1. The chief seats of trade;—2. The most valuable articles of exports and imports;—3. The persons by whom it was conducted;—4. Laws and regulations respecting trade;—5. Shipping;—6. Coin;—7. The comparative value of money, prices of commodities, and expense of living;—8. The balance of trade

London was unquestionably the chief seat of trade in this, as it had been in the former period. Situated on the noble river Thames, at no great distance from the sea, amidst the most fertile plains of this island, it enjoyed every advantage for importing the commodities of other countries, and exporting those of Britain in return. These advantages were not neglected by its citizens, who were much addicted to trade, and acquired so much wealth and influence by it, that they were called barons, and respected in public assemblies of the kingdom, as possessing a kind of nobility. "London," says William of Malmsbury, "is about twenty-five miles distant from Rochester. It is a noble city, renowned for the riches of its citizens, and crowded with merchants, who come from all countries, and particularly from Germany, with merchandise." In this city," says William Fitz-Stephen, in his description of London, "merchants from all nations under heaven reside, for the sake of trade." The great multitude of Jews who resided in London, and possessed several entire streets, afford a further proof of the flourishing state of trade in that city in this period. For trade was almost the only occupation of that people; and they never settled in great numbers in any place, but where they either found or brought commerce.

As Bristol had been a place of considerable trade in the Anglo-Saxon times, it continued to be so in the present period. This we learn from William of Malmsbury, in his description of the vale of Gloucester. "In the same vale is a very famous town named Bristow, in which there is a sea-port, a safe receptacle for ships from Ireland, Norway, and other foreign countries; that this happy region, which abounds so much in its native riches, might not be destitute of the commodities procured by commerce." The trade between England and Ireland, which was for the most part carried on by the merchants of Bristol, was so great and so essential to the support of the Irish, that when it was interrupted, they were reduced to great distress. "Murcard, monarch of Ireland, behaved a little haughtily towards Henry I. I know not for what reason; but he was soon humbled by a prohibition of all trade between England and his dominions. For how wretched would Ireland be if no goods were imported into it from England."

The Flemings, who were settled in the fine country of Ross, in Pembrokeshire, by Henry I. were bold adventurous sailors, and much addicted to commerce. "They are," says Giraldus Cambrensis, "a people much used to the woollen manufacture, and to foreign trade; and in order to increase their store, they spare no pains either by sea or land." The vicinity of the spacious harbour of Milford-haven was probably a great advantage to this industrious colony.

The city of Exeter appears to have been a place of considerable trade at the conquest, and continued to enjoy that advantage through the whole of this period. When it was besieged by the Conqueror, A.D. 1068, the inhabitants compelled a great number of foreign merchants and mariners, who were then in their harbour, to assist them in their defence, William of Malmsbury acquaints us, that, in his time, though the soil about Exeter was so barren that it hardly produced a meagre crop of oats, yet its extensive trade made it abound in every thing that contributed to the comfort of human life.

The five towns on the coasts of Kent and Sussex, commonly called the cinque ports, were certainly among the most considerable seats of foreign commerce in England, in this period. Their merchants, like those of London, enjoyed the honourable appellation of barons, which their representatives in parliament still enjoy. Government depended very much upon them for a fleet on any emergency; and they were obliged to furnish no fewer than fifty-seven ships for the public service, at forty days notice, to continue fifteen days in that service, with their crews, at their own charges. This is a sufficient proof that they abounded in shipping and sailors, which they could not have done without a flourishing trade. The five towns which originally formed the cinque ports, were Hastings in Sussex, Dover, Hythe, Romney, and Sandwich in Kent; to which were added Winchelsea and Rye as principals, and some other towns as members, though they still retained the name of the cinque ports from their original number. We may form some idea of the comparative trade of these towns, by observing the number of ships which each was obliged to furnish. Hastings (with its members) was obliged to furnish twenty-one ships;—Romney (with its members) five; Hythe and Sandwich (with their members) each five; and Dover (with its members) twenty-one. For this important service of the state, the people of the cinque ports had various honours and privileges conferred upon them. Their merchants were not only styled barons, but four of these barons had a title to support the canopy over the king on the day of his coronation, and to dine at a table on his right hand. The inhabitants of these towns were exempt from the several feudal servitudes and prestations, and could be sued only in their own court. These honours and privileges afford a proof, that the government of England, in this period, was not inattentive to the encouragement of trade and shipping.

When Bishop Herebert, in the reign of William Rufus, removed the seat of his see from Thetford to Norwich; that town, we are told by William of Malmsbury, was famous for the number of its inhabibitants and the greatness of its commerce. In the same county, the town of Yarmouth abounded in ships, and was a formidable rival in power and commerce to the cinque ports, though both its commerce and its shipping increased very much in the succeeding period. The town of Lynn seems to have possessed a still greater share of foreign trade than Yarmouth, if we may rely on the testimony of William of Newborough, who resided at no great distance. That author tells us, that in the reign of Richard I. the town of Lynn was famous for its riches and commerce, and was inhabited by many wealthy Jews; who, being enraged against one of their nation who had embraced Christianity, at tempted to kill him, and assaulted a church in which he had taken shelter. This raised a tumult. A great multitude of foreign sailors who were in the harbour, attacked the Jews, and beat them from the church with some slaughter. Not contented with this, they plundered and then burnt several of their houses, and having carried the plunder, which was of great value, on board their ships, they immediately set sail, in order to secure their booty, and escape punishment.

Several places in Lincolnshire had a considerable share of trade, in this period, which some of them have since lost, by the choking of their harbours and other accidents. Lincoln, the capital of the county, was a rich and populous city; and, though at a distance from the sea, was not destitute of foreign trade, which was carried on by the navigable canal between the rivers Trent and Witham, made A.D. 1121, by order of Henry I. The towns of Grimsby, Saltfleet, Waynfleet, and Boston, though they had much declined from what they had been in this period, sent some ships to the fleet of Edward III., A.D. 1359. Boston, in particular, was a very rich and flourishing place before it was plundered and burnt in the reign of Edward I. The great numbers and riches of the Jews who resided at Lincoln, Stamford, and other towns in this county, plainly indicate that there was then a flourishing trade in those towns.

York, the northern capital of England, and residence of Roman emperors, made a distinguished figure in the Anglo-Saxon times, but was much reduced soon after the conquest. It revived however in a little time; and William of Malmsbury tells us, that in the reign of King Stephen, when he wrote, it was become a place of great trade; and that ships from Ireland and Germany sailed up the river Ouse into the very heart of the city. Great numbers of Jews settled in York about this time, and acquired immense wealth by usury and commerce, which, together with their magnificent houses and splendid way of living, excited the envy and indignation of the people to such a degree that they determined to destroy them. As soon as the news of the slaughter of that people at the coronation of Richard I. reached York, the mob arose, assaulted the Jews, plundered and burnt their houses, killed many, and drove others in despair to kill themselves, after they had despatched their wives and children with their own hands. This outrageous tumult, in which some hundreds of Jews were killed, and their houses, furniture, and riches, reduced to ashes, seems to have been fatal to the trade of York, which declined so fast, that it was able to send only one small ship, with nine mariners, to the fleet of Edward III.

Many other towns situated on the sea-coasts and navigable rivers of Britain, had their share of foreign trade in this period. But a more particular enumeration of them is unnecessary, and would be tedious. One of our ancient historians, referring to the times we are now delineating, has the following exclamation:—"O England! thou wast lately equal to the ancient Chaldeans in power, prosperity, and glory. The ships of Tarshish could not be compared with thy ships, which brought thee spices, and every precious thing from the four corners of the world. The sea was to thee an impregnable wall, and thy ports on all sides as the well-fortified gates of a strong castle."

It is curious, and may be useful, to know what were the most valuable articles of the foreign trade of Britain in every period. By this we shall at least discover wherein the superfluities and necessities of our country consisted from time to time, and in what manner the former were disposed of, and the latter were supplied.

Slaves still continued to be a capital article, both in the internal and foreign trade of Britain. When an estate was conveyed from one proprietor to another, all the villains or slaves annexed to that estate, were conveyed at the same time, and by the same deed. When any person had more children than he could maintain, or more domestic slaves than he chose to keep, he sold them to a merchant, who disposed of them either at home or abroad, as he found would be most profitable. "It was a common vice," says Giraldus Cambrensis, "of the English, when they were reduced to poverty; that rather than endure it patiently, they exposed their own children to sale." Many of these unhappy persons were carried into Ireland, and no doubt into other countries, and there sold. A strong law was made against this barbarous kind of commerce, in a great council held at St. Peter's, Westminster, A.D. 1102. "Let no man, for the future, presume to carry on the wicked trade of selling men in markets, like brute beasts, which hitherto has been the common custom of England." But this law did not put an end to this trade in slaves. For in the great council held at Armagh, A.D. 1171, the whole clergy of Ireland, after having deliberated long concerning the cause of the calamities with which they were threatened by the invasion of the English, at length agreed, that this great judgment had been inflicted upon them by the displeasure of God, for the sins of the people, particularly for their having bought so great a number of English slaves from merchants, robbers, and pirates, and for detaining them still in bondage. To appease therefore the divine displeasure, which had been excited against them on that account, they decreed,— "That all the English slaves in the whole island of Ireland should be immediately emancipated, and restored to their former liberty."

English horses had been long admired and coveted on the continent; and such multitudes of them had been exported, that a law was made by King Athelstan,— "That no man shall export any horses beyond seas, except such as he designs to give in presents." But this law, it is probable, did not continue long in force, especially after the conquest, when the intercourse between this island and the continent was under no restrictions, and our great barons had estates in both countries. The very high price of horses, especially of those which were used by the nobility in war and tournaments, is a presumption that they were exported. A great baron named Amphitil Till, agreed to pay to King John, A.D. 1207, as a part of his ransom, ten horses, each worth thirty marks, equivalent to three hundred pounds of our money at present. Whether any other animals were exported in this period or not, we are not informed.

Wool was for several centuries the most valuable article of the British exports. Gervase de Aldermanbury, in his accounts of the chamberlainship of London, A.D. 1199, charges himself with twenty-three pounds twelve shillings, which he had received from several merchants, for leave to export wool and leather out of England. He also accounts for two hundred and twenty-five marks, which had arisen from the sale of forty-five sacks of wool seized from the merchants, for attempting to export them without leave. Many other proofs, if it were necessary, might be produced, of the exportation of wool, woollens, and leather, in this period.

It is highly probable, if not absolutely certain, that woollen yarn, and even woollen cloth, were exported from England in this period. In the tenth year of Richard I., the chamberlain of London accounted for eleven marks, which had arisen from the sale of a parcel of woollen yarn seized from John de Birchamstede, because he had attempted to export it to Flanders, contrary to the liberties of the city of London. From this it appears, that woollen yarn was exported, and that the privilege of exporting it had been granted to the merchants of London. That the manufacture of woollen cloth was in a much more flourishing state in England in this than in the succeeding period, there is the clearest evidence; which induced a well-informed writer to say,—"That in the time of Henry II. and Richard I., this kingdom greatly flourished in the art of manufacturing woollen cloth; but by the troublesome wars in the time of King John and Henry III., and also of Edward I. and Edward II., this manufacture was wholly lost, and all our trade ran out in wool, woollens, and leather, carried out in specie." The Flemings settled in England seem to have exported some of the woollen cloths which they manufactured. For we are told by a contemporary writer, that they applied with equal ardour to the woollen manufacture and to foreign trade.

Although agriculture was far from being in a flourishing state in Britain in this period, yet, in favourable seasons, the natural fertility of the soil, even with imperfect cultivation, made it produce more corn than was necessary for home consumption, and at those times considerable quantities of it were exported. "Then," says one of our ancient historians, "England might be called the store-house of Ceres, out of which the world was supplied with corn." Many examples are to be found in the records of this period, of fines paid to the king for licences to export corn; which is a sufficient proof that it was at some times an article of exportation.

Metals, particularly lead and tin, constituted one of the most valuable articles of exportation in the times we are now delineating. Almost all the cathedral and abbey churches, together with many palaces and castles in France, and other countries on the continent, are said to have been covered with lead brought from England. We may form some idea of the great quantities of tin that were exported, from an article in the accounts of Henry de Castilun, chamberlain of London, A.D. 1198, in which he charges himself with three hundred and seventy-nine pounds eighteen shillings, which he had received in fines from the merchants of London, for leave to export tin. The royal revenues arising from the tin-mines of Cornwall and Devonshire, were valued at two thousand marks a-year, equivalent to ten thousand pounds of our money; and were granted, at that rate, to Queen Berengaria, widow of I.

Besides these capital articles of exportation there were many others of smaller value, as salt, salmon, cheese, honey, wax, tallow, &c. &c. as appears from the licences granted for exporting them, which are still extant in our record. But it is not necessary to make this enumeration more perfect.

In return for the goods which they exported, the British merchants of this period imported not only gold and silver, in coin and bullion, but several other commodities, for which they found a demand at home. It is proper to mention some of the most valuable of these commodities.

As the English were not very famous for their sobriety in this period, we may be certain that wine was a saleable commodity, and made one of the most valuable articles of importation. "The French," says William Fitz-Stephen, "import their wines into London, which they expose to sale both in their ships and in their wine-cellars near the river." The duties payable on wines imported, called prisa vinorum (the price of wines), constituted no inconsiderable branch of the royal revenue; and particular officers were appointed for collecting these duties. The importation of wines increased very much after the marriage of Henry II. with Eleanor, heiress of some of the finest provinces in the south of France, where the best wines were produced. The wine-trade was become a matter of so much importance in the beginning of King John's reign, that a law was made for regulating the prices of all the different kinds of wine, and twelve men appointed in each city, town, and borough, to superintend the execution of that law. "By this means," says a contemporary historian, "the land was filled with drink and drunkards."

Spices, drugs, and aromatics, of various kinds, the productions of the East, were imported in considerable quantities in this period; because they were much used by persons of rank and fortune in their meats and drinks, as well as by physicians in the composition of their medicines. "The Sabeans," says Fitz-Stephen, "import into London their frankincense and other spices; and from the rich country, about Babylon, they bring the oil of palms." The spice-trade formed so capital a branch of the commerce of this period, that merchants in general are often called speciarii in the barbarous Latin of those times.

Gold and precious stones were imported from Egypt, Arabia, and other eastern countries. For though no gold was used at this time in coinage, much of it was used in manufactures of various kinds, by goldsmiths, jewellers, gilders, embroiderers, illuminators, and painters. The monks, in particular, were bitterly reproached by several writers, for expending so much gold in gilding and illuminating books. Many precepts of our ancient kings are still extant, directing certain persons to buy gold from the merchants for their use. The sheriffs of London, in the second year of Henry II., paid fifty-six shillings for gold to gild the king's bridles.

Silks, and other fine fabrics of the East, were also imported; but not in very great quantities, because they were used only by the church, the royal family, and perhaps by a few of the most wealthy barons. Many cathedral and abbey churches were adorned with altar cloths, veils, and curtains of silk, and had also vestments of it, in which their clergy officiated on some occasions. It appears from the records of this period, that silks were purchased from time to time for the use of the royal family. At the conquest, and for some time after, silks were very dear and scarce; but manufactories of them having been established in Sicily, Spain, Majorca, and Ivica, in the course of the twelfth century, they became much cheaper and more common.

Tapestry, together with linen and woollen cloths of the finer kinds, were among the British imports of this period. For though great quantities of woollen cloths were manufactured in England, and some of them were exported; yet they seem to have been generally of the coarsest kinds, and most common colours; while those of finer texture, and more delicate colours, for the use of persons of high rank, were imported from Flanders; which was then so famous for woollen manufacture, that it was called Flandria Textrix. Tapestries for hangings were manufactured in the city of Arras, even in this period, and from thence imported into England. Though linen, as well as woollen cloths, were manufactured in Britain, yet it seems probable that the finest linens were imported, as the first notice we meet with of fine linen made in England is in the thirty-seventh of Henry III.

Furs of various kinds, and in great quantities, were imported from Norway, Russia, and other northern countries. For furs were very much used, both by the clergy and laity: and all persons who could afford to purchase them had their winter garments lined with them. Some of these furs, particularly sables, bore a very high price, and could only be obtained by princes or prelates of the greatest wealth. Robert Bloit, Bishop of Lincoln, made a present to Henry I. of a cloak of the finest cloth lined with sables, which cost no less than one hundred pounds, equivalent to fifteen hundred pounds of our money.

Dye stuffs, particularly woad, may be reckoned among the imports of Britain in this period, which is an additional proof that the woollen manufacture was not neglected. Henry de Casteilun, who was chamberlain of the port of London, charged himself, in his accounts for A.D. 1197, with the sum of ninety-six pounds six shillings and eightpence, which he had received from certain merchants, for licences to import woad, and sell it in England. The quantity of woad imported by these merchants must have been very great, when they could afford to pay a sum equivalent to more than fourteen hundred pounds of our money at present, for their licences.

Besides gold and silver, other metals, particularly iron and steel, were imported into Britain from Germany, and other countries, in this period. The German merchants of the Steel-yard in London, are thought by some to have derived that name from the great quantities of iron and steel which they imported, and sold at a place called the Steel yard.

Though corn was exported from Britain in years of plenty, we have good reason to believe that it was imported in still greater quantities in times of scarcity, which were but too frequent in our present period. The merchants of London seem to have been the chief importers of corn: for we are told by a contemporary writer, that they kept many granaries full of it in that city: and that from these granaries all parts of the kingdom were supplied. Several other articles of importation, as arms, books, pictures, &c. might be mentioned; but it seems to be unnecessary, and would be tedious, to make this enumeration more particular.

The internal trade of England was managed chiefly by Anglo-Saxons and Anglo-Normans, who were natives of the country, and members of the merchant guilds established in the several towns and cities of the kingdom: but they do not seem to have had a great share in its foreign commerce, which was for the most part in the hands of foreigners. Fitz-Stephen, who flourished in the reign of Henry II., acquaints us, in his description of London, that "in this city all nations under heaven had factors residing for the management of their commerce."

Great numbers of Jews came from Normandy, and other countries on the continent, soon after the conquest, and, settling in all the trading towns in England, got possession of a very great proportion of the commerce of the kingdom. Having larger capitals, greater knowledge of trade, and a more extensive correspondence with those of their own nation in other parts of Europe, than the native English merchants, they were able to undersell them in every market. By these means they acquired great riches; but at the same time drew upon themselves the indignation of the public, and the most oppressive exactions of the government. For they and their families were considered as the slaves, and all their possessions as the property of the sovereign, which he might seize at pleasure, which he might even sell at mortgage like any other estate. We may form some idea of the great trade and riches of the Jews at this period, as well as of the oppressions of the government, by observing that a particular exchequer, called the Exchequer of the Jews, was established for receiving the prodigious sums extorted from them in customs, fines, forfeitures, tallages and various other ways. To give one example, out of many, of the cruelty of the government towards the Jews, and of the great sums extorted from them, we are told, "That the king, A.D. 1210, commanded all the Jews in England, of both sexes, to be imprisoned, in order to compel them to pay him great sums of money. Some of them, after they had been grievously tortured, surrendered all the money they had, and even promised more, to preserve themselves from further tortures. Amongst others, the king demanded ten thousand marks (equivalent to one hundred thousand pounds at present) from a certain Jew at Bristol, and commanded one of his teeth to be pulled out every day till he paid that sum. The Jew held out seven days, but submitted on the eighth, and parted with his money to preserve the remainder of his teeth."

All Christians, in this period, were prohibited both by the laws of the church and state, from lending money at interest, which was called usury; and those who were convicted of it were punished by excommunication, and the forfeiture of all their goods. By these imprudent laws, the business of lending money was thrown into the hands of the Jews, from whence they derived the most exorbitant profits, and in which they practised the most cruel exactions. For as the rate of interest was not regulated by any law, they set no bounds to their avarice, and took every advantage of the necessities of those who applied to them for a loan of money. On some occasions, if we are not misinformed, they took no less than fifty per cent. per annum. This, though almost incredible, is highly probable, from an order of Henry III. restraining them from taking more than twopenney in a week for every twenty shillings they lent to the scholars of Oxford, which is little more than forty-three per cent. From the following letter of the famous Peter of Blois, Archdeacon of Bath, to his friend the Bishop of Ely, we may form some idea of the extreme severity of the Jews to their unhappy debtors: "I am dragged to Canterbury to be crucified by the perfidious Jews, amongst their other debtors, whom they ruin and torment with usury. The same sufferings await me also in London, if you do not mercifully interpose for my deliverance. I beseech you therefore, O most reverend father, and most loving friend, to become bound to Sampson the Jew, for six pounds, which I owe him, and thereby deliver me from that cross." After this we need not be surprised, either at the prodigious opulence of the Jews, or at the universal execration in which they were held.

The German merchants of the Steel-yard, who had been settled in London before the conquest, continued in the same place, and enjoyed the same privileges, after that event. For Fitz-Stephen, who flourished about the middle of the twelfth century, says, in his description of London, that the merchants of all nations had their distant quays and wharfs in that city; and, particularly, that the Germans had the Steel-yard. But as the society of the merchants of the Steel-yard made a more conspicuous figure in the next period, we shall insert a more particular account of it in our next book.

The trade of Venice, Pisa, Genoa, Amalphi, and some other cities of Italy, was, in this period, in a very flourishing state. The truth is, that almost all the commerce between Asia, Africa, and Europe, was in the hands of the merchants of these cities, who exported the superfluities of Europe, and brought home the spices, gold, silks, and other precious commodities of the East, which they sent into every country where they could find a market, and particularly into Britain. For the management of this trade, companies of Italian merchants were settled in London, and perhaps in some other towns.

Amongst these companies the Caursini were the most famous about the end of this and the beginning of the next period. It is imagined, that they were called Caursini, because many of them belonged to a numerous and opulent family of that name in Italy. However this may be, the Caursini in England, by departing from the proper business of merchants, and becoming agents for the Pope in his usurious transactions, rendered themselves as odious as the Jews. But a more full account of this society, as well as that of the Lombards, shall be given in the sixth chapter of our next book.

Some of the great barons of England, among the officers of their household, had one who was called the Merchant, who transacted all the mercantile business of the baron to whom he belonged; disposing of his corn, cattle, and every thing he had to sell; and purchasing cloths, wines, spices, and every thing else he wanted to buy. It appears from records, that these baronial merchants even engaged in foreign trade, and imported wines and other goods, for which they were liable to pay customs.

Commerce had been an object of the attention of government, and a subject of legislation, in the Anglo-Saxon times, and continued to be so in the present period. It was one of the first cares of the Conqueror to encourage trade. With this view he published a proclamation, inviting foreign merchants to frequent the ports of England, and promising them the most perfect security for their goods and persons. This prince adopted several Anglo-Saxon regulations, with respect to trade, into his own laws, and enforced them by his authority. By one of these laws, it is decreed, "That no live cattle shall be bought or sold, but in cities, and before three credible witnesses;" by another, "That all fairs and markets shall be kept in fortified cities, towns, or castles." These laws were inconsistent; but they were necessary in those turbulent times. The Conqueror also prohibited the selling of Christian slaves to infidels: but this prohibition, it is probable, was not much regarded. We know of no laws respecting trade made by William II.; but his successor, Henry I., was more attentive to that important object. By the ancient law and custom of England, when a ship was wrecked on the coast, if those who escaped from it did not return to it within a limited time, the ship and cargo became the property of the lord of the manor. This most unjust and cruel law was abrogated by Henry I., who decreed, that if one man escaped alive out of the wreck, the lord of the manor should have no claim either to the ship or cargo.

But this just and merciful regulation was very disagreeable to many of the rapacious barons, and was quite disregarded after the death of the prince by whom it was made, till it was revived by his grandson Henry II. "That prince," as we are told by one of our ancient historians, "in the very beginning of his reign, abolished the cruel custom towards shipwrecked sailors, which had too long prevailed; and commanded that those who escaped from the dangers of the sea, should be treated with kindness; and that such as did them any injury, or seized any of their goods, should be severely punished,"—a law which does much honour both to the wisdom and humanity of its author. However this may be, it is certain, that Henry II., A.D. 1174, promulgated the three following regulations on this subject: 1. That if but one man escaped from a ship alive, that ship and cargo could not be considered as a wreck, but should be kept for the use of the owners. 2. Though no man escaped alive, yet if any animal escaped, or was found in the ship alive, the ship and cargo should be committed to the custody of four persons of credit, to be kept three months, to be delivered to the owners if they appeared within that time, or to the King at the end of it, if the owners did not appear. 3. But if neither man nor beast escaped alive, the ship and cargo should belong to the King, or to the person having right to wreck at that place. This prince cultivated the friendship of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa, to whom he sent a splendid embassy, with magnificent presents, A.D. 1157, with a view to promote a free trade between their subjects. To prevent the diminution of the ships and sailors of his kingdom, which he knew to be so necessary both for its defence and trade, Henry II., A.D. 1181, commanded his justices itinerant, "to give a strict charge in every county, that no man, as he valued his life and fortune, should buy or sell any ship to be carried out of England, or should send, or cause to be sent, any mariner out of England."

The importance of trade to the prosperity of the kingdom becoming more conspicuous, Richard I. paid great attention to it, and made many mercantile regulations. The laws and regulations, published by this prince at Chinon, in France, A.D. 1189, for the government of his great fleet in his expedition into the Holy Land, are very curious, but too long to be here inserted; and being rather of a martial than a mercantile nature, do not so properly belong to our present subject. By the last of these laws, it is decreed, "That whoever is convicted of theft, shall have his head shaved, melted pitch poured upon it, and the feathers from a pillow shaken over it, that he may be known; and shall be put on shore on the first land at which the ship touches." The famous maritime laws called "The Laws of Oleron" as

It is asserted by many modern authors, were promulgated by this prince on that island, at his return from the Holy Land; but on what foundation this is built, I have not been able to discover. These laws, which are forty-seven in number, are evidently very ancient, and no less prudent, humane, and just; though several of them, from a change of manners and circumstances, are now obsolete. We have better evidence that Richard I. made various mercantile regulations, soon after his return into England from his unfortunate expedition into the East. By the first of these regulations he commanded the sea-ports to be carefully guarded that no corn or provisions of any kind might be exported either in English or foreign bottoms. But this was only a temporary prohibition, to prevent a famine, with which England was then threatened. Having set forth the great inconveniences arising from the diversity of weights and measures in different parts of the kingdom, he, by a law, commanded all measures of corn, and other dry goods, as also of liquors, to be exactly the same in all his dominions; and that the rim of each of these measures should be a circle of iron. By another law, he commanded all cloth to be woven two yards in breadth within the lists, and of equal goodness in all parts; and that all cloth which did not answer this description, should be seized and burnt. He enacted further, that all the coin of the kingdom should be exactly of the same weight and fineness; that no Christian should take any interest for money lent: and to prevent the extortions of the Jews, he commanded that all compacts between Christians and Jews should be made in the presence of witnesses, and the conditions of them put in writing, of which three copies should be made, one to be lodged in a public repository, and one to be given to each party. Many of these regulations were wise and useful, but some of them were tinged with the prejudice of the times.

If there was any thing commendable in the character of King John, it was his attention to maritime and mercantile affairs. Of this he gave a proof, soon after his accession to the throne, by publishing the famous edict of Hastings, A.D. 1200, in which he asserted his dominion over the British seas in the strongest terms, and commanded his captains to seize all ships which did not strike their topsails to them, to confiscate their cargoes, and imprison their crews, even though they were the subjects of a power in friendship with England. In a word, the attention of this prince to maritime affairs was such, that he was served with zeal and fidelity by his sailors, when he was abandoned by almost all his other subjects. It is a sufficient evidence of this, that, at a time when his affairs were in the most desperate state on shore, his fleet destroyed the whole naval power of France, and sent home no fewer than three hundred sail of French ships which had been taken. King John contributed also to the improvement of commerce, by establishing guilds or societies of merchants, with various privileges and immunities, in all parts of the kingdom, where there was any considerable trade. By the forty-first article of Magna Charta, foreign merchants are secured against all violence and every illegal exaction in times of peace; and it is declared, that when a war breaks out, they shall be treated in England in the same manner in which the English merchants are treated in the enemy's country.

As ships are the chief instruments of foreign trade, the state of the shipping of this island is an object worthy of some attention in every period of its history.

It is conjectured, at the time of the Norman conquest, that the shipping of England amounted to two or three thousand vessels, from twenty to one hundred tons, at the conclusion of the former period; and that after that event the ships belonging to Britain became more numerous, and were of a larger size, and better construction.

The very fleet which brought over the duke of Normandy and his army into England, made a great addition to the English shipping. Some of our ancient historians affirm, that this fleet consisted of no fewer than three thousand ships. Though this may be an exaggeration, we may be certain that the transportation of sixty thousand men, with their horses, arms, and other necessities, required a very numerous fleet of such small ships as were then in use. Some of these ships were carried back to the continent; but the greatest part of them, together with their crews, remained in England, and made a great addition to its naval power. The frequent voyages of our Anglo-Norman kings, between this island and their dominions on the continent, attended by large armies, chiefly composed of cavalry, rendered numerous fleets absolutely necessary. These, it is true, bore a greater resemblance to fleets of transports, than to the royal navies of the present times. For they consisted chiefly of merchant-ships, collected together when it was necessary, and dismissed as soon as the service was performed. But the very possibility of collecting together a fleet of several hundred ships, in a few weeks, affords a demonstration that England abounded in shipping in this period.

The Anglo-Saxon ships were very small, and far from being perfect in their construction. But the English ships of this period appear to have been both larger and better built. Those of the largest size, and strongest construction, was called dromones. The famous Saracen ship, which was taken by Richard I. near the port of Acon, was of this kind; and must have been of an enormous magnitude, as it contained no fewer than fifteen hundred men. Those dromones had three masts, and are said to have sailed very slowly, being too lofty to make use of oars. Ships of the second rate, called bussæ or buccæ, were also large vessels, and had three masts. Galleys were of various kinds, and different degrees of magnitude; but they all made use of oars as well as sails. The ships most commonly used in trade, both at sea and on large rivers, were called barcæ, or barks; and those of them which were of the smallest size were called barbottæ. All these vessels had decks, for securing the goods with which they were loaded, from the injuries of the sea. Besides these, they had boats of different kinds and dimensions, for plying on rivers, for fishing, and for other purposes.

That the English ships of this period had the reputation of being excellent in their several kinds, is at least highly probable, from the law of Henry II., which prohibited the selling of them to foreigners. We are told by a contemporary author, who was present at Messina, in Sicily, with Richard I., in his way to the Holy Land,—that the people of that city were filled with admiration at the number, beauty, and magnitude, of the ships of which that monarch's fleet was composed; and declared, that so fine a fleet had never been seen, and probably never would be seen in the harbour of Messina. This was indeed a very gallant fleet. It consisted of thirteen ships of the largest kind, called dromones, one hundred and fifty of the second rate, called bussæ, fifty-three galleys, besides a great number of tenders. Such a fleet would make no contemptible appearance even in foreign times.

As the British ships were better built, so they were also better navigated, in this than in the preceding period. The English sailors were much admired, both at home and abroad, for their dexterity and courage; which produced the law of Henry II., prohibiting them from entering into foreign service. Geoffrey of Vinesauf, who accompanied Richard I. in his expedition to the Holy Land, ascribes the preservation of that prince from shipwreck in a storm, to the uncommon skill and courage of his sailors, "who did every thing that it was possible for human art to do, to resist the fury of the winds." This character, which the English sailors so early acquired, they have long retained, and I hope will never forfeit.

It is a little uncertain, whether or not the English sailors towards the end of this period, had the advantage of the mariner's compass to guide them in their voyages. For neither the person who invented that most useful instrument, nor the time when it was invented, is very well known. It is however certain, that it had been discovered about the end of the twelfth, or beginning of the thirteenth century, that a needle touched with a loadstone pointed towards the north; and that endeavours were then used to apply this discovery to navigation, though the most convenient way of doing it was not then invented. For Hugh de Bercy, a French poet, who flourished in the former part of the thirteenth century, mentions this property of a needle touched with a loadstone very plainly, and describes an instrument called la marinier, used by the sailors in his time, in which the needle was placed upon a board that floated in a vessel of water.

If ships and sailors are necessary to foreign trade, especially in an island, money is no less necessary both to foreign and internal commerce. It has long been the common measure of all commodities, and the chief instrument of their circulation, and must therefore never be neglected in the history of trade.

Living money, which made so great a figure in the former, is seldom or never mentioned by the writers of the present period. For, when coin became common, the conveniency of it, as a representative of all commodities, appeared so great, that all others were soon laid aside.

The full account that has been given of the several denominations of money, and of the real coins that were used in Britain in the preceding period, makes it unnecessary to say much on these subjects in the present; because the changes made in them by the conquest were but few and inconsiderable. These changes were the following. Some denominations of money, as mancusses, oras, and thrimsas, that were common in the Anglo-Saxon times, fell into disuse, and are seldom mentioned by the writers after the conquest. If the mancus of gold was a real coin among the Anglo-Saxons, which is not very certain, it ceased to be coined after the conquest; for there is not the least vestige of such a coin among the Anglo-Normans; nor do we hear any thing of the copper coin called a stica, after the conquest.

The Tower pound, which had been the money pound after the Anglo-Saxons, continued to be the money pound of England for several centuries after the conquest. This pound was three-fourths of an ounce lighter than the Troy pound, to which it was in the proportion of fifteen to sixteen. It was divided into twelve ounces, each ounce weighing 456 Troy grains, which made 5400 such grains in the pound. Whenever therefore a pound of money is mentioned by the writers in this period, it signifies as many silver coins as weighed 5400 Troy grains; or, in other words, a Tower pound weight of silver coins. The pound was both the largest and most common denomination of money.

The mark is another denomination of money, which is frequently mentioned in the histories and records of this period. It weighed exactly two-thirds of a Tower pound; and was the same with the Anglo-Danish mark, which has been fully described already.

The shilling was not a real coin, but only a denomination of money in this period, whatever it might have been in the former. The Anglo-Norman shilling was also very different in its weight and value from the Anglo-Saxon. The largest of the latter weighed only $112\frac{1}{2}$ Troy grains, whereas the former represented as many silver coins as weighed 270 of the same grains, or the twentieth part of a Tower pound.

The penny was by far the most common real coin in the present period. Every Tower pound of silver was coined into two hundred and forty of these pennies, each weighing $22\frac{1}{2}$ Troy grains. Twelve of these pennies, weighing 270 grains, were paid for one shilling. In a word, the Anglo-Norman penny was the same in weight with the Anglo-Saxon. Many of the former, as well as some of the latter are still preserved, and have been published.

Though the silver penny of this period was but a small coin, yet it was of considerable value, and would have purchased as much provisions, or other goods, as four or five of our shillings will do at present. To have had no smaller coins than pennies, would have been very inconvenient to the poor in the purchase of provisions and other necessities. We may be certain, therefore, that silver half-pennies and farthings were coined in this, as well as in the former period; though few or none of these small coins of some of our Norman kings have been preserved. It seems probable, however, that the smaller coins were sometimes very scarce, and that the people had been accustomed to cut or break silver pennies into halves and quarters, which passed for half-pennies and farthings. For Henry I., A.D. 1108, prohibited this practice; and commanded, that all half-pennies and farthings, as well as pennies, should be entire and round. It appears also, that this law did not put an end to the practice of cutting pennies into halves and quarters, but that it continued through the whole of this period; because we meet with a law against it in the reign of Edward I., A.D. 1279.

In the course of this period, the silver penny is sometimes called an esterling or sterling; and good money in general is sometimes called esterling or sterling money. It is unnecessary to mention the various conjectures of antiquaries about the origin and meaning of this appellation. The most probable opinion seems to be this, that some artists from Germany, who were called Esterlings, from the situation of their country, had been employed in fabricating our money, which consisted chiefly of silver pennies; and from them the penny was called an esterling, and our money esterling or sterling money.

As the silver coins of England, in this and the former period, were of the same kinds, and of the same weights, they were also of the same standard or degree of fineness. Both our Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman princes paid great attention to the purity of their coin, and punished those who attempted to debase it, with great severity. Henry II., A.D. 1180, called in all the coin, because some of it had been debased; and issued new money, which was to be the only current coin of the kingdom.

Coining money was not confined to one place in England, as it is at present, but was practised in every town of any considerable trade. The workmen, however, who were employed in coining, did not enjoy the same liberty with other artists, of following their own fancies, and making such coins as they pleased; but they received all their dyes from the exchequer, and they wrought under the inspection of officers, who were called examinatores monetæ, and custodes cuneorum, "Essayers and keepers of the dyes," whose business it was, to take care that their coins were of the standard weight and fineness. All these workmen, together with the essayers and keepers of the dyes, in all the different mints, were under the immediate direction of the barons of the exchequer; who, from time to time, commanded them to appear before them with their implements of coining. Thus, in the 9th of King John, writs were issued by the barons of the exchequer, commanding all the moneyours, essayers, and keepers of the dyes, in London, Winchester, Exeter, Chichester, Canterbury, Rochester, Ipswich, Norwich, Lynn, Lincoln, York, Carlisle, Northampton, Oxford, St. Edmunds, and Durham, to appear before them at Westminster, in the quinzies of St. Denys, and to bring with them all the dyes sealed up with their own seals.

Though it is highly probable that money was coined in Scotland before the beginning of this period, yet as none of that ancient money has been discovered, nothing certain can be said on that subject. Nor have any coins of Malcolm Canmore, or of his three successors, Donald, Duncan, and Edgar, kings of Scotland, yet appeared; the most ancient Scotch coins that are known being those of Alexander I., who began his reign A.D. 1107. From that æra the series is almost complete. It is unnecessary to spend one moment in describing the money of Scotland, in this period, as it was exactly the same in weight, fineness, and fabrication, with that of England, already described.

If any gold was coined in Britain in the times we are now considering, it has disappeared. For no gold coins of any of the kings who reigned in England, in this period, have been yet discovered, nor are any such coins mentioned by the contemporary historians. But foreign gold coins, of the same kinds, which had circulated among the Anglo-Saxons, still continued to circulate through the whole of this period. These were commonly called Byzants, or Byzantines, and have been described in the sixth chapter of the second book of this work.

The proportion of gold to silver appears to have been as one to nine. The abbot of Thorney being obliged to pay to King Stephen yearly, for the privilege of a market at Jakesley, one mark of gold, paid nine marks of silver, and was discharged. The same proportion was observed in the succeeding reign. For Peter Turk paid six pounds of silver into the exchequer, for one mark of gold, which he owed to Henry II. The cheapness of gold, in this period, seems to be an indication of its abundance in proportion to silver.

The most natural and easy way of paying any sum of money, is to pay as many real coins of gold or silver as are nominally and legally contained in that sum. This is called paying by tale; and is almost the only method now in use. But as the real value of coins, in some periods, may fall considerably short of their nominal value, either by a deficiency in their weight, or fineness, or in both, it becomes necessary, at those times, to contrive some method to guard against this deception. Several methods were used for this purpose, in the times we are now considering, by those who received the royal revenues at the exchequer, and probably by all who had extensive dealing in money.

When the coins offered to the receivers at the exchequer, appeared to them sufficiently pure, but a little lighter than the standard, they contented themselves with demanding and receiving six silver pennies in every pound, more than was nominally contained in it, to make up the supposed deficiency in the weight. For example, they demanded and received two hundred and forty-six silver pennies for one pound, instead of two hundred and forty pennies, which made a nominal pound. The six silver pennies extraordinary were called the increment; and this way of paying was called paying ad scalam, and was an easy and amicable method of adjusting the difference between the legal and real weight of coins.

When the coins presented in payment at the exchequer appeared to be so much diminished that the ordinary increment would not make up the deficiency, they were put into the scales, and taken by weight, without any regard to number. This was called payment ad pensum, and was certainly the most just.

But as coins might be defective in fineness as well as in weight, the receivers at the exchequer sometimes melted a few of them by way of trial, and calculated the value of the whole, according to the issue of that trial. This was called payment by combustion; and when a quantity of coins had undergone this trial, they were said to be blanched. To prevent the trouble of melting, a certain allowance, as one shilling in the pound, was sometimes offered and accepted, to make up the deficiency in fineness. There were proper officers in the exchequer for performing these operations, such as a pesour for weighing, and a fusor for melting the coins that were to be tried; and these officers were furnished with proper instruments and conveniences for their respective works.

It will readily occur to every reader, that these different modes of payment made a very essential difference both to the debtor and creditor, especially in large sums; because it required a greater number of the same kind of coins to pay the same debt in one way than another. For this reason, in making bargains, and settling the rents of farms, &c., it was usual to stipulate in which of these ways the money was to be paid, by tale, by scale, by weight, or by combustion.

If the same nominal sum of money had always contained the same quantity of the precious metals of the same fineness, we might easily and certainly have discovered the comparative value of money, and expense of living, at any two periods, only by comparing the nominal prices of labour and commodities at these different times. But this has not been the case. The same nominal sum of money, as a pound, a mark, a shilling, &c. has at some periods contained a greater, and at others a smaller quantity of silver, to say nothing of its different degrees of fineness. In order therefore to discover the comparative value of money, and expense of living, at any two periods, two things must be taken into the account: 1st, The quantity of silver contained in the same nominal sum at each of these periods; and, 2dly, the efficacy or power of the same quantity of silver in purchasing labour and commodities, of all kinds at each period.

Any nominal sum of money, or number of pounds, marks or shillings, in the period we are now delineating, contained nearly thrice as much silver, as the same nominal sum, or number of pounds, marks, or shillings, contain at present. Whenever, therefore, we meet with any sum of money, or number of pounds, marks, or shillings, in the histories or records of this period, said to be the price of any commodity, we must multiply it by three to discover how many of our pounds, marks, or shillings, it contained. Thus, for example, we are told by several of our ancient historians, that there was so great a scarcity of corn in England, A.D. 1126, that a quarter of wheat sold for six shillings, that is, for eighteen shillings of our money.

The same nominal sum of money not only contained a much greater quantity of silver than it does at present, but the same quantity of silver was also much more valuable than it is at present. It is difficult, if not impossible, to discover the difference in this respect with certainty and exactness. This difficulty is occasioned by two things: 1. Because we are not sufficiently informed of the common prices of the most necessary and useful commodities, particularly of corn, in this distant period: 2. Because the prices of some commodities, as of books, silks, and spices, bore a much higher proportion than the prices of some others, as of corn, cattle, and wine, to the prices of the same commodities in the present times. Accordingly we find, that the most ingenious and best-informed writers have entertained very different sentiments on this subject; some estimating the value or efficacy of any given weight of silver coins in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, to the value or efficacy of the same weight of our silver coins at present, to have been in the proportion of ten to one, and some estimating it to have been only in proportion of five to one. That is to say, some of these writers think, that a quantity of silver coins, of an equal weight with one of our crownpieces, would have purchased ten times as much labour, meat, drink, and clothing, in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, as one of our crownpieces can purchase at present, while others of them think that it would have purchased only five times as much.

If we could discover the average price of corn in the times we are now examining, we might determine this question with tolerable certainty; because the price of corn has a considerable influence on the price of labour, and the expence of living. The historians of this period represent it as a great dearth, or rather as a famine, when wheat was sold for six of their shillings (containing as much silver as eighteen of our shillings) the quarter. "This year, A. D. 1126, (says Henry of Huntingdon), was the greatest dearth in our times, when a quarter of wheat was sold for six shillings." If we suppose the same quantity of silver to have been ten times as valuable then as it is now, this makes the dearth, A. D. 1126, to have been as great as it would be at present, if wheat was sold for nine pounds the quarter, or 1*l* 2*s*. 6*d*. the bushel—a dearth that would be quite ruinous and insupportable. But if we suppose the value or efficacy of the same quantity of silver to have been only five times as great then as it is now, this makes the dearth, A. D. 1126, to have been as great as it would be at present if a quarter of wheat was sold for 4*l*. 10*s*., or a bushel for 11*s*. 3*d*.—a dearth sufficiently distressful, and of which we have few examples. We can hardly imagine that our historians would have mentioned this dearth in such strong terms, if the price of corn had not then been the double of its common or average price. On the other hand, our historians speak of it as a proof of uncommon plenty and cheapness, when wheat was sold for two of their shillings (containing as much silver as six of our shillings) the quarter. "This year, A. D. 1244, (says Matthew Paris) was so fruitful, that a quarter of wheat was sold for two shillings." Upon the whole, it seems to be no improbable conjecture, that the most common price of wheat in the eleventh and twelfth centuries was about three of their shillings or nine of our shillings the quarter. If we suppose the same quantity of silver to have been then ten times the value it is now, we must also suppose that the most common or average price of wheat in our times is 4*l*. 10*s*. the quarter—a supposition which we know to be very remote from truth. But if we estimate any given quantity of silver as nine of our shillings, the average price of a quarter of wheat in the eleventh and twelfth centuries, to have been only five times the value of the same quantity of silver at present; this corresponds with the supposition, that the average price of a quarter of wheat, in modern times, is 2*l*. 5*s*. or 5*s*. 7½*d*. the bushel. This is evidently not far from the truth. The justness of this supposition, that any given quantity or weight of silver coins, in the period we are now delineating, was equal in value and efficacy to five times the same weight or quantity of our silver coins at present, might, if it was necessary, be confirmed by many other arguments.

According to this supposition, a person who had a nominal income of 10*l*. a-year, in this period, received as much silver as one who hath a nominal income at present of 30*l*. a-year; and could have lived as well, purchased as much labour, meat, drink, and clothing, as one who has an income of 150*l*. at present. A constant attention to these two things, the different quantity of silver in the same nominal sum of money, and the different value of the same quantity of silver, is necessary to our understanding the meaning of our ancient historians on many occasions, and particularly to our comprehending the real value of the several sums of money that are mentioned by them.

The materials of our commercial history, in this period, are not so perfect as to enable us to form a judgment, or even a guess, concerning the balance of trade between Britain and any one particular country. But we have good reason to believe that the balance of trade, upon the whole, was in favour of Britain; or in other words, that the British exports were more valuable than the British imports; and that to make up the deficiency in the imports, Britain received a balance in cash or bullion.

This may be proved in this manner. We had no mines of gold or silver in this island in those times, to supply the daily diminution of the national stock of the precious metals, by manufacturers—by the wear and loss of plate and coin—and by the great sums of money which were carried out of the kingdom from time to time; yet this diminution was actually supplied, and the national stock was kept up, if not increased; which must have been by cash or bullion brought home by the balance of trade.

That no mines of gold or silver were wrought in Britain in this period, the silence of all our records, historians, and other writers, seems to be a sufficient proof. That the national stock of the precious metals must have been gradually diminished—by the quantities of them that were used in illuminating, gilding, and other manufactures—and by the necessary wear and loss of plate and coins, is too evident to need any proof.

That very great sums of money were carried out of Britain in the course of this period we have the clearest evidence. What prodigious sums of money were carried to Rome alone by the clergy, in purchasing their palls, prosecuting their appeals, and procuring favours of various kinds, to say nothing of the annual payment of Peter-pence! Many of our writers in this period complain bitterly of the avarice of the pope and cardinals, and of the great sums of money which they extorted from the English clergy and others. Nay, King John, in a letter which he wrote to the pope A. D. 1208, affirmed that the court of Rome received more money from England than from all the other kingdoms on this side of the Alps. The long residences of our kings upon the continent and their frequent wars with the kings of France and other princes, must have occasioned a great drain of money from England. The unfortunate expedition of Richard I. into the Holy Land, together with his ransom from his captivity, carried out an incredible mass of money. To say nothing of the great sums which the prelates, nobles, and others, who embarked in that expedition carried with them, the king not only expended on it all his father's treasures, but all the money which he collected from the sale of every thing belonging to the crown for which he could find a purchaser.

But notwithstanding all these drains, and others which might have been mentioned, England still continued to be rich in money. If the Jews, in particular, who were settled in Britain, had not been very rich in money they could not have paid the heavy and frequent demands that were made upon them by government. All our kings were rich in gold and silver; and great sums of ready money, as well as great quantities of plate and jewels, were found in their repositories when they died. Many subjects also, particularly among the prelates, possessed great quantities of the precious metals, both in coin and plate. No less than forty thousand marks, equal in quantity of silver to 80,000*l.*, and in value or efficacy to 400,000*l.* of our money, were found in the castle of the Devizes, when it was taken from Roger Bishop of Salisbury, A. D. 1139. Eleven thousand pounds of silver, and three hundred pounds of gold coins, besides great quantities of gold and silver plate, were found in the treasury of Roger Archbishop of York at his death, A. D. 1181. The silver coins alone in this archiepiscopal treasury were equal in value to 165,000*l.* of our present money; and if we reckon one pound of the gold to have been worth only nine pounds of silver, the gold coins were equal in efficacy to 40,500*l.* of our money. Many other examples, if it was necessary, might be given from the genuine monuments of this period, of particular persons and of societies who possessed great quantities of the precious metals, both in coins and plate. In a word, there is sufficient evidence, that though great sums of money were annually carried out of England to Rome, to Normandy, and other places, the national stock of gold and silver was not diminished but rather increased in the course of this period. This cannot be accounted for, but by supposing that considerable quantities of coin and bullion were imported by the merchants as the balance of their trade with foreign nations. All the gold coins, in particular, which appear to have been numerous, must have been imported, as no gold was coined in Britain in this period.

SECTION IV.

History of the Manners, Virtues, Vices, remarkable Customs, Language, Dress, Diet, and Diversions, of the people of Great Britain, from the landing of William Duke of Normandy, A.D. 1066, to the death of King John, A.D. 1216.

THOSE destructive bands of piratical adventurers which issued from Scandinavia, and invested all the seas and coasts of Europe, in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh centuries, were sometimes called Saxons, sometimes Danes, and sometimes Normans. "From the fury of the Normans, Good Lord deliver us," was then a petition in the litanies of all the nations, which dreaded the depredations of those northern plunderers, who were called Normans from the situation of the countries from whence they came.

About the beginning of the tenth century, a very numerous band, or rather army, of these northern adventurers, under the conduct of Rollo, a Norwegian chieftain, invaded, and almost desolated the fine province of Neustria. This province, extending from the river Ept to the confines of Brittany, was at length granted, A. D. 911, by Charles the Simple, king of France, to Rollo and his followers, on condition that they became Christians, and that they held the ceded territories of the crown of France. With these conditions they complied; and having obtained possession of so fine a country, they abandoned their former roving and predatory course of life, and began to rebuild the cities which they had destroyed, and to cultivate the fields which they desolated. From that time the country which had formerly been called Neustria, was called Normandy, from its new masters, who were called Normans, because all the different countries from whence they came lay to the north of France.

Duke Rollo and his Normans, though they had been as great barbarians as any of the other swarms of savages which had issued from Scandinavia, gradually became a civilized and polished people, after their settlement in Normandy. This was owing to several causes. The Christian religion, which they then embraced, was of a more humane and peaceful spirit than the barbarous superstition in which they had been educated—the mild climate and fertile soil of Normandy inspired them with the love of home, and of a quiet and settled way of life—their intercourse and intermarriages with the French inhabitants, made them adopt the manners, customs, language, and dress of that people. This was so much the case, that the Normans, when they invaded England, called themselves, and were called by others, Frenchmen. They are so called in the laws of William the Conqueror, and in the charters of that prince and of his successors for a century after the conquest. In a word, the manners, customs, virtues, vices, language, dress, diet, and diversions of the predominant people of England, through the greatest part of this period, were exactly the same with those of persons of the same rank on the continent of France,

A very brief delineation of these must now be given.

There is hardly any thing more remarkable in the manners and customs of this period, than the sovereign contempt in which the name of an Englishman was held, and the cruel indignities with which the persons of Englishmen were treated. William of Poitou, in describing the battle of Hastings, at which he was present, frequently denominates the English—the barbarians. “The cries (says he) of the Normans on one side, and of the barbarians on the other, were drowned by the clashing of arms, and the groans of the dying.” After that fatal battle, and a few unfortunate revolts, the native English sunk into great contempt and wretchedness. Their estates were confiscated, their persons insulted, their wives and daughters dishonoured before their eyes. “The Normans (says an ancient historian) were astonished at their own power, became as it were mad with pride, and imagined that they might do whatever they pleased to the English. Young ladies of the highest rank and greatest beauty having lost their fathers, brothers, and protectors, and being violated by armed ruffians, called upon death to come to their relief. In a word, the name of an Englishman became a term of reproach. “The Normans (says Brompton) reduced almost all the English to such a state of servitude, that it was a reproach to be called an Englishman. This insolence of the Normans, and depression of the English, continued almost to the very conclusion of our present period. For we are told by Giraldus Cambrensis, who flourished in those times, that in the reign of Richard I., when a Norman was accused of any thing which he thought dishonourable, and chose to deny, he commonly said,—“What! do you imagine I am an Englishman?” or—“May I become an Englishman if I did it! By slow degrees, however, the animosity between the Normans and the English abated, and they coalesced into one powerful people, who have long been, and still are, justly proud of the honourable name of Englishman.

A new method of education was one of the many changes introduced into England by the Normans. For the Conqueror having formed the design of extirpating the English language, and making the French the vulgar tongue of all his subjects, commanded, that the children of the English should be taught the first rudiments of grammar at school in French, and not in English. This mode of education, introduced by the Normans with a design to establish their own language on the ruins of the Anglo-Saxon, continued more than three centuries after the conquest. This we learn from Trevisa, a writer who flourished in the fourteenth century, whose testimony we shall give in his own words:—“John Cornwaile, a master of grammar, changed the lore in grammar scole, and construction of Frenche into Engliche; and Richard Pincriche lerned the manere techyge of him, as other men of Pincriche. So that now, the yere of our Lorde a thousand three hundred and four score and five, and of the seconde kyng Richard, after the conquest nyne, and alle the gramere scoles of Engilond, children leveth Frensche, and construeth and lerneth an Engliche, and haveth thereby advantage in oon side, and disadvantage in another side. Here advantage is, that they lerneth her gramer in lasse tyme, than children were woned to doo; disadvantage is, that now children of gramer scole conneth na more Frensche than can her lift heele, and that is harm for him, and they schulle passe the see, and travaille in strange landes, and in many other places. Also gentilmen havith now moch left for to teche here children Frenche.” Thus the long struggle between the French and English languages, after it had continued more than three centuries, drew towards a conclusion, and victory began to declare in favour of the English.

The very singular spirit of chivalry which began to display itself about the beginning of this period, and was introduced into England by the Normans, gave a new turn to the education of the young nobility and gentry, in order to fit them for obtaining the honour of knighthood, which was then an object of ambition to the greatest princes. Those noble youths who were designed for the profession of arms and the honours of knighthood, were early taken out of the hands of the women, and placed in the family of some great prince or baron, who was also esteemed an expert and valorous knight.

At their first entrance into this school of chivalry, they acted in the capacity of pages or valets. For those names which are now appropriated to domestic servants, were then sometimes given to the sons and brothers of king. In this station they were instructed in the laws of courtesy and politeness, and in the first rudiments of chivalry, and martial exercises; to fit them for shinning in courts, at tournaments, and on the field of battle. Henry II. received this part of his education in the family of his uncle, Robert Earl of Gloucester, who was one of the most accomplished knights of the age in which he flourished.

After they had spent a competent time in the station of pages, they were advanced to the most honourable rank of esquires. Then they were admitted into more familiar intercourse with the knights and ladies of the court, and perfected in dancing, riding, hawking, hunting, tilting, and other accomplishments necessary to fit them for performing the offices, and becoming the honours of knighthood to which they aspired. In a word, the courts of kings, princes, and great barons, were a kind of colleges of chivalry, as the universities were of the arts and sciences; and the youth in both advanced through several degrees to the highest honours.

The exercises of the youth in these schools of chivalry, are thus described by Fitz-Stephen, who flourished in the reign of Henry II. “Every Sunday in Lent, immediately after dinner, crowds of noble and sprightly youths, mounted on war-horses, admirably trained to perform all their turnings and evolutions, ride into the fields in distinct bands, armed with lances and shields, and exhibit representations of battles, and go through all their martial exercises. Many of the young nobility, who have not yet received the honour of knighthood, issue from the king’s court, and from the houses of bishops, earls, and barons, to make trial of their courage, strength, and skill in arms. The hope of victory rouses the spirits of these noble youths; their fiery horses neigh and prance, and champ their foaming bits. At length the signal is given, and the sports begin. The youths, divided into opposite bands, encounter one another. In another place, one of the bands overtakes and overturns the other.”

The noble youth in those schools of chivalry, sometimes contracted the most sincere and lasting friendships, and became what they then called sworn brothers. Those who were sworn brothers, cemented their friendship with vows of inviolable attachment to each other, in peace and war, in prosperity and adversity;—that they would share the same dangers, and divide equally all their acquisitions. Of this custom it may not be improper to give one example. Robert de Oily, and Roger de Ivery, two young gentlemen who came into England with the Duke of Normandy, were sworn brothers. Some time after the conquest, King William granted the two great honours of Oxford and St. Waleries, to Robert de Oily, who immediately bestowed one of them, that of St. Waleries, on his sworn brother Roger de Ivery. A custom similar to this prevailed in Wales. The princes of that country placed one of their sons in the family of one chieftain, and another in the family of another, where they were educated with the sons of these chieftains, who became the sworn brothers of the young prince who had been educated with them. This produced frequent civil wars, each of the families endeavouring with all their power to raise their sworn brother and favourite prince to the government.

It was also in these schools of chivalry, the courts of kings, princes, and great barons, that the youth of this period imbibed that spirit of romantic gallantry and devotion towards the ladies, which was esteemed the most necessary qualification of a true and gentle knight. These courts were the schools in which the ladies, as well as the gentlemen, received their education. Both were often the wards of the prince or great baron; and while those of the one sex were educated with his sons under his own eye, those of the other sex were educated with his daughters under the inspection of his lady. In this situation it was natural for the young persons of each sex to cultivate those qualities which would render them most acceptable to the other. These were gentleness, modesty, and virtue, in the ladies; courtesy, valour, and gallantry in the gentlemen. Accordingly we are told, that in these schools of chivalry, the youth were carefully instructed in the arts of love, and in all the rules and punctilios of a virtuous and honourable gallantry. To render these lessons more effectual, the young gentlemen chose mistresses among the young ladies of the courts in which they resided, to whom they addressed all their vows, and practised all the arts of pleasing. They became their constant attendants in assemblies, their champions at tournaments, the protectors of their person, fame, and fortune, and the avengers of their wrongs.

When the youth in those schools of chivalry had spent seven or eight years in the station of esquires, they received the honour of knighthood, most commonly from the hands of the prince, earl, or baron, in whose court they had spent their youth and received their education. That honour was preceded by various preparations, and accompanied with several pompous ceremonies; which are thus described by the best modern writer on this subject, who has confirmed every article of his description by the most solid proofs. "Severe fastings,—nights spent in prayer in a church or chapel,—the sacraments of penance, and the eucharist received with devotion,—bathing and putting on white robes, as emblems of that purity of manners required by the laws of chivalry,—confession of all their sins,—with serious attention to several sermons, in which the faith and morals of a good Christian were explained, were the necessary preparations for receiving the honour of knighthood. When a candidate for that honour had performed all these preliminaries, he went in procession into a church, and advanced to the altar, with his sword slung in a scarf about his neck. He presented his sword to a priest; who blessed it, and put it again into the scarf, about the neck of the candidate; who then proceeded in a solemn pace, with his hands joined to the place where he was to be knighted. This august ceremony was most commonly performed in a church or chapel, in the great hall of a palace or castle, or in the open air. When the candidate approached the personage by whom he was to be knighted, he fell on his knees at his feet, and delivered to him his sword. Being asked for what end he desired the honour of knighthood? and having returned a proper answer, the usual oath was administered to him with great solemnity. After this, knights and ladies, who assisted at the ceremony, began to adorn the candidate with the armour and ensigns of knighthood. First, they put on his spurs, beginning with the left foot; next his coat of mail; then his cuirass; afterwards the several pieces of armour for his arms, hands, legs, and thighs; and, last of all, they girt him with the sword. When the candidate was thus dubbed, as it was called, the king, prince, or baron, who was to make him a knight, descended from his throne or seat, and gave him, still on his knees, the accolade, which was three gentle strokes, with the flat of his sword on the shoulder, or with the palm of his hand on the cheek; saying at the same time, —In the name of God, St. Michael, and St. George, I make thee a knight; be thou brave, hardy, and loyal. The new knight was then raised from the ground, his helmet put on, his shield and lance delivered to him, and his horse brought; which he mounted without using the stirrup, and performed several courses, displaying his dexterity in horsemanship, and in the management of his arms, amidst the acclamations of great multitudes of people, who had assembled to behold the ceremony." Could any institution be better adapted to inflame the ardour of the young nobility in acquiring the accomplishments necessary to obtain an honour which was courted by the greatest monarchs?

The virtues and endowments that were necessary to form an accomplished knight in the flourishing times of chivalry, were such as these—beauty, strength, and agility of body—great dexterity in dancing, wrestling, hunting, hawking, riding, tilting, and every other manly exercise;—the virtues of piety, chastity, modesty, courtesy, loyalty, liberality, sobriety; and above all, an inviolable attachment to truth, and an invincible courage.

To perform the duties of a good and valiant knight not one of these virtues and endowments was unnecessary. For he was not only to be the delight and ornament of courts by his gallantry and politeness, but he was bound by oath to serve his prince,—to defend the church and clergy,—to protect the persons and reputations of virtuous ladies,—and to rescue the widow and orphan from oppression with his sword, at the hazard of his life. Few, we may presume, possessed all these qualifications, and performed all these duties in perfection. But still an institution so virtuous in its principles, and honourable in its ends, must have done much good and prevented many evils.

The use of family-surnames, descending from father to son, seems to have been introduced into Britain by the Normans at the beginning of this period. For among the Anglo-Saxons, persons who bore the same Christian name were distinguished from one another by descriptive epithets, as the black, the white, the long, the strong, &c., and these epithets were not given to their sons if they did not possess their properties. Family-surnames, at their first introduction, like family-arms, were confined to persons of rank and fortune, who most commonly took their surnames from the castles in which they resided, or the estates which they possessed. This is the true reason of the surnames of so many of the noble and honourable families in England being the same with the names of certain towns, castles, and estates in Normandy, France, and Flanders. The ancestors of these families were lords of these estates and castles; and being proud of their native country and family possessions, they retained their names after they had settled in England, and transmitted them to their posterity. It was not till after the conclusion of this period that surnames were universally assumed by the common people.

The use of coats of arms, distinguishing one great family from another, and descending from father to son, appears to have been introduced into Britain about the same time with family-surnames, and by the same noble Normans. The Anglo-Saxon warriors adorned their shields and banners with the figures of certain animals, or with other devices; but in doing this every particular person followed his own fancy without any regard to the figures or devices that had been borne by his ancestors. But about the time of the first crusades, greater attention began to be paid to these devices, when it was discovered that they might be useful as well as ornamental. "About this time," says Camden, "the estimation of arms began in the expedition to the Holy Land; and afterwards by little and little became hereditary; when it was accounted most honourable to carry those arms which had been displayed in the Holy Land in that holy service against the professed enemies of Christianity." Jousts and tournaments, the favourite diversions of the great and brave in this period, contributed not a little to render arms hereditary. For a noble son, proud of the honours that had been gained by an illustrious father in those fields of fame, delighted to appear with the same devices on his shield at the like solemnities. It was only, however, by slow degrees, and in the course of almost two centuries, that this custom became constant and universal even in noble families.

The many noble Normans who settled in England after the conquest, introduced a more magnificent and splendid manner of living than had been known among the Anglo-Saxons. This we learn from a writer who flourished soon after the conquest, and had the best opportunities of being well informed; who tells us, that the English nobles were universally addicted to excessive drinking, and spent their ample revenues in a sordid manner in mean and low houses; but that the Norman barons dwelt in stately and magnificent palaces, kept elegant tables, and were very splendid in their dress and equipage. William Longchamp, Bishop of Ely, had no fewer than a thousand, some contemporary writers say fifteen hundred, horsemen in his retinue; and to furnish his table, says a prelate who was his contemporary, all the different kinds of beasts that roam on the land, of fishes that swim in the waters, and of birds that fly in the air, were collected. The Norman kings and nobles displayed their taste for magnificence in the most remarkable manner at their coronations, their royal feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, and at their tournaments, which were all celebrated with incredible expence and pomp.

One thing that contributed very much to swell the retinues of the Norman kings, prelates, and nobles, was the necessity they were under of carrying with them not only their provisions, but even a great part of the furniture of their houses, in their journeys. Peter of Blois, who was chaplain to Henry II., in his curious description of a court-life, paints the prodigious crowds, confusion, and bustle, with which the royal progresses were attended, in very strong colours. "When the king sets out in the morning, you see multitudes of people running up and down as if they were distracted; horses rushing against horses: carriages overturning carriages; players, whores, gamesters, cooks, confectioners, mimics, dancers, barbers, pimps, and parasites, making so much noise, and, in a word, such an intolerable tumultuous jumble of horse and foot, that you imagine the great abyss hath opened, and that hell hath poured out all its inhabitants."

The custom of covering up their fires about sunset in summer, and about eight or nine at night in winter, at the ringing of a bell called the couvre-feu, or curfew-bell, is supposed by some to have been introduced by William I., and imposed upon the English as a badge of servitude. But this opinion does not seem to be well founded. For there is sufficient evidence, that the same custom prevailed in France, Spain, Italy, Scotland, and probably in all the other countries of Europe, in this period; and was intended as a precaution against fires, which were then very frequent, and very fatal, when so many houses were built of wood. Henry I. restored the use of lamps and candles at court in the night, after the ringing of the couvre-feu bell, which had been prohibited by his predecessor William Rufus.

Piety, or a regard to religion, may not improperly be placed at the head of the national virtues of the Anglo-Normans. The best of our ancient historians make great complaints of the decay of piety among the Anglo-Saxons immediately before the conquest, and ascribe that great calamity to the wrath of heaven against them on that account. Nothing can exhibit a stronger picture of the different characters of the two nations in this respect, than the different behaviour of the Norman and Saxon armies in the night before the famous battle of Hastings. The Normans spent that awful night in confession, prayer, and other acts of devotion; while the English wasted it in noise and riot. "Religion," says William of Malmsbury, "which was almost extinct in England, revived after the settlement of the Normans. Then you might have seen magnificent churches and monasteries arising in every village, town, and city. In a word, so much did religious zeal flourish in our country, that a rich man would have imagined he had lived in vain, if he had not left some illustrious monument of his pious munificence." The religion, however, of the Anglo-Normans, in this period, was not of the most pure and rational kind. On the contrary, it consisted chiefly in building, adorning, and endowing churches, in performing certain superstitious ceremonies, in believing all the opinions, and obeying all the commands, of the clergy.

There was no virtue of which the Normans who settled in England were so proud, and to which they made such high pretensions, as martial courage and valour. This they claimed in a degree peculiar to themselves, above all other nations. The speech of William the Conqueror to his army, before the battle of Hastings, was in this boastful strain: "I address you, O Normans! the most valiant of all nations, not as doubting, but as secure of victory, which neither force nor fortune can wrest out of your hands. O ye bravest of mortal men! what availed the king of France at the head of all the nations between Lorrain and Spain, against your ancestor Hasting, who seized as much of France as he pleased, and kept it as long as he thought proper?" &c. &c. Almost a century after the conquest, the Normans still considered themselves as a distinct people from the English, and had lost nothing of their high opinion of their own valour. This appears from the speech of that venerable warrior Walter Espec, before the battle of the Standard: "Why should we despair of victory, though we are few in number? Has not the almighty bestowed victory upon our nation, as its peculiar property? How often have small bodies of brave Normans obtained glorious victories over great armies of the people of France, Maine, Anjou, and Aquitaine? Did not our own fathers conquer this island at one blow, on which the invincible Julius bestowed so much time and blood? We have seen, my brave Normans, we ourselves have seen, the king of France, and his whole army, flying before us, many of his greatest barons slain, and others taken prisoners. Who were the conquerors of Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria, but the valiant Normans?" &c. &c.

Sobriety may not improperly be reckoned among the national virtues of the Anglo-Normans, especially at the time of their settlement in England. The most ancient of our historians who had opportunities of conversing with the Normans and English, before they were so blended together as to form one people, commend the former for their sobriety, as much as they condemn the latter for their intemperance. The English," says William of Malmsbury, "were much addicted to excessive eating and drinking, in which they sometimes spent both day and night, without intermission. The Normans were very unlike them in this respect, being delicate in the choice of their meats and drinks, but seldom exceeding the bounds of temperance. By this means the Normans lived with greater elegance, and at less expense than the English." The custom, however, of drinking to pegs, which had been introduced by a law of Edgar the Peaceable, still continued in this period. For by a canon of the council of Westminster, held A.D. 1102 the clergy are prohibited to frequent ale-houses, or to drink to pegs. It appears also, that before the conclusion of this period, many of the Normans had adopted the manners of the English, and departed from the sobriety of their ancestors. "When you behold," says Peter of Blois, "our barons and knights going upon a military expedition, you see their baggage-horses loaded, not with iron but wine, not with lances but cheeses, not with swords but bottles, not with spears but spits. You would imagine they were going to prepare a great feast rather than to make war. There are even too many who boast of their excessive drunkenness and gluttony, and labour to acquire fame by swallowing great quantities of meat and drink."

The point of honour was very much respected by the Normans in this period, and they paid much regard to their plighted faith, especially to the ladies. A most remarkable example of this occurs in the history of King Stephen, when Empress Maud was besieged by him in Arundel castle.

The Normans appear to have been a cheerful, witty, and facetious people, delighting much in innocent frolics and convivial jocularities. No qualities were more admired amongst them than those of wit and humour. It was to these qualities chiefly that King Stephen owed his popularity, and the success of his usurpation. "Stephen, when he was an earl (says William of Malmsbury, who was well acquainted with him), gained the affections of the people to a degree that can hardly be imagined, by the affability of his manners, and the wit and pleasantry of his conversation. He condescended sometimes to chat and joke with persons in very humble stations, and the nobility were in general charmed with him, and embraced his party." Our historians of this period have taken the trouble to record many of the frolics and repartees of our princes, prelates, and great men; which is a sufficient proof that they were considered as matters of importance, and not unworthy of a place in history. Nay, so fond were the Normans of the innocent conflicts of wit and humour, that the greatest enemies, in the very heat of a siege, sometimes suspended their hostilities, in order to engage in a more harmless combat of banter and repartee. When one of the contending parties designed this, he appeared in sight of the other, dressed in white; which was understood and accepted as a challenge to a trial of wit. John of Salisbury censures, with great severity, the excessive fondness of his countrymen and contemporaries for professed wits and jesters, and reproaches them for spending too much time, and taking too much delight in their company.

The Normans seem also to have been a generous open-hearted people, capable of very noble acts of bounty and liberality. Their profuse donations to the church are well known, and were certainly far too great and numerous. Few princes have had more to give, or were more liberal in their donations, than the Norman kings of England. To say nothing of the inestimable grants made by William I. to his followers, all his successors in this period displayed both their wealth and liberality at the three great festivals of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, every year, and on many other occasions. "In the month of February, A.D. 1191, (says John Brompton), when Richard I. was at Messina, in Sicily, he made a present of several ships to the King of France and his nobles. He also opened his treasures, and distributed to the earls, barons, knights, and esquires of the army, greater sums of money than any of his predecessors had ever distributed in one year."

The same historian has preserved the following curious anecdote, which may serve both as a proof and illustration of the wit, politeness, and generosity of the Normans. When Robert, Duke of Normandy, father of William the Conqueror, was at Constantinople, in his way to the Holy Land, he lived in uncommon splendour, and was greatly celebrated for his wit, his affability, and other virtues. Of these many remarkable examples were related to the Emperor; who resolved to put the reality of them to a trial. With this view he invited the duke and all his nobles to a feast in the great hall of the Imperial palace, but took care to have all the tables and seats filled with guests, before the arrival of the Normans, of whom he commanded them to take no notice. When the duke, followed by his nobles in their richest dresses, entered the hall, observing that all the seats were filled with guests, and that none of them returned his civilities, or offered him any accommodation, he walked, without the least appearance of surprise or discomposure, to an empty space, at one end of the room, took off his cloak, folded it very carefully, laid it upon the floor, and sat down upon it; in all which he was imitated by his followers. In this posture they dined, on such dishes as were set before them, with every appearance of the most perfect satisfaction with their entertainment. When the feast was ended, the duke and his nobles arose, took leave of the company in the most graceful manner, and walked out of the hall in their doublets, leaving their cloaks, which were of great value, behind them on the floor. The emperor, who had admired their whole behaviour, was quite surprised at this last part of it; and sent one of his courtiers to entreat the duke and his followers to put on their cloaks. "Go," said the duke, "and tell your master, that it is not the custom of the Normans to carry about with them the seats which they use at an entertainment."

The Normans were no less credulous than the Anglo-Saxons. This is evident from the prodigious number of miracles, revelations, visions, and enchantments, which are related with the greatest gravity by the best of their historians and other writers. "In this year, 1171, about Easter," says Matthew Paris, "it pleased the Lord Jesus Christ to irradiate his glorious martyr Thomas Becket with many miracles, that it might appear to all the world he had obtained a victory suitable to his merits. None who approached his sepulchre in faith, returned without a cure. For strength was restored to the lame, hearing to the deaf, sight to the blind, speech to the dumb, health to lepers, and life to the dead. Nay, not only men and women, but even birds and beasts, were raised from death to life." Giraldus Cambrensis, amongst many ridiculous stories of miracles, visions, and apparitions, tells of one devil who acted a considerable time as a gentleman's butler with great prudence and probity; and of another who was a very diligent and learned clergyman, and a mighty favourite of his archbishop. This last clerical devil was, it seems, an excellent historian, and used to divert the archbishop with telling him old stories. "One day, when he was entertaining the archbishop with a relation of ancient histories and surprising events, the conversation happened to turn on the incarnation of our Saviour. Before the incarnation, said our historian, the devils had great power over mankind; but after that event their power was much diminished, and they were obliged to fly. Some of them threw themselves into the sea; some concealed themselves in hollow trees, or in the cliffs of rocks; and I myself plunged into a certain fountain. As soon as he had said this, finding that he had discovered his secret, his face was covered with blushes, he went out of the room, and was no more seen."

The Normans were as curious as they were credulous. This prompted them to employ many vain fallacious arts to discover their future fortunes, and the success of their undertakings. John of Salisbury enumerates no fewer than thirteen different kinds of diviners or fortunetellers, who pretended to foretell future events; some by one means, and some by another. Nor did this passion for penetrating into futurity prevail only among the common people, but also among persons of the highest rank and greatest learning. All our kings, and many of our earls and great barons, had their astrologers, who resided in their families, and were consulted by them in all undertakings of importance. We find Peter of Blois, who was one of the most learned men of the age in which he flourished, writing an account of his dreams to his friend the bishop of Bath, and telling him how anxious he had been about the interpretation of them; and that he had employed for that purpose divination by the psalter. The English, it seems probable, had still more superstitious curiosity, and paid greater attention to dreams and omens than the Normans. For when William Rufus was dissuaded from going abroad on the morning of that day on which he was killed, because the abbot of Gloucester had dreamed something which portended danger, he is said to have made this reply:—"Do you imagine that I am an Englishman, to be frightened by a dream, or the sneezing of an old woman?" But the truth is, that excessive credulity and curiosity were the weaknesses of the times, rather than of any particular nation.

The declamations of recluse and melancholy men have abounded in every age, and are always to be read with some degree of caution and distrust. We have, however, the fullest evidence, that violations of the laws of humanity, chastity, and justice, prevailed so much amongst the Normans in this period, that they may justly be called their national vices.

Though they were a brave and generous, they were also a haughty, passionate, and fierce people, and their fierceness often degenerated into cruelty. "When it pleased God," says one of our ancient historians, "to bring destruction upon the English, he employed the Normans to execute his vengeance, because he knew that they delighted more in blood and slaughter than any other nation."

The great prosperity of the Normans in England seems to have contributed not a little to inflame their passions and corrupt their manners. Of the licentiousness of manners in this respect, it will probably be thought sufficient evidence that public stews were established by law in London, and probably in other cities, in this period; and that the ladies of pleasure who followed the camps and courts of the kings of England in all their motions, were formed into regular incorporations, and put under the government of officers, who were called the marshals of the whores. These officers, both in the camp and court, had estates annexed unto them, and were hereditary.

Several of our historians, and other writers in this period, reproach the Normans in the severest terms for introducing and practising an unnatural crime, which is too detestable to be named.

The people of Normandy and Flanders, of which great numbers followed the Conqueror into England, were remarkable for the beauty and elegance of their persons. They were also very ostentatious and fond of pomp. These two things prompted them to pay great attention to their dress; of which it is proper to give a very brief description.

There was hardly any thing against which the clergy in this period declaimed with greater vehemence, than the long curled hair of the laity, especially of the courtiers. Deprived of this ornament themselves, by their clerical tonsure, they endeavoured to deter others from enjoying it, by representing it as one of the greatest crimes, and most certain marks of reprobation. Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, even pronounced the then terrible sentence of excommunication against all who wore long hair, for which pious zeal he is very much commended. Serlo, a Norman bishop, acquired great honour by a sermon which he preached before Henry I., A.D., 1104, against long and curled hair, with which the king and all his courtiers were so much affected, that they consented to resign their flowing ringlets, of which they had been so vain. The prudent prelate gave them no time to change their minds, but immediately pulled a pair of shears out of his sleeve, and performed the operation with his own hand. Another incident happened about twenty-five years after, which gave a temporary check to the prevailing fondness for long hair: it is thus related by a contemporary historian: "An event happened, A.D. 1129, which seemed very wonderful to our young gallants; who, forgetting that they were men, had transformed themselves into women by the length of their hair. A certain knight, who was very proud of his long luxuriant hair, dreamed that a person suffocated him with its curls. As soon as he awoke from his sleep, he cut his hair to a decent length. The report of this spread over all England, and almost all the knights reduced their hair to the proper standard. But this reformation was not of long continuance. For in less than a year, all who wished to appear fashionable, returned to their former wickedness, and contended with the ladies in length of hair. Those to whom nature had denied that ornament, supplied the defect by art."

The Normans had as great an aversion to beards as they had a fondness for long hair. Among them, to allow the beard to grow, was an indication of the deepest distress and misery. They not only shaved their beards themselves, but, when they had authority, they obliged others to imitate their example. It is mentioned by some of our ancient historians, as one of the most wanton acts of tyranny in William the Conqueror,—that he compelled the English (who had been accustomed to allow the hair of their upper lips to grow) to shave their whole beards. This was so disagreeable to some of that people, that they chose rather to abandon their country than resign their whiskers.
